BY
J. ROSS BROWNE.

WHEN I inform the reader that I have scarcely dipped pen in ink for six years, save to unravel the mysteries of a Treasury voucher; that I have lived chiefly among Indians, disbursing agents, and officers of the customs; that I now sit writing in the attic of a German villa more than eight thousand miles from the scene of my adventures, without note or memorandum of any kind to refresh my memory, you will be prepared to make reasonable allowance for such a loose, rambling, and disjointed narrative as an Ex-Inspector-General can be expected to write under such adverse circumstances. If there be inconveniences in being hanged, as the gentle Elia has attempted to prove, so likewise are there inconveniences in being decapitated; for surely a man deprived of the casket which nature has given him as a receptacle for his brains, is no better off than one with a broken neck. But it is not my present purpose to enter into an analysis of this portion of my experience. Nor do I make these references to official life by way of excuse for any rustiness of intellect that may be perceptible in my narrative; but rather in mitigation of those unconscious violations of truth and marvelous flights of fancy which may naturally result from long experience in Government affairs.

Ever since 1849, when I first trod the shores of California, the citizens of that Land of Promise have been subject to periodical excitements, the extent and variety of which can find no parallel in any other State of the Union. To enumerate these in chronological detail would be a difficult task, nor is it necessary to my purpose. The destruction of towns by flood and fire; the uprisings and downfallings of Vigilance Committees; the breaking of banking-houses and pecuniary ruin of thousands; the political wars, Senatorial tournaments, duels, and personal affairs; the Prison and Bulkhead schemes; the extraordinary orations to the living and the dead, and innumerable other excitements, have been too frequently detailed, and have elicited too much comment from the Atlantic press, not to be still in the memory of the public.

But numerous as these agitations have been, and prejudicial as some of them must long continue to be to the reputation of the State, they can bear no comparison in point of extent and general interest to the mining excitements which from time to time have convulsed the whole Pacific coast, from Puget's Sound to San Diego. In these there can be no occasion for party animosity; they are confined to no political or sectional clique; all the industrial classes are interested, and in a manner too, affecting, either directly or incidentally, their very means of subsistence. The country abounds in mineral wealth, and the merchant, the banker, the shipper, the mechanic, the laborer, are all to some extent dependent upon its development. Even the gentleman of elegant leisure, vulgarly known as the "Bummer"—and there are many in California—is occasionally driven by visions of cock-tail and cigar-money to doff his "stove-pipe," and exchange his gold-mounted cane for a pick or a shovel. The axiom has been well established by an eminent English writer, that "Every man wants a thousand pounds." It seems indeed to be a chronic and constitutional want, as well in California as in less favored countries.

Few of the early residents of the State can have forgotten the Gold Bluff excitement of '52, when by all accounts old Ocean himself turned miner, and washed up cart-loads of gold on the beach above Trinidad. It was represented, and generally believed, that any enterprising man could take his hat and a wheel-barrow and in half an hour gather up gold enough to last him for life. I have reason to suspect that, of the thousands who went there, many will long remember their experience with emotions, if pleasant "yet mournful to the soul."

The Kern River excitement threatened for a time to depopulate the northern portion of the State. The stages from Marysville and Sacramento were crowded day after day, and new lines were established from Los Angeles, Stockton, San José, and various other points; but such was the pressure of travel in search of this grand depository, in which it was represented the main wealth of the world had been treasured by a beneficent Providence, that thousands were compelled to go on foot and carry their blankets and provisions on their backs. From Stockton to the mining district, a distance of more than three hundred miles, the plains of the San Joaquin were literally speckled with "honest miners." It is a notable fact, that, of those who went in stages, the majority returned on foot; and of those who trusted originally to shoe-leather, many had to walk back on their natural soles, or depend on sackcloth or charity.

After the Kern River Exchequer had been exhausted the public were congratulated by the press throughout the State upon the effectual check now put upon these ruinous and extra-giant excitements. The enterprising miners who had been tempted to abandon good claims in search of better had undergone a species of purging which would allay any irritation of the mucous membrane for some time. What they had lost in money they had gained in experience. They would henceforth turn a deaf ear to interested representations, and not be dazzled by visions of sudden wealth conjured up by monte-dealers, travelers, and horse-jockeys. They were, on the whole, wiser if not happier men. Nor would the lesson be lost to the merchants and capitalists who had scattered their goods and their funds over the picturesque heights of the Sierra Nevada. And even the gentlemen of elegant leisure, who had gone off so suddenly in search of small change for liquors and cigars, could now recuperate their exhausted energies at the free lunch establishments of San Francisco, or if too far gone in seed for that, they could regenerate their muscular system by some wholesome exercise in the old diggings, where there was not so much gold perhaps as at Kern River, but where it could be got at more easily.

Scarcely had the reverberation caused by the bursting of the Kern River bubble died away, and fortune again smiled upon the ruined multitudes, when a faint cry was heard from afar—first low and uncertain, like a mysterious whisper, then full and sonorous, like the boom of glad tidings from the mouth of a cannon, the inspiring cry of FRAZER RIVER! Here was gold sure enough!—a river of gold!—a country that dazzled the eyes with its glitter of gold. There was no deception about it this time. New Caledonia was the land of Ophir. True, it was in the British possessions, but what of that? The people of California would develop the British possessions. Had our claim to 54°40' been insisted upon, this immense treasure would now have been within our own boundaries; but no matter—it was ours by right of proximity! The problem of Solomon's Temple was now solved. Travelers, from Marco Polo down to the present era, who had attempted to find the true land of Ophir had signally failed; but here it was, the exact locality, beyond peradventure. For where else in the world could the river-beds, creeks, and cañons be lined with gold? Where else could the honest miner "pan out" $100 per day every day in the year? But if any who had been rendered incredulous by former excitements still doubted.

RETURNING FROM KERN RIVER.

HO! FOR FRAZER RIVER.

they could no longer discredit the statements that were brought down by every steamer, accompanied by positive and palpable specimens of the ore, and by the assurances of captains, pursers, mates, cooks, and waiters, that Frazer River was the country. To be sure, it was afterward hinted that the best part of the gold brought down from Frazer had made the round voyage from San Francisco; but I consider this a gross and unwarranted imputation upon the integrity of steamboat owners, captains, and speculators. Did not the famous Commodore Wright take the matter in hand; put his best steamers on the route; hoist his banners and placards in every direction, and give every man a chance of testing the question in person? This was establishing the existence of immense mineral wealth in that region upon a firm and practical basis. No man of judgment and experience, like the Commodore, would undertake to run his steamers on

"the baseless fabric of a vision." The cheapness and variety of his rates afforded every man an opportunity of making a fortune. For thirty, twenty, and even fifteen dollars, the ambitious aspirant for Frazer could be landed at Victoria.

I will not now undertake to give a detail of that memorable excitement; how the stages, north, south, east, and, I had almost said, west, were crowded day and night with scores upon scores of sturdy adventurers; how farms were abandoned and crops lost for want of hands to work them; how rich claims in the old diggings were given away for a song; how the wharves of San Francisco groaned under the pressure of the human freight delivered upon them on every arrival of the Sacramento and Stockton boats; how it was often impracticable to get through the streets in that vicinity owing to the crowds gathered around the "runners," who cried aloud the merits and demerits of the rival steamers; and, strangest of all, how the head and front of the Frazerites were the very men who had enjoyed such pleasant experience at Gold Bluff, Kern River, and other places famous in the history of California. No sensible man could doubt the richness of Frazer River when these veterans became leaders, and called upon the masses to follow. They were not a class of men likely to be deceived—they knew the signs of the times. And, in addition to all this, who could resist the judgment and experience of Commodore Wright, a man who had made an independent fortune in the steamboat business? Who could be deaf when assayers, bankers, jobbers, and speculators cried aloud that it was all true?

Well, I am not going to moralize. Mr. Nugent was appointed a Commissioner, on the part of the United States, to settle the various difficulties which had grown up between the miners and Governor Douglass. He arrived at Victoria in time to perform signal service to his fellow-citizens; that is to say, he found many of them in a state of starvation, and sent them back to California at public expense. Frazer River, always too high for mining purposes, could not be prevailed upon to subside. Its banks were not banks of issue, nor were its beds stuffed with the feathers of the Golden Goose. Had it not been for this turn of affairs it is difficult to say what would have been the result. The British Lion had been slumbering undisturbed at Victoria for half a century, and was very much astonished, upon waking up, to find thirty thousand semi-barbarous Californians scattered broadcast over the British possessions. Governor Douglass issued manifestoes in vain. He evidently thought it no joke. The subject eventually became a matter of diplomatic correspondence, in which much ink was shed, but fortunately no blood; although the subsequent seizure of San Juan by General Harney came very near producing that result.

The steamers in due course of time began to return crowded with enterprising miners, who still believed there was gold there if the river would only fall. But generosity dictates that I should say no more on this point. It is enough to add, that the time arrived when it became a matter of personal offense to ask any spirited gentleman if he had been to Frazer River.

There was now, of course, an end to all mining excitements. It could never again happen that such an imposition could be practiced upon public credulity. In the whole State there was not another sheep that could be gulled by the cry of wolf. Business would now resume its steady and legitimate course. Property would cease to fluctuate in value. Every branch of industry would become fixed upon a permanent and reliable basis. All these excitements were the natural results of the daring and enterprising character of the people. But now, having worked off their superabundant steam, they would be prepared to go ahead systematically, and develop those resources which they had hitherto neglected. It was a course of medical effervescence highly beneficial to the body politic. All morbid appetite for sudden wealth was now gone forever.

But softly, good friends! What rumor is this? Whence come these silvery strains that are wafted to our ears from the passes of the Sierra Nevada? What dulcet Æolian harmonies—what divine, enchanting ravishment is it

As I live, it is a cry of Silver! Silver in WASHOE! Not gold now, you silly men of Gold Bluff; you Kern-Riverites; you daring explorers of British Columbia! But SILVER—solid, pure SILVER! Beds of it ten thousand feet deep! Acres of it!—miles of it!—hundreds of millions of dollars poking their backs up out of the earth ready to be pocketed!

Do you speak of the mines of Potosi or Golconda? Do you dare to quote the learned Baron Von Tschudi on South America and Mexico? Do you refer me to the ransom of Atahualpa, the unfortunate Inca, in the days of Pizarro? Nothing at all, I assure you, to the silver mines of Washoe! “Sir,” said my informant to me, in strict confidence, no later than this morning, “you may rely upon it, for I am personally acquainted with a brother of the gentleman whose most intimate friend saw the man whose partner has just come over the mountains, and he says there never was the like on the face of the earth! The ledges are ten thousand feet deep—solid masses of silver. Let us be off! Now is the time! A pack-mule, pick and shovel, hammer and frying-pan will do. You need nothing more. HURRAH FOR WASHOE!"

Kind and sympathizing reader, imagine a man who for six years had faithfully served his government and his country; who had never, if he knew himself intimately, embezzled a dollar of the public funds; who had resisted the seductive influences of Gold Bluff, Kern, and Frazer Rivers, from the purest motives of patriotism; who scorned to abandon his post in search of filthy lucre—imagine such a personage cut short in his official career, and suddenly bereft of his per diem by a formal and sarcastic note of three lines from head-quarters; then fancy you hear him jingle the last of his Federal emoluments in his pocket, and sigh at the ingratitude of republics. Would you not consider him open to any proposition short of murder or highway robbery?

Would you be surprised if he accepted an invitation from Mr. Wise, the aeronaut, to take a voyage in a balloon? or the berth of assistant-manager in a diving-bell? or joined the first expedition in search of the treasure buried by the Spanish galleon on her voyage to Acapulco in 1578? Then consider his position, as he stands musing upon the mutability of human affairs, when those strange and inspiring cries of Washoe fall upon his ears for the first time, with a realizing sense of their import. Borne on the wings of the wind from the Sierra Nevada; wafted through every street, lane, and alley of San Francisco; whirling around the drinking-saloons, eddying over the counters of the banking-offices, scattering up the dust among the Front Street merchants, arousing the slumbering inmates of the Custom-house—what man of enterprise could resist it? Washoe! The Comstock lead! The Ophir! The Central—The Billy Choller Companies, and a thousand others, indicating in trumpet-tones the high road to fortune! From the crack of day to the shades of night nothing is heard but Washoe. The steady men of San Francisco are aroused, the men of Front Street, the gunny-bag men, the brokers, the gamblers, the butchers, the bakers, the whisky-dealers, the lawyers, and all. The exception was to find a sane man in the entire city.

No wonder the abstracted personage already referred to was aroused from his gloomy reflections. A friend appealed to him to go to Washoe. The friend was interested there, but could not go himself. It was a matter of incalculable importance. Millions were involved in it. He (the friend) would pay expenses. The business would not occupy a week, and would not interfere with any other business.

WASHOE AGENCY.

Next day an advertisement appeared in the city papers, respectfully inviting the public to commit their claims and investments to the hands of their fellow-citizen, Mr. Yusef Badra, whose long experience in Government affairs eminently qualified him to undertake the task of geological research. He was especially prepared to determine the exact amount of silver contained in fossils. It would afford him pleasure to be of service to his friends and fellow-citizens. The public would be so kind as to address Mr. Badra, at Carson City, Territory of Utah.

This looked like business on an extensive scale. It read like business of a scientific character. It was a card drawn up with skill, and calculated to attract attention. I am proud to acknowledge that I am the author, and, furthermore (if you will consider the information confidential), that I am the identical agent referred to.

Many good friends shook their heads when I announced my intention of visiting Washoe, and although they designed going themselves as soon as the snow was melted from the mountains, they could not understand how a person who had so long retained his faculties unimpaired could give up a lucrative government office and engage in such a wild-goose chase as that. Little did they know of the brief but irritating document which I carried in my pocket, and for which I am determined some day or other to write a satire against our system of government. I bade them a kindly farewell, and on a fine evening, toward the latter part of March, took my departure for Sacramento, there to take the stage for Placerville, and from that point as fortune might direct.

My stock in trade consisted of two pair of blankets, a spare shirt, a plug of tobacco, a notebook, and a paint-box. On my arrival in Placerville I found the whole town in commotion. There was not an animal to be had at any of the stables without applying three days in advance. The stage for Strawberry had made its last trip in consequence of the bad condition of the road. Every hotel and restaurant was full to overflowing. The streets were blocked up with crowds of adventurers all bound for Washoe. The gambling and drinking saloons were crammed to suffocation with customers practicing for Washoe. The clothing stores were covered with placards offering to sell goods at ruinous sacrifices to Washoe miners. The forwarding houses and express offices were overflowing with goods and packages marked for Washoe. The grocery stores were making up boxes, bags, and bundles of groceries for the Washoe trade. The stables were constantly starting off passenger and pack trains for Washoe. Mexican vaqueros were driving headstrong mules through the streets on the road to Washoe. The newspapers were full of Washoe. In short, there was nothing but Washoe to be seen, heard, or thought of. Every arrival from the mountains confirmed the glad tidings that enormous quantities of silver were being discovered daily in Washoe. Any man who wanted a fortune needed only to go over there and pick it up. There was Jack Smith, who made ten thousand dollars the other day at a single trade; and Tom Jenkins, twenty thousand by right of discovery; and Bill Brown, forty thousand in the tavern business, and so on. Every body was getting rich "hand over fist." It was the place for fortunes. No man could go amiss. I was in search of just such a place. It suited me to find a fortune ready made. Like Professor Agassiz, I could not afford to make money, but it would be no inconvenience to draw a check on the great Washoe depository for fifty thousand dollars or so, and proceed on my travels. I would visit Japan, ascend the Amoor River, traverse Tartary, spend a few weeks in Siberia, rest a day or so at St. Petersburg, cross through Russia to the Black Sea, visit Persia, Nineveh, and Bagdad, and wind up somewhere in Italy. I even began to look about the bar-rooms for a map in order to lay out the route more definitely, but the only map to be seen was De Groot's outline of the route from Placerville to Washoe. I went to bed rather tired after the excitement of the day and somewhat surfeited with Washoe. Presently I heard a tap at the door, a head was popped through the opening.

"I SAY, CAP!"

"I say, Cap!"
 "Well, what do you say?"
 "Are you the man that can't get a animal for Washoe?"
 "Yes, have you got one to sell or hire?"
 "No, I hain't got one myself, but me and my pardner is going to walk there, and if you like you can jine our party."
 "Thank you, I have a friend who is going with me, but I shall be very glad to have more company."
 "All right, Cap; good-night."
 The door was closed, but presently opened again,
 "I say, Cap!"
 "What now?"
 "Do you believe in Washoe?"
 "Of course; why not?"
 "Well, I suppose it's all right. Good-night, I'm in." And my new friend left me to my slumbers.

But who could slumber in such a bedlam, where scores and hundreds of crack-brained people kept rushing up and down the passage all night, in and out of every room, banging the doors after them, calling for boots, carpet-sacks, cards, cock-tails, and toddies; while amidst the ceaseless din arose ever and anon that potent cry of "Washoe!" which had unsettled every brain. I turned over and over for the fiftieth time, and at length fell into an uneasy doze. A mountain seemed to rise before me. Millions of rats with human faces were climbing up its sides, some burrowing into holes, some rolling down into bottomless pits, but all labeled Washoe. Soon the mountain began to shake its sides with suppressed laughter, and out of a volcano on the top burst sheets of flame, through which jumped ten thousand grotesque figures in the shape of dollars with spider legs, shrieking with all their might, "Washoe! ho! ho! Washoe! ho! ho!"

Surely the sounds were wonderfully real. Tap, tap, at the door.

"I say, Cap!"

"Well, what is it?"

"'Bout time to get up if you calklate to make Pete's ranch to-night."

So I got up, and after a cup of coffee took a ramble on the heights, where I was amply compensated for my loss of rest by the richness and beauty of the sunrise. It was still early spring; the hills were covered with verdure; flowers bloomed in all directions; pleasant little cottages, scattered here and there, gave a civilized aspect to the scene, and when I looked over the busy town, and heard the lively rattle of stages, wagons, and buggies, and saw the long pack-trains winding their way up the mountains, I felt proud of California and her people. There is not a prettier little town in the State than Placerville, and certainly not a better class of people any where than her thriving inhabitants. They seemed, indeed, to be so well satisfied with their own mining prospects that they were the least excited of the crowd on the subject of the new discoveries. The impulse given to business in the town, however, was well calculated to afford them satisfaction. This was the last d  p  t of trade on the way to Washoe. My excellent friend Dan Gelwicks, of the Mountain Democrat, assured me that he was perfectly satisfied to spend the remainder of his days in Placerville. Who that has ever visited the mountains, or attended a political convention in Sacramento, does not know the immortal "Dan"—the truest, best-hearted, handsomest fellow in existence; the very cream and essence of a country editor; who dresses as he pleases, chews tobacco when he pleases, writes tremendous political philippics, knows every body, trusts every body, sets up his own editorials, and on occasions stands ready to do the job and press-work! I am indebted to "Dan" for the free use of his sanctum; and in consideration of his kindness and hospitality, do hereby transfer to him all my right, title, and interest in the Roaring Jack Claim, Wild-Cat Ledge, Devil's Gate, which by this time must be worth ten thousand dollars a foot.

Before we were quite ready to start our party had increased to five; but as each had to purchase a knife, tin cup, pound of cheese, or some other article of luxury, it was ten o'clock before we got fairly under way. And here I must say that, although our appearance as we passed along the main street of Placerville elicited no higher token of admiration than "Go it, Washoe!" such a party, habited and accoutred as we were, would have made a profound sensation in Hyde Park, London, or even on Broadway, New York.

The road was in good condition, barring a little mud in the neighborhood of "Hangtown;" and the day was exceedingly bright and pleasant. As I ascended the first considerable elevation in the succession of heights which extend all the way for a distance of fifty miles to the summit of the Sierra Nevada, and cast a look back over the foot-hills, a more glorious scene of gigantic forests, open valleys, and winding streams seldom greeted my vision. The air was singularly pure and bracing—every draught of it was equal to a glass of sparkling Champagne. At intervals, varying from fifty yards to half a mile, streams of water of crystal clearness and icy coolness burst from the mountain sides, making a pleasant music as they crossed the road. Whether the day was uncommonly warm, or the exercise rather heating, or the packs very heavy, it was beyond doubt some of the party were afflicted with a chronic thirst, for they stopped to drink at every spring and rivulet on the way, giving rise to a suspicion in my mind that they had not been much accustomed to that wholesome beverage of late. This suspicion was strengthened by a mysterious circumstance. I had lagged behind at a turn of the road to adjust my pack, when I was approached by the unique personage whose head in the door-way had startled me the night before.

"I say, Cap!" At the same time pulling from the folds of his blanket a dangerous-looking "pocket pistol," he put the muzzle to his mouth and discharged the main portion of the contents down his throat.

"What d'ye say, Cap?"

Now I claim to be under no legal obligation to state what I said or did on that occasion; but this much I am willing to avow: that upon resuming our journey there was a glorious sense of freedom and independence in our adventurous mode of life. The fresh air, odororous with the scent of pine forests and wild flowers; the craggy rocks overhung with the grape and the morning glory; the merry shouts of the Mexican vaqueros, mingled with the wild dashing of the river down the cañon on our right; the free exercise of every muscle; the consciousness of exemption from all further restraints of office, were absolutely inspiring. I think a lyrical poem would not have exceeded my powers on that occasion. Every faculty seemed invigorated to the highest pitch of perfection. Hang the dignity of office! A murrain upon party politicians and inspector-generals! To the bottomless pit with all vouchers, abstracts, and accounts current! I scorn that meagre and brainless style of the heads of the Executive Departments, "Sir,—Your services are no longer—" What dunce could not write a more copious letter than that? Who would be a slave when all nature calls upon him in trumpet-tones to be free? Who would sell his birth-right for a mess of pottage, when he could lead the life of an honest miner—earn his bread by the sweat of his brow—breathe the fresh air of heaven without stint or limit? And of all miners in the world, who would not be a Washoe miner? Beyond question this was a condition of mind to be envied and admired; and, notwithstanding the two pair of heavy blankets on my back, and a stiff pair of boots on my feet that gall-ed my ankles most grievously, I really felt lighter and brighter than for years past. Nor did it seem surprising to me then that so many restless men should abandon the haunts of civilization and seek variety and freedom in the wilderness of rugged mountains comprising the mining districts of the Sierra Nevada. The life of the miner is one of labor, peril, and exposure; but it possesses the fascinating element of liberty, and the promise of unlimited reward. In the midst of privations amounting, at times, to the verge of starvation, what glowing visions fill the mind of the toiling adventurer! Richer in anticipation than the richest of his fellow-beings, he builds golden palaces, and scatters them over the world with a princely hand. He may not be a man of imagination; but in the secret depths of his soul there is a latent hope that some day or other he will strike a "lead," and who knows but it may be a solid mountain of gold, spangled with diamonds?

The road from Placerville to Strawberry Flat is for the most part graded, and no doubt is a very good road in summer; but it would be a violation of conscience to recommend it in the month of April. The melting of the accumulated snows of the past winter had partially washed it away, and what remained was deeply furrowed by the innumerable streams that sought an outlet in the ravines. In many places it seemed absolutely impracticable for wheeled vehicles; but it is an article of faith with California teamsters that wherever a horse can go a wagon can follow. There were some exceptions to this rule, however, for the road was literally lined with broken-down stages, wagons, and carts, presenting every variety of aspect, from the general smash-up to the ordinary capsize. Wheels had taken rectangular cuts to the bottom; broken tongues projected from the mud; loads of dry-goods and whisky-barrels lay wallowing in the general wreck of matter; stout beams cut from the roadside were scattered here and there, having served in vain efforts to extricate the wagons from the oozy mire. Occasionally these patches of bad road extended for miles, and here the scenes were stirring in the highest degree. Whole trains of pack-mules struggled frantically to make the transit from one dry point to another; "burros," heavily laden, were frequently buried up to the neck, and had to be hauled out by main force. Now and then an enterprising mule would emerge from the mud, and, by attempting to keep the edge of the road, lose his foothold, and go rolling to the bottom of the cañon, pack and all. Amidst the confusion worse confounded the cries and maledictions of the vaqueros were perfectly overwhelming; but when the mules stuck fast in the mud, and it became necessary to unpack them, then it was that the vaqueros shone out most luminously. They shouted, swore, beat the mules, kicked them, pulled them, pushed them, swore again; and when all these resources failed, tore their hair and resorted to prayer and meditation. Above is a faint attempt at the vaquero sliding-scale.

It will doubtless be a consolation to some of these unhappy vaqueros to know that such of their mules as they failed to extricate from the mud during the winter, may, during the approaching summer, find their way out through the cracks. Should any future traveler be overtaken by thirst, and see a pair of ears growing out of the road, he will be safe in digging there, for underneath stands a mule, and on the back of that mule is a barrel of whisky.

Owing to repeated stoppages on the way, night overtook us at a place called "Dirty Mike's." Here we found a ruinously dilapidated frame shanty, the bar, of course, being the main feature. Next to the bar was the public bedroom, in which there was every accommodation except beds, bedding, chairs, tables, and wash-stands; that is to say, there was a piece of looking-glass nailed against the window-frame, and the general comb and tooth-brush hanging by strings from a neighboring post.

A very good supper of pork and beans, fried potatoes, and coffee, was served up for us on very dirty plates, by Mike's cook; and after doing it ample justice, we turned in on our blankets and slept soundly till morning. It was much in favor of our landlord that he charged us only double the customary price. I would cheerfully give him a recommendation if he would only wash his face and his plates once or twice a week.

The ascent of the mountains is gradual and continuous the entire distance to Strawberry. After the first day's journey there is but little variety in the scenery. On the right, a fork of the American River plunges down through a winding cañon, its force and volume augmented at short intervals by numerous smaller streams that cross the road, and by others from the opposite side. Thick forests of pine loom up on each side, their tops obscuring the sky. A few patches of snow lay along our route on the first day, but on the second snow was visible on both sides of the cañon.

The succession of scenes along the road afforded us constant entertainment. In every gulch and ravine a tavern was in process of erection. Scarcely a foot of ground upon which man or beast could find a foothold was exempt from a claim. There were even bars with liquors, offering a tempting place of refreshment to the weary traveler where no vestige of a house was yet perceptible. Board and lodging signs over tents not more than ten feet square were as common as blackberries in June; and on no part of the road was there the least chance of suffering from the want of whisky, dry-goods, or cigars.

An almost continuous string of Washoeites stretched "like a great snake dragging its slow length along" as far as the eye could reach. In the course of this day's tramp we passed parties of every description and color: Irishmen, wheeling their blankets, provisions, and mining implements on wheelbarrows; American, French, and German foot-passengers, leading heavily-laden horses, or carrying their packs on their backs, and their picks and shovels slung across their shoulders; Mexicans, driving long trains of pack-mules, and swearing fearfully, as usual, to keep them in order; dapper-looking gentlemen, apparently from San Francisco, mounted on fancy horses; women, in men's clothes, mounted on mules or "burros;" Pike County specimens, seated on piles of furniture and goods in great, lumbering wagons; whisky-peddlers, with their bar-fixtures and whisky on mule-back, stopping now and then to quench the thirst of the toiling multitude; organ-grinders, carrying their organs; drovers, riding, raving, and tearing away frantically through the brush after droves of self-willed cattle designed for the shambles; in short, every imaginable class, and every possible species of industry, was represented in this moving pageant. It was a striking and impressive spectacle to see, in full competition with youth and strength, the most pitiable specimens of age and decay—white-haired old men, gasping for breath as they dragged their palsied limbs after them in the exciting race of avarice; cripples and hunchbacks; even sick men from their beds—all stark mad for silver.

But the tide was not setting entirely in the direction of Carson Valley. A counter-current opposed our progress, in the shape of saddle-trains without riders, long lines of pack-mules laden with silver ore, scattering parties of weather-beaten and foot-sore pedestrians, bearing their hard experience in their faces, and solitary stragglers, of all ages and degrees, mounted on skeleton horses, or toiling wearily homeward on foot—some merry, some sad, some eagerly intent on further speculation; but all bearing the unmistakable impress of Washoe.

Among the latter, a lank, leathery-looking fellow, doubtless from the land of wooden nutmegs, was shambling along through the mud, talking to himself apparently for want of more congenial fellowship. I was about to pass him, when he arrested my attention:

"Look here, stranger!"

I looked.

"You're bound for Washoe, I reckon?"

I was bound for Washoe.

"What line of business be you goin' into there?"

Was not quite certain, but thought it would be the Agency line.

"Ho! the Agency line—stage agent may be? Burche's line, I guess?"

That was not it exactly; but no matter. Perhaps I could do something for him in Washoe.

"Nothing, stranger, except to keep dark. Do you know the price of grindstones in Placerville?"

I didn't know the price of grindstones in Placerville, but supposed they might be cheap, as there were plenty there.

"That's my hand exactly!" said my friend, with an inward chuckle of satisfaction. I expressed some curiosity to know in what respect the matter of grindstones suited his hand so well; when looking cautiously around, he drew near, and informed me confidentially that he had struck a "good thing" in Washoe. He had only been there a month, and had made a considerable pile. There was a dreadful scarcity of grindstones there, and, seeing that miners, carpenters, and mechanics of all sorts were hard up for something to sharpen their tools on, he had secured the only grindstone that could be had, which was pretty well used up when he got it. But he rigged it up ship-shape and Bristol-fashion, and set up a grinding business, which brought him in from twenty to thirty dollars a day, till nothing was left of the stone. Now he was bound to Placerville in search of a good one, with which he intended to return immediately. I wished him luck and proceeded on my way, wondering what would turn up next.

It was not long before I was stopped by another enterprising personage; but this was altogether a different style of man. There was something brisk and spruce in his appearance, in spite of a shirt far gone in rags and a shock of hair that had long been a stranger to the scissors. What region of country he came from it was impossible to say. I think he was a cosmopolite, and belonged to the world generally.

"Say, Colonel!"—this was his style of address—"on the way to Washoe?"

"Yes."

"Excuse me: I have a little list of claims here, Colonel, which I would like to show you;" and he pulled from his shirt-pocket a greasy package of papers, which he dexterously unfolded. "Guess you're from San Francisco Colonel? Here is—let me see—

200 feet in the Pine Nut,
300 feet in the Grizzly Ledge,
150 feet in the Gouge Eye,
125 feet in the Wild-Cat,
100 feet in the Root-Hog-or-Die
50 feet in the Bobtail Horse,
25 feet in the Hell Roaring; and many others, Colonel, in the best leads. Now the fact is, d'ye see, I'm a little hard up, and want to make a raise. I'll sell all, or a part, at a considerable sacrifice for a small amount of ready cash."

"How much do you want?"

"Why, if I could raise twenty dollars or so it would answer my present purpose; I'll sell you twenty feet in any of these claims for that amount. Every foot of them is worth a thousand dollars; but d'ye see, they're not yet developed."

Circumstances forced me to decline this offer, much to the disgust of the enterprising speculator in claims, who assured me I might go farther and fare worse; but somehow the names did not strike me as attractive in a mineral point of view.

I had by this time lost the run of all my comrades, and was obliged to pursue my journey alone. Three had gone ahead, and the other was nearly used up. The day had opened fairly, but now there were indications of bad weather. It was quite dark when I reached a small shanty about four miles from Strawberry. Here I halted till my remaining comrade came up. The proprietor of the shanty was going into the tavern business, and was engaged in building a large clap-board house. His men were all at supper, and in reply to our application for lodgings, he told us we might sleep in the calf-pen if we liked, but there was no room in the house. He could give us something to eat after his workmen were done supper, but not before. He had brandy and gin, but no tea to spare. On the whole, he thought we had better go on to Strawberry.

Now this was encouraging. It was already pattering down rain, and the calf-pen to which he directed us was knee-deep in mud and manure, without roof or shelter of any kind. Even the unfortunate progeny of the old cow, which ran bellowing around the fence, in motherly solicitude for her offspring, shivered with cold, and made piteous appeals to this hard-hearted man. I finally bribed him by means of a gold dollar to let us have a small piece of bread and a few swallows of tea. Thus refreshed, we resumed our journey.

Four miles more of slush and snow; up hill nearly all the way, across rickety bridges, over roaring cataracts, slippery rocks, stumps, and brush, through acres of black oozy mire; and so dark a bat could scarcely recognize his own father!

It was a walk to be remembered. The man in the shanty, if he possess a spark of humanity, will, I trust, feel bitterly mortified when he reads this article. He caused me some gloomy reflections upon human nature, which have been a constant source of repentance ever since. But consider the provocation. The rain poured down heavily, mingled with a cutting sleet; a doleful wind came moaning through the pines; our blankets were wet through, and not a stitch upon our backs left dry; even my spare shirt was soaking the strength out of the plug of tobacco so carefully stowed away in its folds, and my paints were giving it what aid they could in the way of color.

Well, there is an end to all misery upon earth, and so there was to this day's walk. A light at length glimmered through the pines, first faint and flickering, then a full blaze, then half a dozen brilliant lights, which proved to be camp fires under the trees, and soon we stood in front of a large and substantial log-house. This was the famous "Strawberry," known throughout the length and breadth of the land as the best stopping-place on the route to Washoe, and the last station before crossing the summit of the Sierra Nevada. The winter road for wheel-vehicles here ended; and indeed it may be said to have ended some distance below, for the last twelve miles of the road seemed utterly impracticable for wagons. At least, most of those I saw were fast in the mud, and likely to remain there till the beginning of summer. Dark and rainy as it was, there were crowds scattered around the house, as if they had some secret and positive enjoyment in the contemplation of the weather. Edging our way through, we found the bar-room packed as closely as it could be without bursting out some of the walls; and of all the motley gangs that ever happened together within a space of twenty feet, this certainly was the most extraordinary and the most motley. Dilapidated gentlemen with slouched hats and big boots, Jew peddlers dripping wet, red-shirted miners, teamsters, vaqueros, packers, and traders, swearing horribly at nothing; some drinking at the bar, some warming themselves before a tremendous log-fire that sent up a reeking steam from the conglomerated mass of wet and muddy clothes—to say nothing of the boots and socks that lay simmering near the coals. A few bare and sore footed outcasts crouched down in the corners, trying to catch a nap, and here and there a returned Washoeite, describing in graphic language, garnished with oaths, the wonders and beauties of Virginia City. But chiefly remarkable in the crowd was the regiment of light infantry, pressed in double file against the dining-room door, awaiting the fourth or fifth charge at the table.

At the first tinkle of the bell the door was burst open with a tremendous crash, and for a moment no battle-scene in Waterloo, no charge at Resaca de la Palma or the heights of Chapultepec, no Crimean avalanche of troops dealing death and destruction around them, could have equaled the terrific onslaught of the gallant troops of Strawberry. The whole house actually tottered and trembled at the concussion, as if shaken by an earthquake. Long before the main body had assaulted the table the din of arms was heard above the general uproar; the deafening clatter of plates, knives, and forks, and the dreadful battle-cry of "Waiter! Waiter! Pork and beans! Coffee, waiter! Beefsteak! Sausages! Potatoes! Ham and eggs—quick, waiter, for God's sake!" It was a scene of destruction and carnage long to be remembered. I had never before witnessed a battle, but I now understood how men could become maddened by the smell of blood. When the table was vacated it presented a shocking scene of desolation. Whole dishes were swept of their contents; coffee-pots were discharged to the dregs; knives, forks, plates, and spoons lay in a confused mass among the bones and mutilated remnants of the dead; chunks of bread and hot biscuit were scattered broadcast, and mince-pies were gored into fragments; tea-cups and saucers were capsized; and the waiters, hot, red, and steamy, were panting and swearing after their superhuman labors.

Half an hour more and the battle-field was again cleared for action. This was the sixth assault committed during the evening; but it was none the less terrible on that account. Inspired by hunger, I joined the army of invaders this time, and by gigantic efforts of strength maintained an honorable position in the ranks. As the bell sounded—we broke! I fixed my eye on a chair, rushed through the struggling mass, threw out my hands frantically to seize it; but alas! it was already captured. A dark-visaged man, who looked as if he carried concealed weapons on his person, was seated in it, shouting hoarsely the battle-cry of "Pork and beans! Waiter! Coffee, waiter!" Up and down the table it was one gulping mass, jaws distended, arms stretched out, knives, forks, and even the bare hands plunged into the enemy. Not a spot was vacant. I venture to assert that from the commencement of the assault till the capture and complete investment of the fortifications did not exceed five seconds. The storming of the Malakoff and the fall of Sebastopol could no longer claim a place in history.

At length fortune favored the brave. I got a seat at the next onslaught, and took ample satisfaction for the delay by devouring such a meal as none but a hardy Washoeite could be expected to digest. Pork and beans, cabbage, beef-steak, sausages, pies, tarts, coffee and tea, eggs, etc.—these were only a few of the luxuries furnished by the enterprising proprietor of the "Strawberry." May every blessing attend that great benefactor of mankind! I say it in all sincerity, he is a great and good man, a Websterian inn-keeper, for he thoroughly understands the constitution. I would give honorable mention to his name if I knew it: but it matters not; his house so far surpasses the Metropolitan or the St. Nicholas that there is no comparison in the relish with which the food is devoured. In respect to sleeping accommodations there may be some difference in their favor. I was too late to secure a bed in the general bedroom up stairs, where two hundred and fifty tired wayfarers were already snoring in double-shot bunk, 2×6; but the landlord was a man of inexhaustible resources. A private whisper in his ear made him a friend forever. He nodded sagaciously and led me into a small parlor, about 15×20, in which he gave my company of five what he called a "lay-out," that is to say, a lay-out on the floor with our own blankets for beds and covering. This was a special favor, and I would have cherished it in my memory for years had not a suspicion been aroused in my mind before the lapse of half an hour that there were others in the confidence of mine host. Scarcely had I entered upon the first nap when somebody undertook to walk upon me, commencing on my head and ending on the pit of my stomach. I grasped him firmly by the leg. He apologized at once in the most abject manner; and well for him he did, for it was enough to incense any man to be suddenly roused up in that manner. The intruder, I discovered, was a Jew peddler. He offered me a cigar, which I smoked in token of amity; and in the mean time he turned in alongside and smoked another. When daylight broke I cast around me to see what every body was doing to create such a general commotion. I perceived that there were about forty sleepers, all getting up. Boots, strongly scented with feet and stockings of every possible degree of odor, were lying loose in all directions; blankets, packs, old clothes, and ragged shirts, and I don't know what all—a palpable violation of the landlord's implied compact. True, he had not agreed to furnish a single bed for five, but he never hinted that he was going to put forty men, of all sorts and sizes, in the same general "lay-out," as he was pleased to style it, and that only large enough for half the number. Once, in Minnesota, I slept in a bed with eight, and gave considerable offense to my landlord when I remonstrated against his putting in a ninth. He said he liked to see a man "accommodating"—a reflection upon my good-nature which I considered wholly unwarranted by the circumstances. But this was even a stronger case.

The Jew-peddler had not undressed, and, not to judge him harshly, I don't think he ever did undress. He was soon up, and left, as I suppose, while I was dressing. With him departed my stockings. They were not very fine—perhaps, considering the muddy road, not very clean; but they were all I had, and were valuable beyond gold or silver in this foot-weary land. I never saw them more. What aggravated the offense, when I came to review it seriously, was, that I remembered having seen him draw just such a pair over his boots, as a protection against the snow, without the remotest suspicion of the great wrong he was doing me.

We shall meet this Stocking-Thief again.

THE STOCKING-THIEF.

VOL. XXII.—No. 127.—B

IN the voyage up the Hudson, or in the traverse of the winding ways along the eastern margin of that beautiful river, the curiosity and interest of the traveler are continually diverted from the marvelous natural attractions of the region by glimpses, ever and anon, of a scarcely less wonderful display of human art and enterprise. Leaving the busy metropolis and journeying northward, the route, through forty long miles, even to the verge of the far-off Highlands, falls into the shadow of a seemingly endless architecture, the magnificent proportions and massive strength of which bear back the memory to dreams of the real or fabled achievements of the giant days gone by. The ponderous masonry of this great structure, unparalleled in our own young land, and scarcely surpassed by the skill and toil of any age or clime, is in some guise ever present, barring the passage like the huge walls of some impregnable fortress, or stealing through the rocky heart of an obstructing hill, or, with vast mien and lofty form, striding across wide valleys, stepping here with reliant tread over the intervening brook, or marching in marble pomp high above the floods of rolling rivers.

In reply to the eager asking of the stranger, "Whence, and for what end, this grand display of thought and will—this lavish outpouring of patient toil and costly treasure?" the proud citizen—and proud he well may be—will tell the wonderful story of the Croton, and the daring way in which its little pebbled waters are led from their laughing forest shades, through the hills and over the vales, mile after mile, to bear life and health and happiness to the million-lipped city by the sea. He will tell how the vast conception arose, and how it grew—the genius and courage and liberality with which it was undertaken and achieved—and the incalculable good it has done, is doing, and no doubt ever will do. Thus may he rehearse the history, though not perchance in these precise words.

The assurance of an ample supply of so great an element of life and comfort as pure and pleasant water, was, of course, a matter of anxious concern to the good folk of the growing city of Manhattan at a very early day. Even so long ago as the year 1774, a consideration of the subject resulted in the erection of a large reservoir in the lower part of Broadway, supplied from wells in the vicinage. Twenty-four years afterward the question was again agitated, and upon a bolder and broader "platform" than that of the ante-revolutionary epoch; when, in 1798, Dr. Joseph Brown daringly advised the use of the waters of the Bronx—that picturesque little river of the adjoining county of Westchester, now followed so pleasantly by the line of the Harlem Railway, and dotted so thickly with the villas and villages of our metropolitan suburbs. Dr. Joseph's project was talked over for a quarter of a century, and during that period lost so much of its fabulous aspect that, about the year 1824, Mr. Canvas White, the engineer to whom the city authorities had intrusted the business, made a survey of the proposed Aqueduct, and formally advised its construction at a cost of one and a half million of dollars. A company was chartered for this purpose, though with no success; and the people were yet left to the tender mercies of the venerable town pump. Though thus consigned, it was not by any means willingly, and the demand for water, pure and plentiful, swelled every year in volume with the swelling numbers of the population. The days of pumps and wells were past; and all the world saw clearly that nothing less than rivers—rivers full and free—would slake the present, far less the prospective thirst of the expanding city. Various were the plans proposed, and many the sources advised. One party would have invited the Passaic to step over eighteen miles or so from the neighboring State of New Jersey, only that neither a bridge over the Hudson nor pipes beneath it seemed exactly practicable. Another committee insisted upon erecting a dam across the great river, and thus separating the waters, salt and fresh, leave the latter free to be pumped up at such cost and labor as might be. It is hardly needful to chronicle the hundred obvious objections which crushed this fine idea. The favorite recourse was still the waters of the Bronx or of the Saw-Mill rivers; and ways and means of exploiting one or both of those streams continued to be cogitated until it became evident that the needs of the town had, while talking, outgrown the capacity even of this means of supply. In the midst of the dilemma in which this new discovery involved the good people, there came the terrible ravages of the cholera in the year 1832, showing more imperatively than ever that the hour had arrived at length to put theory into practice—to act, and not to talk only. At this very critical moment a far-seeing eye ventured to look beyond the shores of the Bronx and the Neperhan, even to those far-off spurs of the Highland range whence flow the crystal sources of the CROTON. This happy glimpse at once, and finally, settled the vexed and perplexing question as to whence and how New York should be provided with its much needed water; and thenceforward the mountain river became immortal, and its name grew into a household word for evermore.

When it was at last definitely determined to employ the waters of the Croton for the proposed city supplies, there came the question as to the character and cost of the means of conveyance—an important question, which, when afterward submitted by the Legislature to the will of the people of the city of New York, was answered by a hearty approval of the plan realized in the superb and costly structure now famous as the Croton Aqueduct.

The Commissioners previously appointed by the Legislature were instructed by the city authorities, in May, 1835, to proceed with their work. Thus authorized, and the required surveys having been made, the construction of the great aqueduct was begun in May, 1837; on the 22d of June, 1842, the water was admitted through the line of the work from the Fountain Reservoir; by the 27th of the month it had been permitted to traverse the entire length of the structure to the Receiving Reservoir, now within the domains of the Central Park; and on the 4th of July it entered the massive Distributing Reservoir in the Fifth Avenue—thus ending its grand journey of nearly forty miles, made at the munificent outlay of twelve millions of dollars, amidst the streaming of banners, the firing of cannon, the ringing of bells, and a thousand and one other manifestations of the public pride and pleasure.

On the 14th day of October, of the same year, the completion of the aqueduct, and the introduction of the mountain streams to the homes of the people, was formally commemorated with great state and pomp. Never had the city seen so joyous a fête day. Gorgeous processions, bearing the ensignia of all trades and professions, and accompanied by bands of stirring music, paraded the thronged streets, and the glad welcome of hosts of citizens and strangers seemed to be merrily answered by the bright waters, at rest in the great reservoirs or dancing in the sunshine of the public and private fountains.

The waters of the Croton come from a chain of lakelets near the Hudson River Highlands, fifty miles above the city of New York. The region in which these supplies of the Croton are found, and that traversed by the river, is of the rude mountain character, ever indicative of pure and pearly springs and streams. The Croton is itself, in its native hills, so translucent that the Indians were wont to call it by a name signifying "clear water." It flows over a bed of gravel and broken rock, and through shades of cooling verdure.

In the construction of the aqueduct a dam was built at a point on the river some six miles above its entrance into the Hudson, at the head of the Tappan Bay, which throws back the water some six miles, over an area of four hundred acres, forming the beautiful pond, in the lap of picturesque hills, called the Fountain Reservoir, or the Croton Lake. The surface of this reservoir is  $166\frac{1}{2}$  feet above the level of mean tide at the city of New York, and  $47\frac{1}{2}$  feet above the surface of the Receiving Reservoir in the Central Park, in New York—a distance of thirty-eight miles. In the Distributing Reservoir, by the Fifth Avenue, two miles yet below, the water is 115 feet above the level of mean tide, which is the height to which it may be made available in the city.

The medium flow of the water at the point of the Lake or Fountain Reservoir exceeds fifty millions of gallons in twenty-four hours, and the minimum flow, after protracted drought, is some twenty-seven millions. The available capacity of this reservoir is estimated at six hundred millions of gallons, which, added to the one hundred and fifty millions contained in the Receiving Reservoir, and the twenty millions more in the Distributing Reservoir in the city, furnish a supply of seven hundred and seventy millions of gallons, independent of the daily accession of fifty millions of gallons from the river—a supply ample enough for the wants of the present population of New York through the longest probable period of drought. Should the growth of the city require yet greater supplies, they may be readily obtained by the aid of more or of larger reservoirs.

Of the various kinds of channel-way to conduct the water suggested to the Commissioners that of the close conduit of masonry was chosen as the best protection against impurities, evaporation, and variations of temperature, and also on account of its greater security and durability generally. The foundations of this channel-way are in simple earth excavations, formed with concrete; the side walls are made of stone; the bottom and sides of the interior are faced with brick of extraordinary hardness and endurance, and the top is covered with an arch of brick. The departures from this order in the form of the work, and in the style of masonry, adopted under the several varying conditions of cutting in earth and of tunneling in open or in solid rock, as also the character of the banks and walls which bear the aqueduct across valleys and low grounds, may be readily seen in our sectional views representing the character of the construction.

The height of the interior of the aqueduct (with slight variations in parts) is 8 feet  $5\frac{1}{2}$  inches, and the greatest width 7 feet 5 inches; giving a sectional area of the interior of 5334 square feet. The general depth of the water in the aqueduct is 4 feet, and the velocity of the current about one mile and a half per hour. The quantity of water which may be conveyed is estimated at sixty millions of gallons every twenty-four hours.

Waste-weirs for the discharge of surplus water are constructed at suitable places along the whole line of the aqueduct. They are placed in such a manner as to allow the water to run off where it rises above a given level; and the channel at such places may be so closed by means of stop-planks, as to discharge the whole of the water in certain sections, while it is still flowing through other parts: thus affording opportunities for inspection and repairs.

The curious little towers which occupy such conspicuous positions along the top of the Aqueduct, and which so strongly arrest the notice of the tourist, are hollow cylinders of stone, some fourteen feet in height, erected for purposes of ventilation. They are placed at intervals of a mile, every third one having a door, which affords entrance to the work. The entrance ventilators, or those with doors, have an interior diameter of four feet; the others measure within only two feet. All diminish toward the top, and are crowned with iron gratings, so that nothing may be thrown into them.

In addition to the ventilators there are openings two feet square in the top of the roofing arch, at intervals of a quarter of a mile. These openings are covered with flag-stones, and their places are marked by little stone monuments.

Culverts, or simple stone arches, for the passage of small streams and brooklets, frequently occur in the course of the Aqueduct. The foundation of these works is a bed of concrete, upon which an inverted arch of cut stone is laid, forming the bottom of the stream; side walls are then erected, and are surmounted by another arch in reverse position from the first. The width of these arches varies—according to the extent of the water crossed—from one and a half feet span to twenty-five feet. Great skill has been displayed in the construction of these portions of the masonry, and in the varying adjuncts, according to need, of accompanying buttresses, wing walls, and parapets. Of the architecture of the bridges and of the reservoirs—those grander and more costly portions of the Aqueduct—we shall speak as we follow the line of the work, seriatim, from its mountain beginning at the Croton Lake to its ending in the great metropolis.

The engineering and the architectural mar-vels of the Croton, and the emotions of surprise and pleasure which they can not fail to awaken in the least intelligent mind, are by no means lessened by the wonderful natural beauties of the country through which the work, in its entire extent, happens to pass. What more need be said of the landscape of our Aqueduct than that it is the landscape of the far-famed Hudson, and that, too, in its most attractive features? That the Croton gathers its strength amidst the hills of the beautiful river, and in all its artificial journey to the city follows its course, and passes through nearly all the towns and villages which here line its banks? A more delightful or a more picturesque itinerary could scarcely be found in all the world than a stroll along the top of the Aqueduct, if the "Croton Board" would permit such strolling, up or down, to or from the city, through all the journey of the famous forty miles. What peeps into the mysteries of merry or of moody brooks! What panoramas of far-spreading valleys, alive with village and town and of cottage home; and what marvelous glimpses of the blue Hudson, with its gleaming sails and its verdant hill-slopes! What poetic associations, also, would not the ramble awaken as the way led through the sunny land of Irving, past the quaint little cottage where the beloved author lived and died, by the sacred tomb in which he rests from his toils, and amidst all the haunts immortalized by his genius; or, yet above, entering the region of Cooper's inspiration, and of the scenes of some of his best imaginings—these delights in addition to a hundred stirring historic scenes, and as many tales of revolutionary romance!

Let us—starting from the hills downward—venture upon such a ramble as we have thus suggested. It might be a summer's occupation, and a pleasant one, to explore the glens and lakes whence come the waters of the Croton; and not a little consoling, when called to bid them adieu, to remember that, even in the far-off city, we may still drink from these pure and inspiring fountains. Taking our way down the Croton River, we come, at a distance of six miles from its entrance into the Hudson, to the great dam which forms the pretty Croton Lake, or the Fountain Reservoir of our Aqueduct. Of the attractive natural features of this neighborhood we have already briefly spoken: these are by no means lessened by the art embellishment they have gained in the necessary structures of the Aqueduct—as the great dam itself; the guard-gates and the regulating gates, with all their massive machinery; the pleasant paths, and the air of culture which the incident occupation has imparted to the before rough landscape. During the construction of this portion of the work there came a terrible rain, which flooded the region round and lifted the waters of the usually peaceful river to such an undreamed-of height as to overtop the masonry at that time built for their guard—the fearful result of which was the destruction of the dam and the devastation of the surrounding country by its loosened waters. Houses and mills were borne away by the flood, and three lives were sacrificed to its fury. This disaster happened on the 8th of January, 1841, when the rain poured down furiously for forty-eight hours, and upon a bed of melting snow of a foot and a half in depth.

Near the centre of the Dam or Fountain Reservoir is a modern bridge, which occupies the precise position of the "Pine's Bridge" of Revolutionary story. How little did the patriots of that forlorn period, when pursuing their watchful way through the then wilderness, dream of the wonderful transformation in the scene which so brief a time was destined to make! Wandering hereabouts one may, in fancy, conjure up the shadowy form of Harvey Birch bending beneath his heavy pack and his load of state stratagems; for here it was that that famous man of fiction—the mysterious hero of Cooper's "Tale of the Neutral Ground"—wandered and schemed. How often may he have watched the moonbeams kiss the ripples of the solitary Croton, looking down from the height of the old historic bridge!

Starting from the wide reservoir of the Dam, our Aqueduct, as if not unwilling at once to show its metal, plunges headway into the rocky hills, which it explores for a distance of two hundred feet, on its way to the Gate-chamber. Leaving the Gate-chamber, the work continues on the left or lower bank of the Croton to within half a mile of the Hudson—at which point it turns southward in a line parallel with that river, and soon enters the village of Sing Sing. Thus far it has achieved eight miles of its long journey toward the metropolis, and within that short distance has groped its dark way through four tunnels of varying extent, traversed, on lofty walls, various valleys, and overstepped sundry brooks and ravines.

Amidst the extremely rugged topography of Sing Sing there was ample room and need for the engineers of the Croton to show their boldness and skill. And well did they acquit themselves, for here are found some of the most important and successful portions of their work—seen in the huge bridges above the village street, and the ravine of the Sing Sing Kill. The structure over the kill has an elliptical arch of 88 feet span, the under side of which is 70 feet above the bottom of the ravine. It is built of granite upon rock foundations of giant size and strength.

From the bridge over the Sing Sing Brook the Aqueduct pursues its steady way, side by side with the Hudson, reaching, after the passage of a mile, the domain of the celebrated State Prison. In this vicinage it passes through a tunnel, partly in rock and partly in earth, of 416 feet. Yet a little way further and it advances through another tunnel, in earth, of 375 feet in length; and still beyond (now at a distance of nine miles and a half from the Dam) it traverses Hale's Brook tunnel, 260 feet long. On goes the work, still over valleys and streams and highways, until it reaches, after a journey of thirteen miles, the classic and historic waters of Mill Brook, in the glens of Sleepy Hollow, near the village of Tarrytown.

The towering walls of the Aqueduct at this point present quite an imposing aspect in their lofty reach of 87 feet above the depression of the valley. The bridge or culvert through which the stream below passes is 25 feet wide and 172 feet in length. The country around has rare natural attractions, and from the summit of the Aqueduct wide and wonderful sweeps of the Hudson and its varied shores may be seen. The great Tappan Bay, which has been before us in all our journey, comes into the picture with increased beauty, now that we are about to leave it for the narrower passages of the river by the walls of the Palisades.

Indications of nearer approach to the metropolis of our destination are multiplied every where, on land and water. The sails thicken, the villages grow nearer together, and the picturesque towers and cupolas of the suburban chateaus spring up in every direction, in number like the forest trees.

The Mill Brook, where we now halt, is the romantic Pocantico, immortalized in the sketches and legends of Washington Irving. Just below the site of the Aqueduct bridge stood, once upon a time, that famous causeway over which the spectral Hessian of Sleepy Hollow pursued poor Ichabod Crane. The classic valley itself is close by, and so, too, is the venerable little Dutch church, buried in the moss and lichen of historic and legendary lore. In the quiet cemetery which surrounds the reverend fane, the wizard of the spot, the genial Geoffrey himself now sleeps. Between the point of the Aqueduct passage of the brook and its entrance into the Hudson, and just below the bridge, once of Ichabod, and now of the highway, is the ancient edifice known to the history of the neighborhood as Philip's or Phillipson's Castle—a venerable Dutch homestead, with surroundings of mill and pond and dam. This antique edifice, as well as the old church near by, are still in excellent preservation and in use.

Standing upon the Aqueduct bridge at Mill River, we may look down not only upon the wonders of Sleepy Hollow, but upon the memorable spot where the British spy, Major André, was captured, while scheming with Arnold for the betrayal of his command at West Point above. This interesting locality lies within the limits of Tarrytown, and is marked by a small granite monument.

Leaving Mill Brook, the course of the Aqueduct is through the villages of Tarrytown and Irvington, past Sunnyside, late the home of Irving, to Jewell's Brook, where occurs the next very considerable architectural labor. Between this point and Mill Brook the distance passed is four and a half miles, within which half a dozen small valleys and streams are crossed by suitable embankments and culverts, and a tunnel of 246 feet, chiefly through rock, is encountered.

At Jewell's Brook the Aqueduct has achieved a distance from the lake of seventeen miles and a half. The embankment or wall which supports the work here is 50 feet high. Two culverts give passage to the road and the brook—the former having a length of 141 feet and a span of 14 feet, and the latter a span of 6 feet with a length of 148 feet.

Leaving Jewell's Brook, the Aqueduct, continuing along the banks of the Hudson, passes through Dobb's Ferry, where there is a tunnel and a valley requiring a culvert. Thence its way is through the village of Hastings, at which place a bridge conducts it over a railway used for the transportation of marble from a neighboring quarry to the Hudson. This arch has a span of sixteen feet. Its distance from the Dam is twenty-one miles.

From Hastings the route, still by the river shore, is toward Yonkers, near which village it passes through a tunnel of 684 feet, after which it crosses the Saw Mill or Neperhan River, and the road by its banks. The bridges and the bold air of the landscape at this point, together with the lakelet which is formed by a milldam below, form a very agreeable picture. The culvert under which the road passes has a span of twenty feet; and the two arches which give room for the course of the creek have each a span of twenty-five feet. The height of the wall at the Saw Mill Works is forty feet. The distance from the Dam is twenty-five miles.

At Yonkers the line of the Aqueduct at length bids a temporary good-by to the shores of the Hudson, and thenceforth, until it reaches the Island of New York, pursues its way some distance to the eastward. It does not, however, find any easier path, for soon it passes through a considerable hill, by the way of a rock tunnel 810 feet in length. Its next performance is to cross Tibbit's Brook, which it manages gallantly upon a bridge or wall of thirty feet elevation. The course of the work is thence along the south side of the brook to Harlem River, the arm of the sea, which, with the Spuyten Duyvel Creek on the west, serves to divide the city and island of New York from the main land. At the Harlem River the Croton has completed thirty-three miles of its journey, and is within seven miles of its resting-place in the Lower or Distributing Reservoir.

The distance across the Harlem valley and river is about a quarter of a mile, and the surface of the water is 120 feet below the bottom of the Aqueduct. The great bridge which carries the Croton over this broad chasm is one of the most costly and most imposing portions of the Aqueduct architecture. It is the pride of the people of New York, as it might very justly have been of the people of old Rome, those great masters of hydraulic art. One could hardly desire sweeter pictures than the varied scenery of the Harlem offers, embellished at all points with most picturesque glimpses of this noble structure; its interminable line of lofty marble piers and arches every where, from far and near, charming the eye as the tales of fairy land delight the fancy.

The elevation of the High Bridge—as the Harlem fabric is popularly named—is 150 feet, and the width across the top is 21 feet. Its length is 1460 feet. It is formed of a series of fifteen arches, eight of which, each 80 feet in width, rise from the river, and seven of lesser span from the shores. The whole work has been constructed of white marble, at a total cost of nearly a million of dollars. It may, perhaps, be a matter of some æsthetic regret that the Commissioners, while erecting a structure of such an order, did not venture upon yet further expenditure and lift the beautiful piers to a full level with the general grade of the Aqueduct. As it is, the great pipes which conduct the water across and unite the channel-way of the main land with the continuation upon the island, drop down some distance before they reach their bed on the top of the bridge, and are again lifted at the opposite extremity. The Bridge might also have furnished another connection between Manhattan Island and the main land. The additions required for this purpose are so slight, increasing rather than impairing the architectural effect, that we trust the Croton Commissioners will accede to the suggestion of many citizens, and authorize the construction of a carriage-way across the Bridge.

The formidable obstruction of the Harlem thus magnificently overcome, our Aqueduct continues its beneficent way for a short distance along the south bank of the river, passing soon over a ravine of 30 feet and through a rocky tunnel of 234 feet. Emerging from this dark passage-way it passes on over considerable ups and downs until it reaches that part of the island or city still known as Manhattan Valley; where it encounters yet another tunnel, and the longest it has braved on its entire journey, being 1215 feet through solid rock. The tunnel mastered, the valley of Manhattan waits to be crossed. The depression here of 102 feet on the surface of the island continues for nearly a mile. The Commissioners, we are told, very much desired to step over this broad sweep upon a grand arcaded bridge, but examining their pockets they unluckily missed the million of dollars which such a brilliant passage would have involved, over and above the cost of the means ultimately employed.

Instead of the tier upon tier of gleaming arches, so fascinating to the imagination, the Croton here falls from its lofty estate, and creeps quietly across the bottom of the Manhattan Valley to the higher ground beyond, in two massive pipes each a yard in diameter.

Passing Manhattan Valley, the Aqueduct encounters yet another tunnel, and the last in its course, after which it enters that part of the city called Clendinning Valley, now traversed by Ninety-eighth, Ninety-ninth, and One Hundredth streets. This valley is 1900 feet across, and some 700 feet of the distance is spanned by huge masonry, through which the city streets penetrate, beneath superb arch-ways — each street having a central arch for a carriage-way, and on each side a smaller arch for sidewalks. It was originally the intention to pass the three streets, next below, under the Aqueduct by similar arch-ways; but up to the present time this work has not been executed, or indeed demanded by the wants of the town.

From Clendinning Valley the Aqueduct soon reaches the Receiving Reservoir, located upon an elevated part of the island between Seventy-ninth and Eighty-sixth streets, and between the Sixth and the Seventh avenues. This spot is now in the heart of the domain recently purchased for a grand public pleasure-ground, and at present growing into such wonderful beauty and such popular love, under the style and title of the Central Park.

The area of the Receiving Reservoir is 1826 feet in length and 836 feet wide, covering nearly thirty-one acres, or seven of the city blocks. It is a noble sheet of water inclosed in rectangular walls of ponderous masonry. The construction, though of great scientific interest, offers but slight picturesque attraction: still, as water is always beautiful, it gratefully assists the landscape embellishments of the Park.

The embankments of the Reservoir are twenty feet thick at the top, increasing in width as they descend with a slope on both sides. The outside face is protected by a stone wall four feet thick. The Reservoir is divided into two distinct compartments, having one a depth of twenty feet, and the other of thirty feet of water. The capacity of the whole when full is one hundred and fifty million gallons. Another large Reservoir is at this time in process of construction just above the present work.

From the Receiving Reservoir two great pipes conduct the water through the city to the Distributing Reservoir on Murray Hill. The Distributing Reservoir extends from Fortieth to Forty-second Street and from the Fifth Avenue, half way west to the Sixth Avenue. This huge structure is one of the most imposing portions of the Croton architecture. Its compact and massive walls, seemingly strong and enduring as the everlasting hills, with their quaint Egyptian cornices, give to the vast edifice a very sphinx-like aspect. No citizen passes it, pass often as he may, without a vivid consciousness of its presence, and no stranger fails to ask curiously of its character and purpose.

The Reservoir is 420 feet square at the top, and 436 feet at the base. The height of the walls above the foundation is 50 feet. At the top their breadth is 17 feet, with a base of 76 feet. They are paved above and protected by an iron railing, and are used as a grand promenade, to which free access may be had at the entrance on the Fifth Avenue.

The wide view of the city which this elevated esplanade affords, with its pleasant fore-ground of cool waters, is well worth enjoying on a summer afternoon. The conflagration of the Crystal Palace, the vacant grass-grown site of which lies in the shadow below, must have been an effective spectacle seen from this point.

Besides this promenade we may make the entire tour of the edifice within and between the walls, which, for opportunities of inspection, and for economy of material, have to a certain extent been left hollow in their construction. The Aqueduct, passing from the Receiving Reservoir via the Fifth Avenue, enters the Distributing Reservoir at the base of the central pilaster on that street. It leaves it again at Fortieth Street on the lower side. It leaves it again on the south side at Fortieth Street and re-enters the Avenue, from whence it makes its intricate way, north, east, south, and west to all parts of the town. The pipes which convey it are laid as nearly as possible under the middle of the streets, and of this iron conduit not less than two hundred and sixty-six miles are now in use. From the central channel-way in the streets the water finds its way readily into the houses right and left, where, from cellar to attic, it is at all seasons and at all hours instantly obedient to call. It needs but to turn the faucet when, presto! its sparkling drops rush forth in inexhaustible supplies. So willing, indeed, are the merry waters, and so much of their old mountain mischief do they still preserve, that without a care they may pay you a melancholy prank or two, and, escaping through an unguarded vent, may disport themselves over your carpeted floors as among their native rocks and sands. Not infrequently does the careless housekeeper find her apartments deluged and her furniture spoiled, through the bursting of a pipe amidst winter frosts or by thoughtless neglect to turn a faucet.

Besides the exquisite physical pleasures which the Croton brings us in unstinted libation and ablution, it offers dainty æsthetic delights as it fills our fountains and sends its silver drops in myriad shapes high into the blue air. To be sure no gorgeous sculptures of marble and bronze as yet assist this graceful art-aspect of the waters; no forms of naiad or siren add beauty to the scene, as in other and older lands; but time and money will bring all Olympus down ere long, and in the interim the playful floods soar up in volume and height unrivaled. They sing daily, in the sunshine of our gardens and parks, sweetest songs to the rudest ear that chances to pass within the sound of their gentle voice.

It is pleasant to talk of the thousand conveniences and comforts of our Croton, and, in our habitual and easy enjoyment of them, small enough is our appreciation; but the worth of the generous water is not to be merely measured by the luxury it affords. This is great enough for all praise; but we must thank it for the larger and graver blessings it brings in the protection of our homes from the destroying flames, and of our lives from the poisoned airs of uncleanly streets.

We have not the statistics at command, even if they exist, to exhibit the extent of the reduction in the losses in our metropolis by fires since the introduction of the waters of the Croton has supplied such ready and abundant means for their prompt subjugation, or of the decrease.

through the same agency, in our yearly bills of mortality; but the figures under both columns would unquestionably be incalculable. We may almost seriously employ the hyperbole of our wild Western character, and say that our fires yield at discretion when our conquering Croton but shows its head, as did the coon of fable in the hopeless presence of Captain Scott's infallible rifle. We must not speak jestingly of disease and death, but we may reasonably wonder in what degree their ravages have been restrained through the universal facilities for cleanliness, personal and municipal, which the Croton so liberally provides.

During the summer of the past year (1859) a report spread through the city that the Croton had by some cause grown impure, and the fear became epidemic among the people. Nothing was considered for the time but the alarming strangeness which every body perceived in the taste of the water. The important subject was at once inquired into, and happily explained, upon high chemical authority, by the fact of the sudden appearance, on the surface of the Reservoir at the head of the Aqueduct, of certain minute aquatic vegetation, quite harmless in its character. The plant, it appears, grew at the bottom of the lake, and had now, for the first time, come to the surface. When it was removed the water soon regained its normal condition, and all was happy once more.

Inscribed upon tablets set in the walls of the chief structures of the Aqueduct are the names of the engineers and others to whose skill and energy we are in so high a degree indebted for the successful execution of the great work. It is proper that we should here perpetuate the honorable record, with grateful acknowledgments to John B. Jervis, the engineer-in-chief, under whose direction the whole fabric was erected, and to his able assistants, Horatio Allen and Edmund French; to Major D. B. Douglas, of the United States corps of engineers, for his thorough preliminary surveys and preparations; to Myndert Van Schaick, for his early efforts in promoting the scheme, his service in bringing it so successfully before the State Senate, of which he was at the time a member, and for his later long and efficient administration of the affairs of the Aqueduct Department; to the Commissioners, Messrs. Allen, Fox, Dusenberry, Alley, Woodruff, Stevens, Ring, Ward, Birdsall, and Childs; to the contractors, and even to the humble laborers: for to have turned a spade only in the execution of such a work is a distinction to be remembered.

The people of New York will, we are persuaded, welcome this brief history of an enterprise which, in its conception and execution, has done them so much honor; and all our readers will be interested in the story as that of a work of modern art, which, if it does not in all points rival the famous performances of the same kind in ancient days, is at least not like very many of those proud structures, the fruit of unwilling toil obeying the behests of a despotic will, but a free and glad offering of an enlightened and generous popular patriotism.

As the record shows, the work has absorbed immense stores of treasure, but never have we heard any citizen lamenting the great expenditure, nor shall we, even should the promise it makes of ultimate repayal of both the interest and the principal of the cost, and the creation of a handsome revenue besides, never be fulfilled. Thus far the annual income of the Aqueduct, collected from easy water rents, amounts to between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars; which, with the yet greater return we may reasonably expect in the future, assures us beyond doubt that the investment will "pay" in vulgar dollars and cents, no less nobly than it has already paid in so many other and more momentous ways.

UNWELCOME GUESTS.

NOW do not raise your hands in amazement, I beseech you, nor turn away, with uplifted eyes and disdainfully curled lips, at my want of refinement, at my utter disregard of taste. Do not even marvel at my presumption in presenting to your notice the humble, despised, loathed objects discussed in this paper. Cast aside, for this one only time, I pray you, prejudice and old associations, and believe the sad, inglorious tales hanging around them false, or at least much exaggerated. Fancy me a second Cinderella, dwelling in by-corners, searching and sifting the debris of your houses, and spying out hidden secrets of Unwelcome Guests, who will visit you whether you like their company or not.

To be sure, I must for a while partake of the odium enveloping them, but anon comes the glorious fairy, Science, and with her wand she will transpose us all—the guests and Cinderella—and at the end you will confess, I hope, like "the Sisters" of old, there is more in us than ever your philosophy conceived. Nay, more, you will generously allow that, if we are not positively useful, we have touches of beauty which help to redeem our annoying qualities. I have so much faith in Science that I feel you will appreciate her efforts, and will accede a tacit recognition of them at least, if nothing more. But remember, if such things are unworthy of study you ignore by implication the Divine Cause. The student offers not a homage of the lips; his is no mere profession of wonder at these marvels of creation, but a homage professed in action, thought, and labor. It is unwise to turn away in disgust from contemplating these wonders, or condemning as triflers those who present them to you—pointing out these marvels of creation surrounding you in hopes of alluring some to give a little of their superfluous time to the observation of Nature.

Nothing is more capable of making a man feel the extent and power of his own being than studying the organic life around him; and it is the neglect of Science which is giving support hourly to the irreligious and encouragement to Skepticism, touching with her cold and withering fingers the sweetest blossoms around our hearths, and crushing the brightest hopes of mature manhood.

There is a continual murmur filling the air: low voices making a dull vibration from the bosom of the teeming Earth; a calm hum of Nature, which, if you will lend an attentive ear, assure you that she is breathing a prayer; that thousands of voices of creeping things are proclaiming their worship, and filling the universe with praise; while man walks above this low strata of song rising from the bosom of the waters, in the air around him, from every bush and flower. For this song of life he gives his doubts, or at least is silent and indifferent, refusing to hear this dumb voice, or to heed words spoken silently. Because the Author of them and of him has given him a mind so transcendent he dares to doubt. Is this the wisdom sung by David, or heard by those fishermen in the low wailings of the wind by the Sea of Galilee? Will these doubters ever learn that Religion is the best-beloved handmaid of Science?

But turn the page, and as we follow the finger of Omniscience let our hearts feel assured "He doeth all things well."

Here before you (Figure 1) is the Blatta Americana—the Cockroach of America. Why the first part of the name is given it is a secret of the past. There is certainly no similitude existing between it and the sultan of the barnyard. As I can see no more appropriateness in it than in many other sobriquets we will dispense with it altogether.

The roach belongs to the first family of the division Orthoptera—the Blatta of Linnæus. It is believed at present that this species belongs alone to this hemisphere, being found no farther north, that I am aware of, than Maryland, and no farther south, as far as has yet been ascertained, than Brazil. It has been said a species similar to this is found at the Cape of Good Hope; but the specimens I have seen are vastly dissimilar, denoting it as altogether a different insect. So I will confine myself to our own, for the present.

It is a very large insect, second only to a confrère, called by the Creoles and French of the Southern States the Mortissa; but it has no resemblance to the foreign Church-yard Beetle, Blaps mortisaga. These roaches are so much alike it is almost impossible, at a glance, to designate which is which. I shall point out the principal dissimilitude.

The latter are, literally speaking, no dwellers in our houses, but only come in a wild, discursive swarm to warn, it is believed, the inmates of death and trouble. They disappear as suddenly as they come, waiting only the departure of the dead to follow. The sad watchers on these occasions know, alas! too well how persistent and troublesome they are. Happily their stay is brief. The former are social nocturnal insects, flying in swarms; and at night, at an open window, when least expected, they will rush in upon you in such vast numbers that they can be compared only to a swarm of locusts. I have seen them brushed up by the shovelful at a time. No one knows for a certainty whence they come or whither they go. I have seen them, toward nightfall, in swarms in the woods around the roots of old trees.

But let us return to the one domesticated among us.

Our roaches are seldom seen in companionship; that is to say, they have no common nest, or do not move as if under command, as do the others, but appear independent. In fact they shun one another, and if compelled to juxtaposition they fight immediately until one is disabled. These are nice eaters, strange as it may seem. They consume individually very little; but of course if they are very numerous that little becomes important. Those of the spring brood are very large, measuring two inches and a quarter—their wings extend beyond the body. They are, at maturity, of a rich, lustrous brown, shading into amber at the edges of the wings and the extremities of the legs, and are decidedly pretty insects, of subdued colors. They seldom, if ever, use their wings, running very fleetly to escape pursuit, and understanding how to dodge to perfection. It is the only insect one can imagine positively sleeps. All can be found resting, but this one has a fondness for reposing hanging over something, the head and legs extended downward. You can not refrain from laughing when you see it tumble off its elevation; gather itself up, amazed, as it were; mount again and resume the nap, with the same results.

It carries its head, except when eating, always hidden under its pro-thorax—this has a light margin encircling it, which diminishes as the insect matures. The eyes, situated near the notch of the antennæ, are white, with a dash of blue on the disk (Figure 2, A). The legs are strong, neatly and gracefully placed, and the foot (B) has a cushion between the hooks that enables it to walk for a short time against gravity; but its bulk is so great it seldom inclines to ascend without using the wings. The mouth (C, C') has two pairs of palpi—labial and maxillary—which are exceedingly tremulous and sensitive, never at rest. The mandibles, or jaws (D), are wonderful in their strength. Nothing can withstand them. Bones, leather, even wood, receive their impress. They leave long ridges in the substances they devour. The interior of the upper lip (E) has some strange elevations and depressions, one of which (F) appears as if meant to receive a tongue; but I have never been able to find any thing to which I should like to apply this term, or which would correspond, after the insect is dead, with this depression. The antennæ (G) are very long, and exceedingly attentive to their duty. The insect will stand more than an inch from any substance while these appendages touch it, examine it, and often they are drawn in by the palpi passed through the strong jaws before the insect feels assured that it is proper for it to make a nearer approach. How many joints they have is beyond my computing. As many thousands as I have seen I never yet came across one with antennæ entire. They are always fighting or prying into holes and dark walls, so that they early become mutilated. I have counted joints to the amount of one hundred and fifty-six, and as few as forty. A singular fact relates to these antennæ: Should the insect, prior to its change of skin, break either, when the whole skin is thrown off—although broken before—they will be produced whole, and yet, when exposed to the air, the joints fall off just at the fracture. Thus the insect, if it has the misfortune to break its antennæ in its early stages, is cheated with a renewal each time, but arrives at maturity maimed; and, odd as it may appear, as far as I have examined, no young ones ever correspond in the number of joints. I am forced to conclude they grow each time they moult, if unbroken, but never renew the joints so as to remain intact (by the nerve continuing to run to the extreme point) if broken off at this early period. At H (Figure 2) is a side view of the head. It is attached to the body by a strong cord, which is very elastic.

The stomach (Figure 3, A) consists of a number of sacs, nerves, and much mucus. At B is a sac filled always with a green fluid, which is a strong acid, and serves, doubtless, to assist digestion. There are a number of others; the most important are represented. Their purposes I may conjecture, but not affirm; for the body of the insect is so flat that it is almost impossible to obtain any true or very accurate arrangement. The back (C) is covered with a dense net-work of nerves, which renders the insect the most tenacious of life of any I have handled. I know nothing so painful in the whole study as to have any dealings with these little creatures. Conceive for a moment the inability to find where vitality can be touched. Cut off the head, the body will run about as nimbly on four legs as if unwounded, while the head scampers about on two. Take out the antennæ and palpi by the roots; five hours afterward they will move so under the glass that you can not control them for observation. Pin them down at every joint, still they struggle; and twelve hours after this headless trunk has been confined with a needle through it, strike the table forcibly and every leg will renew its struggles for relief—a most convincing proof that their sense of hearing is in the nervous system. Life is an unapproachable mystery at all times; but to hunt it through so small a space, and find the spirit eluding you so consistently that you are forced to ask the question, What right you have to pursue it, and tremble at your own boldness. In this family it can only be crushed out while the insect is in its prime. If the whole entire intestines be drawn away the insect will still live, and the jaws will close upon any thing forced into them, with all the irritability of life, as long as a joint of the palpi remains.

The ovipositor and the ovicular arrangement you perceive at D. The hooks and spines are turned down to show the interior. You see two fan-like appendages at the tail of the insect; over these grows a thin skin, dividing itself, as it extends, into segments. It is kept open by spines (E); being protected exteriorly by spines (F). The rings of this case keep extending until a certain number (or quantity, you may say, for it is in such a mucilaginous state that you can not count them) is expelled, when the mother insect glues it carefully to any projecting substance, as shelves, rims of tables, or legs of furniture, away from the light as much as possible (G). In eighteen or twenty days the young come out, small and white (H). They moult for the first time when four weeks old (I), and continue to do so at intervals four times, until they emerge for the last time from the case (Figure 4, J) as a perfect insect, with wings which have been growing all this while under these different cases. The insect comes from the sac; at the juncture it resembles a seed pod so closely that you would conclude it was one, until undeceived by the inception of these Vandals.

The under wing of this insect has an odd, fan-shaped appendage (Figure 4, K), which folds closely on the interior, and which causes the whirring sound that the insect makes when it flies. When they fly in a swarm they can be heard at some distance like the whirring of a mill-wheel. When they first emerge from the last moulting nothing in nature can be conceived more chastely beautiful. They are white, as if chiseled or carved in ivory—not the dead hue of marble, but the warmer glow of the above material. Every nervure of these vast wings stands out in bold relief, every spine and hair shows on the antennæ and legs, every segment of the body reflects a light which shows them all in a distinctive medium, and the eyes resemble small drops of torquoise, so blue and tender you might fancy a patient Celestial had carved for you another specimen of his amazing skill and industry. But, as you gaze, dark lines creep over it; on and on they come, as night treads out the light of day over hill-top and valley, settling down at last into sombre shadows. A few hours converts all this light into dim, dull hues, and the insect's fluids run no longer in silvery lines. How many efforts I have made to preserve them at this period; but chloroform, alcohol, keeping them in total darkness, are all in vain. Even if crushed at the moment they still turn to their natural hue. It is well worth any one's time to watch this singular and mysterious change. Despicable as they are esteemed by the human family, a sight of them at this early stage would convince the most obstinate that beauty exists in all things.

Among the number, of which you have here the representation sent me by a friend from Charleston, I perceived one the rings of whose abdomen sustained many small white spots. It was very restless, spreading out its wings and darting violently from side to side. I caught it, and on applying the glass discovered they were eggs. In ten days they produced maggots, which soon devoured the fatty parts of this one and two others who had died in battle a few days previous. They went into cocoons (Figure 4, L) on the thirteenth day. In a week's time came forth the Ichneumon fly, the Evania apendigaster (M). What would they do at the South if not for this active little creature, so black and minute that they scarcely can conceive the blessing she is conferring as she wings her way through the dark places of their homes!

These flies are ready for the first brood of roaches in June, and the second in September, generally remaining until the first cool weather, leaving their precious gift in eggs deposited in the unfortunate roach, which probably would not go through all its transformations much before spring. These were hastened by artificial means. You may trace them flying very low near cracks, crevices, and in cellars. No one can estimate the obligations we owe them. I never saw this fly any where but in South Carolina and Georgia. They fly very early in the morning and at twilight. The best way to obtain them for examination is to get the roach in September. You will find three out of ten on an average punctured by the fly; but seldom more than three eggs on a roach, for the maggots are very great eaters, and one roach would not suffice for more. This roach will not eat its fellow under the most desperate circumstances. They will sustain starvation, without any apparent change, twenty-five days. Their food is every thing nice; they never refused any thing I have ever given them except pumpkin-pie. I made the experiment with the pumpkin crude and cooked, but in vain. Their Southern taste could not be converted into approbation of this Yankee institution. The male is very much smaller than the female, and dies almost immediately after mating. *There are about five females to one male. These insects yield, if slowly stewed, a soft and clear oil, free from any odor, and which, from experience, I can recommend as one of the most soothing embrocations for neuralgic affections. It may be passed through a water-bath to render it very pure. I have no doubt that in time their usefulness will be generally admitted.

The next is the Blatta domestica, the common pantry roach. I can not tell where its habitat is not: it seems ubiquitous. North and South, East and West, the cry is heard against them. They are small—not quite an inch long. The wings are longer than the body, and are always lapped. The air-sacs (Figure 6, A) are singularly large for an insect which flies so rarely. They can be taken out entire by forcing up the fan-like appendages of the under wings (B). The antennæ (C) have eighty-five joints. The maxillary palpi have a peculiar last joint (D). The foot (E) has a prolonged cushion, but they do not walk against gravity more easily for it. The kidney-shaped black and smooth elevations (F), which I may call eyebrows from their protruding so far, are very useful in protecting the head from injury, their movements are so heedless; they extend quite under the head, shielding the roots of the antennæ as well as the deep-sunken eyes at their base. The fans at the tail (G) are quite transparent, and covered with minute spines. The insect represented is very much elongated. She was three weeks filling her egg-case, and had just secured it to a piece of stale bread, when I took her likeness—not a flattering one, but very true. It was a long time before she would consent to adopt this novel proceeding, and so persistently carried it, heavy as it was, till she appeared drawn completely out of joint. They are familiar enough, I apprehend, for you to perceive this unusual appearance in her.

Their habits are the same as those of the preceding insect—coming out at the juncture of the egg-sac (H), moulting, feeding as daintily; but ten-fold more troublesome. Being so much smaller, they can creep into every thing; hide away in the smallest space; and are particularly injurious to linen and muslin garments—eating small holes in them on account of the starch.

The third is the Blatta Orientalis (Figure 7), originally a native of Asia, but now a thorough cosmopolite. They are called Karkerlacs in the East and West Indies, and in China. In this latter country pages have been written on their depredations by missionaries and travelers. They gnaw toe and finger-nails while people are asleep; devouring books, papers, and food without intermission; running in thousands over every thing, and every where, until there is no rest for the weary stranger. We need not go to China for all this.

I was seated at a window, not long ago, in one of the handsomest rooms in one of the newest and grandest hotel palaces in New York, gazing at Broadway by moonlight. I heard a movement in the room. The marble tables and furniture were black with them. I clapped my hands very loud, flourished a towel round the room; and where were they? Not one to be seen—all fled pell-mell down the openings made for the heated air which warmed the room.

No finer location in the world can be found for a breeding-place than these steam-pipes, and in time we shall hear the same cries coming up from bed and board from travelers as are now heard in China. These black beetles—or beads, as they are called in England—have evidently been imported to this country from the other hemisphere, and have been naturalized with the same ease as other emigrants. How feelingly we could dispense with their residence among us, in this instance! But they have claimed us as their own, refusing every restraining power, and keep high revel, at all times and in all places, in spite of every expostulation and entreaty.

new or so carefully watched that it can be pronounced free from them. Being nocturnal insects, never seen during the day, their invasion is imperceptible, until by their numbers it can be hid no longer; and then "ask Hercules to help you," you will require supernatural patience and perseverance to get rid of these Bohemians.

The one before you is the female. Notice how small her wings are. Those of the male do not extend over the half of the body. The mandibles (Figure 8, B) are very different, being single, and not double in the teeth. The upper lip (C) is divided, the maxillary palpi (D) have a depression in the last joints. The antennæ (E, E) have singular joints at their commencement and end. The profile view of the heads (F) differ in no material points.

This insect's habits are the same as those of the other two. The egg-case is filled, deposited, and the young emerge in the same manner, undergoing the same changes, eating and dwelling in the same places; but enjoying the privilege of annoying every one more than the others, on account of their boldness.

The other two are very shy insects—the impudence of this last is unexampled. They will even turn and gaze at a candle; and where they are very numerous they will make a rush at it, either to put it out or terrify the bearer. It has been said that the large fire in New York, in 1835, was occasioned by a woman becoming terrified at an attack of roaches, dropping her light in a mass of combustibles, and by the time the alarm was given it was too late. What an auto da fê! One could feel reconciled to the loss of such an immense and sweeping conflagration if the race of these nuisances had been extinguished. It differs from the others in color, being as black as it well can be, without a ray of light on any part of its body; but when it moults it is quite as white and pure in appearance as its confrères, and is charming until the shadows deepen, and it becomes blacker than Erebus. They fight, when together, unremittingly, devouring each other without hesitation—the longest life to the strongest. Feed them as you may, like the old cannibal woman in London, with every dainty before her, "nothing tastes like picaninny."

Three days ago I had nine under a glass. Every thing nice had been given them. Four now remain, and they are holding a consultation who shall serve for the next dessert. Put into them one of the long Southern gentry, with unanimous accord he is better than any thing else for a feast. But reciprocate the compliment with a "black beetle." They kill it immediately, and huddle together as far off from it as they can get, and die of starvation before they will come near it. No one can conceive, unless they watch them very closely, how much they can consume; what great depredations they commit on furniture, books, paper on walls, garments—on every thing—even shoes and boots. I have known them, in a boot, during the night, eat the stitches, for the sake of the wax, that the upper leather separated from the sole, so that it was unwearable by the dismayed owner: and this was in New York. I have seen them feasting, ever so gently, on the ruby lips of a sleeping infant, in a nursery thought by the mother so well regulated that not even a fairy could intrude through the keyhole. To sum up their character, as Bridget said on this occasion, "Presave me, these black beedles are very insinawating creythures!"

I am sorry to say they are rapidly on the increase. At one time they were confined to the sea-board, around vessels and wharves; but they are found now out West, at the extreme verge of emigration—taken on their journey by the emigrants themselves.

It is almost impossible to unglue the egg-cases from the niches where they are placed on furniture. No jolting or movement can dislodge them. So they are unwittingly transported to every new home by every family going to the wilds of the West.

There are several other varieties of Blatta, both foreign and native, to be found on this continent; but they have hitherto kept to their own locations, in coal and wood yards, on wharves, in meat-shops, old wells and pumps; and we can not consider them as ever likely to become dwellers at our hearths or guests at our tables.

Here is (Fig. 5) another intolerable nuisance. Happy the one who has not a garment fretted by the Moth: he must be at either extremity of civilization—a philosopher above perceiving such minutiae, or an unfortunate who does not possess one to be fretted. It is the most wonderful study this minute agent of destruction, and still more wonderful how much evil they can accomplish. This moth, the Tinea pellionella, the Clothes' Moth, belongs to the Lepidoptera division, the Phalena tineæ of Linnæus. It is a very small insect with soft, buff-colored, satiny wings, flying mostly at night. It is called the "Vestianella" by Harris; but this latter differs from the former: it is larger, has some shading on the wings, the proboscis or sucker is longer in the perfect insect, and it prefers materials of a silky texture; whereas the "Pellionella" scarcely ever touches any fabric but of wool and hair. The mother moth always deposits her eggs, if possible, in the former and thinner; but the larvæ will often wander off to the other material if near by. They are easily designated by a cursory observer from the manner in which they carry their antennæ: they are always more curved in the "Vestianella" (A): their habits are so similar one description will answer for both. The mother moth, early in the morning or at twilight, may be seen flying about seeking a place for her eggs. Upon the long hairs of any woolen fabric near at hand she hastens to glue them (B), scattering them over it so as to give as much space to her young as possible: they are, as well as the larvæ, almost imperceptible to the unaided eye. You must know how to look for them, if you find them without a glass. The egg is round, white, and pellucid; eighteen days from the time they are deposited a small white worm comes out: taking hold of a neighboring hair, it wriggles its way out of the shell (C). It nestles in the soft wool for a day or two, then changes its skin. By this time its fluids are settled and the silk secretion has accumulated; and being stronger, it commences to build or rather manufacture its case. It will not eat during the time it is thus reposing, nor will it cut a hair until a sufficient quantity of fluid silk has collected. When it once commences, it rests neither day nor night until its domicile is finished. I have known them to be naked a whole week before they commenced their operations. Its body is its model. It searches all round over the stuff for a long hair: this is clipped with its small teeth as close as possible and laid lengthways; another and another, each bound together by threads of silk; and so it continues, patiently clipping the hairs and weaving them in. The process is repeated until a stout fabric covers in part the little naked creature, and gradually it becomes large enough to cover the body entirely. The interior is allowed to be of sufficient dimensions for the caterpillar to turn up or down, and is finished off with a fine, closely-woven network of silk and the softest hairs. It now rests for a day or so, and then begins to eat. This family never feed unless under cover. The depredation now commences in earnest. The long hairs being used for its habitation, it rejects the pile or nap, as it is called, cutting it away and casting it on either side, causing the cloth to assume the thread-bare appearance it has under such circumstances. Its real food is the original compact material, the result the small pin-holes found in the finest and best textures. These it always prefers to a coarser or inferior article. They are capital judges of costly fabrics, and always select them on account of their being freer from oily particles. Of course the worm increases as time advances, and shows a bold front when forced from his case. Soon it becomes too narrow and too short. You naturally conclude it will slip out of the old shell and construct another. Not so; economy is one of the most important lessons Dame Nature teaches her children, in food and the use of material. Waste is unknown throughout the universe; it is an indulgence assumed by man in his own right. This little caterpillar possesses an accomplishment which I fear we may term “a lost art”—it knows how “to patch.” With its teeth it cuts an aperture half-way down the case (Figure 10, F); but as it has a positive dislike to nudity, it does not cut but one slit at a time. If it commences enlarging at the tail, the next aperture is at the head, then at the tail again; and so back to the head, when it is made comfortable again by its own industry. You perceive the patch already made; the second was made at the back.

At this period you can have this little case as varied as you choose by supplying the material: a very pretty specimen of rainbow manufacture, for instance; the foundation being yellow, one patch may be blue, the second red, third green, and fourth pink: the case may be lengthened by black and purple hairs, woven in most beautifully and symmetrically. It will consume nearly a whole week to execute this enlargement: it now rests several days, and then commences eating again. I can not find out positively why, in some instances, this enlarging or patching takes place twice. Usually once suffices, but in several instances it has occurred twice. I conclude it is owing to the want of nutritious qualities in the material they may be feeding upon, or probably to the time of the year they may have to emerge as perfect insects. Providence may have given them the liberty of selecting their periods; certainly some worms feed double the time others do. When they have fed long enough they close up the ends of the cocoons, suspending them from shelves or walls (Figure 10, G). Open it at the end of ten or twelve days, and you will find a small chrysalis (H); it will remain an indefinite period before it comes out a perfect insect, the weather having complete control over it.

You perceive (I) the cocoon of the Tinea tapetzella, the Carpet or Tapestry Moth, whose habits are the same, except that, when it has finished feeding, it sinks its cocoons as far down as possible into the pile of the carpet, weaving silk and hair back and forth to secure them from being shaken out; consequently, a carpet must be well beaten for them to be disturbed.

Authors are of opinion the ancients possessed some secret for preserving garments from the moth. We are told the robes of Servius Tullius were found in perfect preservation at the death of Sejanus—an interval of more than five hundred years. Pliny gives as a precaution “to lay garments on a coffin;” others recommend “cantharides hung up in a house, or wrapping them in a lion's skin"—"the poor little insects," says Reaumur, "being probably placed in bodily fear of this terrible animal." I fear, if these were the only modes of preserving garments in those days, the treasonable eyes of Sejanus would never have been gratified with a sight of those royal robes he intrigued so ardently to appropriate to himself. Shall we allow the question to intrude upon us? Did the Roman matrons excel the moderns in neatness, economy (in having fewer garments), and watchfulness—the only preservatives against these bold and industrious depredators?

Here (Figure 11) is a member of a family whose leader, if they have one like Alexander the Great, must weep for "new kingdoms to conquer." There is one solely, in the known habitable world, that rebels against its imperious demands—that "gem of the sea," that paradise to which distance lends such unfading charms. St. Patrick has refused all admittance to its homes—his staff bars the entrance of every part. They can possess not even the beggar's straw. In Ireland—happy country—they have no Bed-Bugs!

It is said by travelers that they are not found at a greater altitude than 5817 feet; others again complain of them at Quito, 9000 feet above the sea. And—whisper it to the reeds, but not to the winds!—it is feared the monks on St. Bernard will be obliged soon to ask the aid of St. Patrick to rid them of these vampyres. The fathers, it is said, tremble when they see their dogs sniffing the air. They know who is coming. "Bed-Bugs" and "Americans" are synonyms in their vocabulary.

This Cimex lectularius—known to the world as the "Bed-Bug" among the English, "Chinche" of the Spaniard, and "Camarade de lit" (Bed-fellow"), of the French—is an irrepressible and firmly-planted nuisance. This word "Bug" has the same root as "bugbear." The passage in Psalms, "Thou shalt not be afraid of the terror by night," has been translated by Matthew, in his Bible, "Thou shalt not nede to be afraide of any bugs by night." He never visited any part of America, or he would have been aware this assurance was made to the ear alone. It is a native of this country; and, if we have received nuisances from abroad, assuredly we have avenged ourselves ten-fold by the extradition of this one. It was known in England as early as 1503. The discoverers of this hemisphere must have taken it with them on their return. The first mention made of them we have in the anecdote of Dr. Penny, who, in the year mentioned above, was called in great haste to Mortlake, on the Thames, to attend two noblemen who had been bitten (read punctured) by these barbarians, and supposed themselves to have contracted some terrible contagion. The début of these insects in the old world, you perceive, was well chronicled. Dr. Penny being an entomologist "laughed them out of their fears." It is a pity the cure had not descended to us with the anecdote.

This bug is a parasite of the bat family. I have never handled one but I have found it covered with them in some stage—nestling along the under part of the wings, on the large veins, and around the body. The Barbastelles or Nycticeus we meet at the South, and the whole family of Molossines are never free from them. We know the principal habitat for all the families of bats in this country is the topmost branches of our highest pines. Here they congregate during the day until nightfall. In the pine forests of the Southern States you can scarcely strip a piece of bark from a tree whose sap is drying away but you will find these bugs in every stage hidden under it. They are most tenacious of life—no degree of cold or heat can affect them. Freeze one until you can break it in two; thaw the pieces, and they will revive. Freeze the eggs until congealed in ice; let them thaw, and they will hatch as usual. Boil both insect and egg; they revive as soon as cool. Under the bark they will propagate without food except what they derive from the atmosphere. They deposit their eggs along the rents and fibres of the woody parts; and this is the reason that houses, where much pine is used, become infested. Bats may be seen beating their wings at nightfall, by the hour, against the branches of the pines, to relieve themselves of some of these parasites. Being insects fond of warmth they creep down from their aerial position toward the earth, and hide from the light (which to them as well as to the bat is unsupportable), under the bark, until chance conveys them into more agreeable quarters—our houses.

When on the bat they have the same hue as it—a mouse or dark-brown color; but after two or three generations have passed, feeding on man, they become lighter, and are at some stages transparent. As they grow old their fluids become thick, and they are almost black. On the bat they scarcely ever move, running in their suckers, and holding on by them during its wild aerial flights. But the daytime amply compensates them.

The Cimex lectularius of Linnæus belongs to the order Hemiptera. It is a pretty insect if it has kept good company. It looks as if made of pale straw-colored glass; and if in a starving condition you place it on your hand, it is a marvelous performance of Nature to see the numerous veins and intestines (Figure 12, A) filling up with the rosy fluid. It has the same capacity as the flea of voiding as fast as it imbibes. The male is smaller than the female, and has the antennæ (B) very much thinner. The eyes (C) resemble very minute blackberries, except from each protuberance proceeds a spine. The parts of the haustellum or sucker (D, E) are all before you. I presume that there is no individual to whom it is necessary to explain their operation, nor the sensation arising therefrom.

When the female is prepared to deposit her eggs, you can perceive the yellow egg-bag under the abdomen (H): she deposits them generally in long regular rows, a slight fluid covering them to retain them in place. The young bug (I) has a very comical look as it emerges from the egg; the little black eyes seem to express so much astonishment at the new world it is so fearless in entering. They moult four times—the first skin discoverable is so small that it can be seen only by the eye in a strong light; and they may have thrown off one before this; but only four moultings can be counted. They arrive at maturity in about twenty days from the time they are hatched. The mother bug will continue, when once she commences to deposit her eggs, every day for three weeks, at intervals. They are thus hatching at all times and at all seasons.

Some authors affirm that they will live for years. I can only mention my own experience. I have tended them with the utmost care to convince myself of this phenomenon, feeding them regularly and without stint on my own hands. At the tenth week they commence to show marks of old age; at the twelfth they seem to possess no power to elevate the sucker, and generally die on the thirteenth. I have kept them alive until they were eighteen weeks old, by giving them the blood of raw beef; but this is an unfair experiment. Others must have had better success. The world would soon be sucked up if they all arrived at the age of six years, given by one author (Goeze) as the result of his experiment. The missionaries in South America consider that all these sucking insects, so annoying to man, are meant as phlebotomists to relieve him of his superfluous fluids, fitting his system to the climate he is in. This philosophy is worth cultivating, but it is rather Jesuitical.

The larva of one of its own kindred—the Reduvius personatus—pursues it without mercy. It resembles an extraordinary ugly spider, and to conceal itself, for the purpose of hunting at its leisure, it covers itself with dust, down of feathers, shreds of any material it can pick up in its journey, and under this odd masquerade it does execution on this torment. You can only tell there is something alive within the ball by seeing it roll along without any perceptible instrument of locomotion. The nearest view I ever obtained of one was in an old wardrobe at Quebec. It made its escape before I could get any means of securing it. I can never forget its dark pupiled eyes, with their blood-red iris, glaring at me with so much ferocity. They can move with wonderful speed when they are pursued; but they take it very coolly when foraging, probably moving an inch in ten minutes. Too much speed would attract attention in a ball of dust. But when near their prey one bound suffices to capture it. You can always discover where they have been by the number of shells of grown bugs sucked empty and discarded. They are more numerous where their food is plentiful than people are aware of. It requires a keen eye to detect them, and some familiarity with their habits. I regret that my drawing of this insect was necessarily so slight that I do not feel justified in monographing it; and it certainly would be a decided proof of idleness, the want of neatness and supervision for any house-keeper to desire the co-operation of this insect in keeping the other under subjection.

Here is another native (Figure 13)—a most restless, industrious, indefatigable native. Whoever presumes to say he knows him not must have been where larders are empty; and the woman who pronounces this libel on her sex, and has never shed tears of mortification, or given vent to her complaints against it, does not exist, I may fearlessly assert, within the vast domain of this great republic. If so, she must be a denizen of one of Aladdin's palaces. It is ubiquitous; possessing every American proclivity; pushing itself wherever an opening is presented; experimenting upon every unfamiliar object; meddling with every body's business, but never neglecting its own; "sponging" upon any one who will allow it foothold; understanding the rights of squatter sovereignty to the utmost quibble of possession, and positively refusing to leave its country under every inducement.

Such is the little Yellow Ant of our houses. Who will say I am uttering a libel? Out of the fullness of the heart the pen will write as well as the tongue will speak. Such an insulting, vain-glorious native as he is; bustling along; proclaiming by his presence, "If I did not find myself needed, from your carelessness and want of neatness, it would not be necessary for me to come with my legions to remove the debris of your houses. And as I never do any thing for nothing, I shall take my board and lodging at the same time." And, like a true squatter, no force can remove him. Warnings to quit—what are they to him? Out of the cellar to-day, he will be "located" in the attic to-morrow; out of the pantry in the morning, in the lady's card-receiver on the drawing table at night. The American elasticity always pervading, he laughs at obstacles which would make other ants commit suicide, and feels himself "at home" any where with a plenty or a scarcity around. Hoping always, and, I fear I must add, always triumphant. He should be the sign-manual of the "Know Nothing" party. The spread-eagle is a blank to him, as far as symbolic resemblance prevails. Who among us accepts any thing or any body without knowing every antecedent? So let us unearth him.

This "Troublesome Ant"—the Myrmica molesta of Say—is the smallest of all ants except the Myrmica minuta; and it is doubtful if they are not the same under less flourishing circumstances. Both should be classed under the European sub-genus Atta, on account of the shortness of the palpi. It is yellow, with all the darkest shades deepening into brown; quite transparent, so that the intestinal arrangements can easily be perceived, as at A. I fed the one here figured upon preserved blackberries for two days, after having starved it for nine, allowing it only water twice a day. To render the interior more distinct, I have made the white lines to represent the black in the original. Its body is exceedingly knotty and convoluting, enabling it to twist and double itself into every position. The eyes are single, and very black. The mandibles appear to vary in the sexes. I have found them similar in many instances to those at B, Figure 14, and then again they are shorter and more compressed, as at C. On the under side are three indistinct elevations on each side, which may be termed teeth, but are not sufficiently conspicuous to be represented. The tongue (D) may be called triangular after death; but when lapping up any fluid it resembles the bowl of a spoon, and can be elongated or shortened at the will of the insect. They are stingless. The leg (E) and the antennæ (F) explain themselves.

They have always a nest in the earth near the places they infest, and send out colonies far and near. It is over this the winged one's meet. Early in the spring mornings they may be seen whirling through the danse d'amour on a sunbeam. Ten minutes suffice for the whole tale to be told. At the expiration of this time the neuters may be seen, like angry godmothers in fairy tales, stripping them of their aerial ornaments—the pretty silvery gauzy wings—ordering them forth on their mission to multiply and so replenish our houses. The bodies of the dead Leanders are drawn away, and left by the wayside for the fowls of the air. All strong-minded women should study this branch of natural history; they would derive such comfort in seeing, in every instance, how Nature avenges the sex on the males. This ant does not appear to have any regularity or system in planning her city of refuge. I can not understand where uniformity or order commences, as many as I have examined. However, my philosophy may be at fault.

To see how they would manage in-doors last November, when they were looking out for winter-quarters after foraging upon my boxes and drawers all summer, I placed a large slice of home-made cake—a triangular piece about three inches thick—on a window-sill where the sun would reach them at noonday, and close beside the chimney, where they never could feel cold. I covered it with a piece of turf moss, which was sprinkled once or twice a week to keep the cake moist. Several days elapsed. Stragglers were seen around examining the premises; they appeared suspicious of such attentions. A large crack in the window served as a hall of consultation. At last it was decided to take possession in the face of several "border ruffians" who had congregated behind the shutter—the small hunting-spider, Salticus scenecus, or zebra.

In February I examined the nest, a section of which I here present (Figure 14). These plans were only doubled and trebled throughout the whole piece, and with much less regularity. The ant I have monographed was found alone in the large room (Figure 14, 1). We may presume she must be an individual of some distinction. There were about forty inhabitants in all, scattered over the premises; they were all napping for the winter; the others had retired to the crack. Doubtless these were sentinels left to watch, and had become overpowered by the cold. The black spots (2, 3) were raisins, which had been eaten out, and refilled with small grains, which appeared to have been masticated, and prepared for future use. The grains you see disposed around with avenues leading to them were of various colors, like a collection of microscopic sugar-plums—pink, blue, and yellow. They probably obtained their coloring matter from the mixture of formic acid—the saliva of the ants—which possesses the power of changing the color of vegetable matter. The grains (G) were composed of atoms still more minute, connected as if with some fluid. The main road (4) was lined on both sides with some kind of debris, and led directly to the crack; there were several ants at its entrance. Here was a very important chamber (5), filled with cocoons similar to the one at F, all fastened to each other, and to the walls of the chamber. Among these were several ants rolled up into balls, sleeping as you have seen a cat with its head buried under it. In the chamber (6) were a number of eggs and a few pupa-cases, hedged in with grains of cake, to keep them warm. Here, likewise, were several ants quite as snug and unconscious as the others. I replaced the nest as carefully as possible; not an ant was awakened except the dame of the large chamber (1); I placed her under a glass to thaw out for future acquaintance. I have had the honor of introducing her to you (Figure 13), with the exception of a few domestic secrets which you would not appreciate. Credit me, I enjoyed the expectation of cutting off some thousands of these torments at a future day, as soon as they revived with the warm spring, and congregated in their city of sweets. Would I not have the human enjoyment of revenge for the numerous sackings my boxes had received? Alas, this was not to be! I went at the appointed time to fulfill my intentions with most satanic engouement and found the city empty. Eggs, cocoons, food, sugar-plums—all gone—carried off securely into the crack that has no bottom; nothing but ruins, over which I meditated, like Marius amidst those of Carthage, but with less hope. It was all right: for I am half Brahmin at times. I see so much instinct, foresight, ingenuity, prescience, preconception—almost the reasoning faculty—amidst my daily companions, that I might have destroyed a whole host of somebody's ancestors. They would not have been my own, for they never understood the saving power.

Their sense of smell, or their susceptibility to the atmosphere around them, must be exquisite. I had not seen one for some weeks, and I was about to sing,

"To Pëan! twice; twice, To say!"

My toils are pitch'd and I have caught my prey."

I left, in fancied security on the window-sill, a rare beetle which I was painting. I was absent about thirty minutes, and returned just in time to prevent the disappearance of my treasure down that formidable crack. The whole population—equal to that of the Chinese empire—had turned out to secure this prize. I was too happy to reclaim my property; and, after due examination, I placed it away in my safest sanctum. I wonder if ants ever laugh. They must have done so to-day, if they saw my dismay to find nothing remaining of my charming summer companion but the strong wing-cases and a few shreds. It was like rifling a grave. Had this been all, no body of antiquarians in a mummy-pit could have acted more ruthlessly than they had done among my specimens.

It is said they prefer sweets. Those who thus assert do not know them. Their taste is thoroughly aldermanic—liking every thing good; but they have a decided preference for meats. I have experimented for weeks at a time near that yawning, ingulfing crack with a dozen articles at a time. The meats were always disposed of first, and the cunning little creatures always took a full meal of them before they commenced work. They are, moreover, very great drinkers, and positively have not a particle of respect for the Maine Law, craving a sip of the ardent with human intensity.

When the female is ready to drop her eggs she runs about the nest expelling them as she goes. She is carefully followed by the workers, who take the eggs in their jaws, and convey them into chambers appropriated to them. At first the egg is very opaque and dull, but it grows under the care of these good nurses, who lick it over and turn it three or four times a day until it becomes bright and translucent. In time—say ten days—according to the weather, a very minute grub comes forth blind and helpless. It is patiently fed and nursed, each worker having one or two under its charge, who are very careful in keeping them warm and dry. In several ants' nests cocoons are formed of a very silky texture; and others again resembling coarse pupa-cases. We must conclude those who are to be future foundresses of other colonies, and consequently possess wings, are fed as are the bees, upon superior food, and whose cocoons are spun of a finer material. There is certainly a great difference in them. One thing is certain: these change their skins before they obtain their wings, while the workers never do. This is the reason that in many nests they are always darker and stronger.

When the grub is ready to come from the cocoon or pupa-case, the ant who is attending upon it bites it open, and helps it out. It is fed several days by its attendant, until its right position in the nest is ascertained; and should it prove to be a worker, sometimes the elders are obliged to flog it to its task—these representatives of industry having naturally no more love for work than ourselves. They resemble us in another particular: heaping up possessions, and not knowing who shall enjoy them. Very few survivors, when exposed during the winter, remain to enjoy the reward of such hard labor of the summer.

They are very kind and affectionate to each other. If a straggler should come across a wounded companion she will lay her package down, examine the sufferer, and if any care will avail she hastens off and in a little while you will see several hastening along—the wounded one is lifted with care and borne off to the comforts of the nest. They never pass a body of one without examining it; but the dead are left to bury the dead. Many an hour have I spent in watching such exhibitions of their love: it is really amusing to see their sagacity in drawing out a drowning brother or sister from a drop of sirup. Of course if they venture in they get stuck fast themselves. They manage it thus: One stands as near the pool as possible; a second mounts on her back, stretching over as far as practicable; another mounts on her—and so on until the sufferer is reached. She is then plucked out, with the jaws rolled up, and passed over the bridge. The sweet one is spread out and licked free from all restraining bands. Is this not beautiful, oh! brothers and sisters? "Go to the ant"—what lessons she can teach!

Now I hear you ask if there are any remedies by which you may secure yourselves against these annoyances.

"The world without us flings strong shadows of the world within." If neatness, energy, industry, and supervision are not cultivated as habits by housekeepers, the little world around them will soon proclaim the presence of those who minister (by the commands of Him who governs all time and all things) to man in his hours of idleness as in his hours of labor. It is true, creatures

HOW THE COURSE OF TRUE LOVE RAN SMOOTH.

A COLD easterly wind, laden with a sharp and pitiless rain, raved about the villa on Thorley's Point. In spite of the comfortable fires, the warm carpets, the double windows, and the excellent construction of the building, a damp and dreary atmosphere pervaded it. As dusk fell the long parlors became intolerable. Their furniture assumed ghostly forms in the mysterious half-light, and myriad shapes seemed starting every moment from the curtains and mirrors.

Nor was the rest of the house one whit more cheery. The spacious bedchambers were chilly and moist, and cold currents swept the halls and entries, moaning at every keyhole like the ghosts of the mariners whom, one could but think, that fearful storm had wrecked.

Perhaps the corner chamber, over the first drawing-room, was the saddest, dreariest of all. There, on the wide and luxurious bed, lay Squire Thorley, owner of the villa and estate, rich and influential, respected, honored, and loved, but now in the clutches of that awful sovereign who claims our allegiance one day, whether we will or no, and laughs at our houses and lands, our wealth and influence, our respect, honor, and love alike!

Mark Thorley, the old Squire's only son, a well-grown and comely young fellow of two-and-twenty, knelt beside his father's couch praying and sobbing incessantly.

"Take comfort, boy," whispered the old gentleman; "my time has come—why should I stay? I am going—I am going to meet your mother, Mark. Be true to yourself, boy—be just to others—never do that which you would not have known—I—give me your hand—here—I am cold—God bless you—"

That was all.

The wind roared and wailed about the mansion, and the whirling, driving rain beat upon roof and window, but neither Squire Thorley nor his son took heed. The one lay cold and motionless in the embrace of death, and the other's passionate grief burned out all his grosser senses.

After the funeral the house seemed the desolate place that only a country-house can seem after death has visited it. Every room had its especial phantom, day or night, and young Thorley, being of the dreamy, imaginative sort, felt that he should soon become insane if he remained there. Each object that met his eye served to recall his great bereavement, and to open afresh the wounds that would not heal. Life seemed already exhausted to his grief-jaundiced vision. The love he had borne his father was peculiarly intense, and while he thought only of the sundering of that love, he could see nothing bright in the future or worthy in the present.

"Let me live in solitude and peace," he said; "there is, after all, more enjoyment in apathy than in activity. I will henceforth be a hermit."

In the halcyon days when his father had been his constant companion, in study and in recreation—for they were more like two college friends than like father and son—they had built a sort of summer-house on the farthest end of the Point, aided by the remains of an ancient lime-kiln that stood there. A strata of limestone, cropping out above water, produced this point, and a former owner had quarried it pretty extensively, burning it into lime in this kiln, and shipping it from a rough pier close at hand.

The pier had long since been washed away, but the walls of the kiln were stout; and as the graceful woodbine had covered the ruin, making it a picturesque and pretty feature in the view, Squire Thorley allowed it to remain.

A rough roof, a floor, and some benches, made it a convenient shooting-box in the wild-duck season, and a pleasant place to take a book and a cigar to for a cool hour on a hot day.

"The kiln," said Mark, "shall be my hermitage; and there, in a simple and studious life, I will forget both myself and the world."

Assisted by a mason and carpenter, the young man soon contrived to make his hermitage quite an agreeable habitation. The floor was evened, the window glazed, a rustic porch built over the narrow door, a fire-place, pantry, book-shelves, writing-desk, etc., put up inside, and with a few articles of furniture from the villa, the kiln assumed a really cheerful air of comfort.

Here the self-appointed recluse took up his abode. The plain and simple food he required he either prepared for himself or had brought him from a neighboring farm-house. His days were passed in reading, writing, and meditation, with an occasional walk, for exercise. When more amusement was wanted he caught fish, dropping his line from the window of his cell, which directly overlooked the water, or made sketches of the scenery about.

An indolent, aimless life, and one which must of necessity become terribly ennuyeux, sooner or later, to a cultivated and intelligent man. But it was good for Mark in his then condition. There is nothing like outward calm to soothe a fire within. Grief consumes itself—wears itself out—if it has nothing to prey upon; and Mark found, in the course of a few months, that his first agony had subsided into a softened regret. He no longer felt horror in contemplating his loss; but found, indeed, a pensive pleasure in recalling the happy hours he had passed with his father on the Point, in the woods, or upon the bay, whose ever-restless waters washed the Thorley estate.

The villa was advertised to let, and soon found a tenant. Mrs. Brydon, a widow lady, whose husband had met his death in Florida while acting in the capacity of major in the regular army, finding herself too much reduced in means to keep up her fashionable residence in the city, became the occupant of the deserted house, and lived there with her only daughter, almost as secluded as Mark in his kiln.

The young man had judged, from Mrs. Brydon's haughty and reserved manner, that she was not the person to disturb his solitude by invitations to card-parties, tea-drinkings, and other provincial festivities, before he consented to let her have the villa. She, too, had seen that he was as little likely to intrude himself upon her before she consented to become his tenant; and under these auspices the relation was remarkably well sustained, as they never met except on quarter-day, when the stately form and black piercing eyes of the widow appeared in the hermitage for half an hour, with wonderful punctuality. The rent paid—always in gold—and the receipt signed, the young man invariably invited his tenant to take a biscuit and a glass of sherry, which she invariably accepted. In a rude cellar, hollowed out of the rock beneath the floor, Mark kept a small supply of excellent wine—a part of the stock left by the late Squire, who had been a connoisseur. Thence he produced a bottle of golden sherry, filled two glasses, and the stereotyped conversation—all he ever held with his tenant—ensued.

"Do you find the house comfortable, Madame?"

"Very comfortable, I thank you, Sir."

"Whatever repairs or alterations you may desire I beg you will attend to. The expense incurred may be deducted from the rent."

"Thank you, Sir. You are very kind."

"Not at all."

"The weather has been quite favorable since I saw you."

"Quite. Has your health been good?"

"Very good, thank you."

"And your daughter?"

"She is well, I thank you, Sir. Good-morning."

"Good-morning, Madame."

Once every three months, on the first day of the month, this dialogue was held, during the consumption of the wine. Not a word more or less was ever spoken, the only variation being in the widow's remarks about the weather. These, of course, were made to suit the facts. Then for three months more the two saw nothing of each other.

It was on a charming morning in September, a little more than two years after Mark had begun his hermit life, that he arose late, after his custom—for he was not without some luxurious habits still—and glancing out of his vine-embowered window, saw that the bay was smooth as glass, the sunshine warm, the sky blue, with here and there a fleecy cloud, and the woods along-shore beginning to assume their autumnal garb of russet, gold, and crimson.

"Too fine a day to be enjoyed within four walls," said he; "I must have a good long stroll down the beach. I'll make a sketch of the light on Gull Rock, in water-colors, to-day."

After catching a fine fat sea-bass from beneath his window, and broiling it artistically, the young man breakfasted and equipped himself for a walk. He set out at a leisurely pace—for Gull Rock was seven miles away—and as he strolled down the beach, lingered here and there to examine some curious shell, or sea-weed, or bit of drift.

The day grew warm and the walk was a long one, but Mark was repaid by the beauty of the view when he arrived. The tall white light-house, with its apex painted black, stood boldly out against the sky, now mottled with pearly clouds. The little buildings occupied by the light-keeper and his men were picturesque enough, with their green blinds and red roofs, and a group of stunted, storm-swayed cedars gave a cooling mass of dark green to relieve the brilliancy of the bay. A great iron buoy, stained with rust and discolored by the oxydization of its paint, lay like a dead sea-monster on the beach, with its chains covered with a draggled mass of sea-weed, making a capital object to enliven the foreground of the picture; and Mark felt that if he had arranged the scene, expressly to suit his own eye for the picturesque, he could not have done better than accident and nature had here.

The afternoon was on the decline when the sketch was finished, but the heat was at its highest, and Mark found it expedient to walk slowly, and to rest frequently, in the shadow of some lofty boulder or ruined sea-wall, on his homeward way. In one of these stopping-places, a mile from his hermitage, he lay down on the cool grass that grew almost to the beach, watered by a small stream that there emptied itself into the bay, and, lulled by the trickling music of the brook, fell asleep.

Awakening, he found that the bay was all aflame with the reflected glories of the autumnal sunset, and the dark shadows that began to creep over the eastern horizon warned him that it was time for him to be at home.

He hurried on at an accelerated pace, refreshed and strong after his nap, and had already come in sight of the Point, when he heard the sound of hurried footsteps and quick breathing close behind him.

Turning around, he came face to face with a young girl—a tall, slender creature, with splendid brown eyes and a warm brunette complexion, heightened by the rosy flush of exercise. Her wide straw-hat had fallen back from her head, and the dying light of the sunset fell full upon her forehead and hair, the blue-black masses of which lay upon her neck in a charming disorder. Blushing and panting, with fresh lips half opened, disclosing her white and even teeth, her bosom heaving and her eyes flashing, she presented a beautiful and unexpected vision to Mark's appreciative faculties, attuned as they were, by a day of æsthetic idleness, to the worship of beauty. She could not regain her breath for a moment, and they stood looking at each other in an animated silence, if I may use the expression.

"Miss Brydon, I believe?" said Mark, at length, in a tone of surprise.

"Yes, Sir. Excuse me, but I think you left this book back yonder by the creek, did you not? I saw you sleeping there as I passed down the shore, and when I returned found the book near by."

In truth Mark had forgotten his sketch-book when he left his sleeping-place.

"I am greatly obliged to you," he said; "it was very careless of me to leave it, and very thoughtful of you to restore it to me. I am sorry, however, that you fatigued yourself so."

"Oh, that is nothing. A little exercise never hurts any body, and I am a famous walker."

Their ways lay in the same direction, so they continued in company, chatting about commonplace matters until they reached the long, low promontory, on the extremity of which the hermitage stood.

"It is but a few steps to my den, out yonder," said Mark; "and you seem tired. A glass of wine will invigorate you. Will you accept of the poor hospitality I can offer you?"

As young girls are not generally famous for want of curiosity, and as Miss Brydon's life was not diversified by too many novelties, she found a refusal impossible; partially sheltering herself under a plea of desiring to examine the sketch-book she had saved from loss. She herself was fond of drawing, she said, and always liked to see the work of others.

Once inside, not an object escaped her quick eye. She took in every thing at a glance—the desk, with its pile of manuscripts; the book-case, laden with well-worn volumes; the few clean dishes and cooking utensils hung in a corner; the strange pipes, and antique urns for tobacco; the handsome rifle and fowling-piece suspended from the rafters; the fishing-tackle over the mantle; the bed, in its curtained alcove; the few pictures, mostly water-color views, with one portrait in oil, representing Squire Thorley in his shooting costume—in a word, the entire inventory of the hermit's goods and chattels was taken in a moment by his fair visitor.

After the simple hospitality of the place—theretofore sacred to quarter-day—had been partaken of by the young lady, she departed, gently refusing Mark's proffer of escort to the villa.

"What is the matter with you, Lois?" asked her mother, that evening; "you seem uncommonly dreamy."

"I'm sure I don't think so, mamma. I feel stupid, to be sure; but that is my normal condition, you know. Did you ever notice, mamma, what a very handsome young man we have for a landlord? I met him to-day on the beach."

As for Mark, his head was quite full of the unwonted experience of the afternoon. When he sat on the porch, in the fading twilight, thoughtfully puffing a long chibouque, after supper, a face kept arising on the pale gray wreaths of smoke—a fine maidenly face, with flashing eyes and rosy cheeks—growing, and fading, and growing, till, angry with himself, he went in and took to his books.

"Have I lived here in this way two years," he asked himself, "a living proof of the good of peace and solitude, to be finally upset by a girl's face?"

Yet that was the first night in two years, hot or cold, dry or wet, fair or stormy, that he had really felt lonesome.

It may have been very foolish—no doubt it was—but it was certainly very natural also, for Lois Brydon to be suddenly seized with such a passion for nature. She passed nearly half her time on the beach, and the number of sketches she made, the shells and minerals she collected, the walking-shoes she wore out, and the facts she learned concerning tides, winds, etc., were beyond belief. Mark Thorley, too, seemed to have less fancy for in-door studies than formerly. He lost the sallow, thin look that he had formerly worn, and his shoulders broadened with open-air exercise. His dress began to evince something of its ancient elegance, and—fatal sign!—the most of his writings now, instead of being learned essays, treatises, etc., were rhythmic and metred, with lines ending in "sighs," "eyes," "blisses," "kisses," and the like. His hermitage bore a neater order in its arrangements, and upon its walls appeared new sketches, in pencil and in color, executed in a more delicate style than his own, and bearing the initials "L. B." in their corners.

To be brief, the truth was just what these trifles indicated. Lois Brydon had thawed the ice of the hermitage, and was on the most excellent terms with its hitherto gloomy and misanthropic inhabitant.

Mrs. Brydon was not altogether in her daughter's confidence. She did not know how intimate the young people were, though Lois had told her of their gradually formed acquaintanceship. Doubtless, had she known, she would have considered it very improper; but Lois was quick at reading character, and had divined that Mark was thoroughly a man of honor—a gentleman—and therefore worthy of her companionship.

Moreover, she loved him!

One night, after an unusually agreeable afternoon, Mark persuaded Lois to take supper with him, in order to test the kind of fare that a recluse could enjoy. His stock of bread, butter, and eggs, was freshly procured from the neighboring farm-house; and he proposed to catch some fresh fish, wherewith to make a savory broil. The young girl consented; and the supper, further enlivened by excellent coffee and a bottle of choice Burgundy, was pronounced delicious.

"I will escort you home," said Mark, "and astonish your good mother by calling upon her."

"She will be astonished, but not displeased, I think. She paid you a compliment the other day."

"No! did she? What was it?"

"Guess."

"Oh, I can't. She said I was not so much of a fool as I looked, perhaps?"

"No."

"That I knew what good company was?"

"No."

"That—that—I could cook a blackfish just to a turn?"

"No. That is true, but she doesn't know it."

"Then I can't guess. Tell me."

"Well; she said you were too much of a gentleman, and too handsome—too handsome, mind you—to live the life you had chosen, and that it was a shame!"

"Oh, spare my blushes!"

In light and playful conversation the supper passed, and it was not until the dishes were cleaned and put away—a task at which Lois merrily assisted—that the young folks discovered it was raining.

"It is nothing," said Mark, confidently; "the wind is westerly; it can't rain long."

Lois waited, while he smoked his chibouque and told her a story—some quaint little fancy of one of the old writers that he loved. Then they made another investigation into the weather, and found that the wind had shifted. It was blowing steadily from the northeast, and the rain came with increased force.

"This begins to look serious," said Lois, with a shade of anxiety in her brown eyes.

"It is going to be a storm, sure enough; but it must lull soon, and we can hurry over to the house between the drops."

No lull came, however. Thick darkness settled down upon the bay. The wind roared louder and louder, and the waves broke in long lines of sheeted foam upon the weather side of the promontory.

Lois began to be frightened, and Mark did his best to allay her fears, though he himself foresaw a tempest. Meanwhile every moment served to augment the fury of wind and rain. It was the equinoctial storm, and one of extraordinary violence.

"My poor mamma will be frightened to death," said the young girl. "I only wish she knew I was safe. I did not tell her where I was going when I left the house this afternoon, and she will surely think I am drowned."

"It would be very dangerous to try a walk in this weather, Lois. The path is none of the safest by daylight, through those old quarries, and now one might easily get a few broken bones in the attempt."

"But what can we do? This storm will not abate before morning."

"I am in hopes that there will be a temporary calm soon."

No signs of a calm could be seen though from the window. A long windrow of phosphorescent light, ever shattered and ever renewed as the waves broke upon the Point, was all that was visible, while the constantly increasing noise of the gale and the surf showed that worse weather was yet to come.

At nine o'clock, meteorological affairs being no better, Lois decided that she would make an attempt, at all events, to gain her home, and quiet the alarm she knew her mother must feel.

Stoutly wrapped up in Mark's oil-cloth coat, with a handkerchief tied over her hat and under her chin, she set out boldly in the driving rain and wind, accompanied by the hermit, who, for the first time since forswearing the world, found a pair of soft white hands clinging closely to his arm, and a girlish form nestling timidly at his side.

The tremendous gusts sweeping in from the sea, thick with salt spray, nearly took them off their feet, and the sharp rain blinded them so that they could scarcely tell which way they were going. Indeed, the only manner in which they could advance with any surety was by Mark's going ahead with a lantern, which he had thought to bring with him, exploring the path for a few feet, and then returning for his charge. Even this slow and dangerous progress, however, was soon abruptly terminated.

During the quarrying days of the Point a portion of the promontory had been blasted away, its whole width, below the high-water mark, so that at full tide the waves flowed freely through the inlet thus formed, cutting off the communication between the kiln and the main shore. This inlet had, of late years, been filled up by sand and earth, washed into it, and was as solid a causeway as could be desired, with grass, weeds, and even small shrubs growing upon it. The terrific violence of the wind, and the softening influence of the rain, had now loosened, crumbled, and finally washed away every vestige of this filling-up, leaving a wide torrent raging and foaming between its jagged shores, and leaving the unhappy travelers isolated upon their rocky island.

"My God!" shouted Mark, trying to make his voice audible above the tumult of the storm, "we are cut off! The bank is washed away, and the tide is still rising!"

The lantern's light showed Lois to be very pale, as she turned her face imploringly up toward him. Her words were borne far away as soon as they were uttered; but her expression and gesture said, "What is to be done?" plainly enough.

"Back again!" shouted the young man, pointing toward the kiln; "it is of no use to stay here. The inlet is ten feet deep, and swift as Niagara!"

She clung to him now in terror, and went submissively back to the hermitage, whence a cheery red fire-light glowed out upon the darkness and gloom.

"Thank Heaven, we are at least out of peril," said he, as he closed the door and cast a glance around the dry and cozy apartment.

"Yes; what a terrible night—" she mused a moment; "but it can't be helped—it is very awkward, though—very vexatious, isn't it?"

Both laughed a little.

"Never mind, Lois," said Mark; "we can have a pleasant time anyhow. We will read and sing and draw. I will get up a late supper—just a trifle, you know, by-and-by—and we shall be famously merry! All I'm sorry about is, that your mother will be so alarmed."

After the first embarrassment wore off, the programme he had laid down went on quite prosperously. He read aloud to her from his favorite books. He mended the strings of an old mandoline that ornamented the wall, and they sang all sorts of pleasant songs. They sketched each other's portraits; and Mark made a dingy India-ink drawing of their supposed appearance when they discovered the inlet.

Thus the time passed charmingly till after midnight, when they began to feel hungry, and the hermit—a strange sort of hermit now!—brought his culinary knowledge into play once more.

The supper and coffee finished, they sat down on each side of the fire-place as quietly and domestically as two old married people. Mark whiffed thoughtfully away at his fragrant cherry-stemmed chibouque, and Lois, seated in his arm-chair, gazed meditatively at some prophetic pictures in the coals.

"I say—" began Mark, suddenly, but looking up, he discontinued his observation. Lois had fallen into a peaceful slumber, so he preferred to look at her without awakening her.

The fitful red light of the fire played across her face, bringing out its fine, high-bred features in rich relief of shine and shade. Her blue-veined lids with their long black lashes concealed her eyes, but gave an expression of holy calm that atoned for want of vivacity. Her wealth of shadowy hair, somewhat disheveled by the night's adventures, swept down in wavy masses upon her shoulders. So she sat, her head bowed a little forward, her rosy lips parted in slumber, her fair hands listlessly folded on her lap—a picture fit to make a hermit of a lover, or a lover of a hermit!

Long and earnestly did Mark study this lovely vision of repose and beauty. What his thoughts may have been I can not guess, of course; but as he gently knocked the ashes from his pipe, he heaved a very deep sigh, and a broken sentence, only half audible, came to his lips.

"Yes; I am tired of this eternal introspection—there is a better life than this—"

The rain plashed and beat; the wind howled and moaned; the waves rose and fell in angry chorus upon the sharp-toothed rocks without; but within, all was peace, and calm, and rest. Mark sat musing by the fire, or noiselessly paced the narrow apartment until Lois awoke—awoke blushing, with a pretty surprise, as if she was conscious of what awoke her, but dared not speak of it lest it was only a dream.

In sooth, was it her own fancy, that tender pressure of his lips to hers? Or had he, emboldened by the tranquillity of her sleep, dared thus to risk her displeasure?

My very dear reader, you may suppose just what you please; theories are easy to support. My own belief is, that Lois looked so incomparably pretty that Mark could not help himself, and so—and so he kissed her!

The cold gray light of dawn was beginning to shine in the lowering east, and the fury of the storm seemed to be abating. By eight o'clock Mark had another meal prepared, with Lois's aid, and when it was over the rain had nearly ceased. It was time for dead low tide, too, and their best chance for crossing the inlet was at that hour; for the tempest was liable to arise again, and the larder of the hermitage was running low: so that, if imprisoned there much longer, the horrors of starvation might be added to their other sufferings.

Sallying forth they found the way clear, and the inlet, through which a fearful torrent had roared the night before, now contained only a brawling stream, across which one could easily step. In a few moments Lois and her mother were locked, half fainting, in each other's arms.

Mrs. Brydon had sat in her chamber—the same in which Squire Thorley died—by a seaward-looking window, trying to pierce the thick darkness with her eyes, the whole night long. The servants—much as they loved Lois's gentle presence—could not be prevailed upon to make more than one effort to face the pitiless elements; and so, giving her only child up for lost, the poor lady had sat alone, in a calm and tearless agony, until daylight. As soon as the storm permitted she had sent out several parties of neighbors and servants to institute a general search along-shore. Before these returned, however, Lois was restored to her, and her great grief was swallowed up by a great joy.

She heard the story of the strange night passed by Mark and Lois in the hermitage with a gracious but significant smile.

"I do not know what to say to you, Mr. Thorley," said she, "nor how to express to you the gratitude I feel for the kindness you have shown my child. If my prayers—"

"Do not speak of it, Madame, I beg of you. The pleasure I found in extending these rude hospitalities to one so—so worthy as your daughter has more than repaid me."

His eyes sparkled, and a fine color suffused his handsome face, giving token of his earnestness.

Mrs. Brydon looked from one to the other with an almost comical expression.

"Have you thought, my children," said she, quietly, "of the terrible scandal that will arise from this romantic adventure? The neighbors will be in a shocking state of mind about it."

Lois blushed.

"I have thought of it," said Mark, eagerly; "and I have also thought of a way to silence evil tongues—or, at least, to compel them to speak at their own peril. All I require, Madame, is your consent—I think I have that of your daughter already—to my assumption of the post of protector to Lois. I shall then have a right to repel all malicious or thoughtless words concerning my charge—may I not say my wife?"

Lois blushed more rosy still, and turning her face away, covered it with one hand. The other she permitted Mark to take.

"I see how it is," said Mrs. Brydon; "you two have been playing the game of hearts, wherein each loses to the other. There! do you want my blessing?"

She patted their heads playfully, but lovingly, and a solitary ray of sunshine, breaking through the cloud-rifts, illuminated their faces like a benediction from above.

The hermitage is untenanted now. It has relapsed into its ancient condition of summer-house and shooting-box; but the villa is in a state of splendor and populousness never seen in the old Squire's day. Mrs. Brydon reigns there supreme, a "notable housewife;" and when Lois suggests that she may be of service in lightening the self-imposed duties her mother has chosen, the old lady laughs at the idea.

"There, my child," she says, "go and play with your babies. Mark can never spoil them without your help."

Yet Mark does his best to encompass that end.

And now, my dear reader, let me indulge in a little gush of egotism. I flatter myself that I have performed a miracle. Did you ever—O wise youth! O beauteous maiden!—did you ever before read a story wherein the course of true love ran smoothly

“And sweetly, on and on,
Calming itself to the long-wished-for end,
Full to the banks, close on the promised good?”

Look back upon these fair pages and marvel! No designing villain, no wealthy but headstrong uncle, no obdurate parent, no sad circumstances of poverty and separation, have marred the happiness of my hero and heroine. They have simply met, loved, and married, without anathematization of fate—without wailing over the “cold, hard world”—in a word, without nonsense.

Let me bid you farewell, dear reader, in the comfortable consciousness of having refuted Solomon's dictum by producing, at last, something “new under the sun.”

THE M.C.'S CHRISTMAS DREAM, AND THE LOBBY MEMBER'S HAPPY NEW-YEAR.

I.

MR. AND MRS. DARBY DYCE were very happy members of the Thespian profession in New York, when the bursting of a cannon converted him into a politician, and transformed her into keeper of a second-class boarding-house in Washington City. It was an eccentric decree of fate; but then Darby insisted upon visiting Washington to see the inauguration of General Jackson, whom he declared to be the only dramatic statesman in history; and his rashness would drive him to the very mouth of the cannon that, before the ceremonies commenced, belched forth from Capitol Hill a nation's gratitude. Consequently, when the cannon burst, Darby suddenly lost an eye, and missed the Presidential sight-seeing. Othello's occupation being gone, the sympathizing Jacksonites made him a Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms to the House of Representatives—a sort of stage-manager over the messengers and pages of that body, to direct their entrances and exits, and their doings both before and behind the flats. A sympathizing administration contributed its patronage—in the shape of department clerks, lobby members, and Washington loungers—to Mrs. Dyce's boarding-house on the Georgetown Road; and when ended the third week of the last December which the Jackson administration was ever to see, Mr. and Mrs. Darby Dyce had been for eight years on the Jackson stage, performing the parts which fate, as aforesaid, had assigned to them.

The Christmas holidays were coming, and—to use Darby's theatrical announcement at the breakfast-table—Congress was approaching a festival mile-stone, at which the political coach must pull up for dinner and a shaking off of the way-side dust.

Darby, on the morning in question, was strutting up and down the rotunda of the Capitol, awaiting the arrival of a brace of pages, who were to be instructed as new appointments, vice Dobbs and Boggs removed for sundry illicit traffickings in members' franks. As he walked, he seemed the apotheosis of the Government—an Atlas carrying the Capitol on his shoulders, sublimely indifferent to the Minerva at the Speaker's desk, or to the Mars at the Opposition benches, or to the Court of Venus in the Senate gallery. He appeared to look around for acknowledgment of his dignity and greatness, notwithstanding the lost Pleiad in his phrenological firmament. Not more did Ulysses tremble before Polyphemus than did the pages before the one eye of Darby Dyce. The expectant two were dilatory, and the orb was impatient. Presently it shone upon one of them.

“How now, sirrah!” exclaimed Darby. “This commencement bodes nothing auspicious to your future success!”

“If you please, Sir,” answered the page, shrinking from pica into long-primer, as the eye seemed to read him over and over and through and through, “it was all along of the Congressman who wanted a package carried to Gadsby's Hotel. He asked was I a page? and I said yes; and he handed me a bundle that had come by mail. Public dockments, he said; but the paper broke, and them was clean shirts.”

“Varlet that you are, why did you not tell him you were not yet sworn into office to support the Constitution, as Darby Dyce understands and construes it—that you were not yet before the scenes! And, page or no page, how dare you pry into honorable members' cheap-home-washing-documents!”

The page from long-primer shrank into pearl as the orb became eclipsed with dignified rage.

“Naught extenuate, Sir, but listen to my wise counsel; and you, too, Sir!” winking the other messenger into the interview. “Now, just imagine yourself Laertes, each one of you, and I will be your Polonius—and this is my advice: Always be punctual; and it will follow, as the night the day, thou canst not then be late to any Congressman. Don't forget thin shoes that make light noise. Keep ready eyes, short tongue, long ears. Blab not without, nor yet within. Serve all who ask; and every Saturday night meet me in room No. 8 for stipend. And, above all, remember you serve your country and General Jackson. Now, go into the Hall and ask for Dutch Mike, the head page, who will set you to your several tasks.”

A portentous shadow here crossed and obliterated the shadows of the retreating messengers, whose exits were as sudden as if they had gone through traps in the floor. It was the shadow of the Honorable Lysander Lillington, of Lillington Dale—that terrific M.C., foe to jobs, corruption, and the lobby!

"Good-morning, Darby," said Sir Shadow; "what is the mood of the Administration this morning? Does it retrench, or grow extravagant? Are we reducing those useless excrescences of legislation called pages, or are you adding to the number?" And here the substance of the shadow gestured toward the place where the double-headed Laertes had stood.

"Merely a substitution—no more, nor less," answered the sergeant. "We leave retrenchment to you Whigs when you get in power. Those pages belong on your side of the chamber."

"Small use to me. Do I frank even public letters? Do I encumber mail-bags with dirty linen or fraudulent rhetoric? Who, less than I do, robs the Government of pens, sealing-wax, or knives? Let the nation answer!"

The Hon. Lysander addressed himself to a knot of loungers hard by, although he looked at the sergeant.

"I am even now on my way to the Library in person, to perform my own page duty."

"Not open yet," replied Darby, with official alacrity.

"Of course not!" continued the M.C. "I might have known it. Ten o'clock A.M. is about the hour that the librarians take their Administration cocoa in bed, I presume. Oh, blind nation! Your downfall approaches! The days of these States are numbered!"

Here he gestured as if addressing some imaginary mass meeting in the distance; but confident of being heard at least by the rotunda loungers and Darby, or perhaps by the stray reporter who was purchasing a sour apple in the corner.

Five hundred M.C.'s in previous years, in the same place, had numbered the days of the republic; but they seemed to get on very sunshiningly, and in orderly sequence, nevertheless. So, shaking his head as the five hundred before him had shaken their heads, from the time of the Shay rebellion to the nullification threat, Lysander Lillington, M.C., betook himself to the law library of the Supreme Court, and inquiring for a duplicate Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, sat down to examine some statistics; and mentally resolving to soon move for a Committee of Inquiry into the domestic habits of the librarian up stairs.

The crowd in the rotunda had now become quite large, as the hour for the day's session approached, and Darby had left it in pursuit of his own appropriate duties. Mingling with the shuffle of feet was a buzz which seemed to confuse into one sound all the conversation of the threading groups. The buzz went up to the dome and down to the pavement again, and then bounding up to the pillars bounced back to the walls, and ran along these in every direction, and out at the porticoes, and down the steps, and through the parks, and up the broad avenues, and circled the Government buildings, and fed the Department offices, and encountering counter buzzes, reduplicated the buzz on hotel steps and in the bar-rooms, to finally circumvent the President's mansion, and become a drowned buzz in the marshes of the Potomac.

The buzz, or something else, seemed to sadly confuse an old man, who, apart from all the groups, stood before one of Trumbull's revolutionary paintings. It seemed to daze an old dog who crouched at his heels, oblivious of the danger his tail was exposed to as it invited the toes of the passers-by to that crushing amusement which belongs to Washington life. The master looked at the picture in utter unconcern of the crowd, and the dog gazed into the face of the old man with that earnestness which belongs to a canine appreciation of pat-and-bone kindness. The veteran was past the Psalmist's verge of life. He leaned upon a stout hickory staff; and his attitude, lifting the red flannel cap under his large-brimmed hat, displayed a few white locks circling a huge scar, that was like to glow and fade in the patriotic sunlight reflected from the battle scene on the canvas in the panel.

"Courage, Ranger—courage, my old dog; in a few months we will win it," muttered the old man, turning from the artist to the crouching animal.

It sprang up from lethargy in an instant, and with a bark of joyful response leaped toward the picture.

"Hello! you Sir!" growled a voice from behind a pillar; "we don't allow dogs in here—take it out—take—"

Here the figure of one of the watchmen came forth; but as he saw the old man stretching his staff over the animal protectingly, his tone changed.

"Oh, Captain Sherburne, is it you? You're privileged, you know; but please keep him quiet, for 'xample's sake."

"Who is that?" asked a by-stander of the watchman, as the old man and the dog moved on to the next painting—the Surrender at Yorktown—that now fascinated both master and dog.

"Captain Sherburne, Sir; one of the revolutionary heroes; been here these many years, trying to get the Bill for half-pay passed. Spunky old fellow, too. Stuck to the business well. We all know him here. Senator Wright, last spring, took up the Bill, and moved it on. Harry Clay made a speech that brought the gallery crying down stairs—all about stars, and scars, and battles, and old soldiers. If it gets through the House this winter the old gentleman will have lots of money. Dare say he needs it."

The by-stander, approaching the old hero, took off his hat in salute.

"Sarvant, Sir," said the veteran, and Ranger winked the same thing.

"You are an old soldier, I hear," began the stranger. "I am glad to meet you; for although an English traveler, I honor and venerate the survivors of the old American guard who so gallantly fought for their freedom."

The old man took off his hat in acknowledgment, and the scar disclosed seemed to glow approvingly.

"And I hear, too, that your country neglects you. Pardon me for tendering you a souvenir of my veneration for valor:" and he held out a purse.

Down went the hat over the scar, that shrank into an angry white spot, and "trac" fell the cane with a sharp sound on the pavement. There was a low growl, too, from the dog.

"Englishman! do you dare to insult an old soldier?" said the Captain, again and again "trac"-ing his cane on the floor, while the dog crouched into an ominous heap of mastiff-ship.

"No, Sir, my country is tardy—tardy—only tardy—not neglectful!"

The stranger, too astonished or bewildered for immediate utterance, still held the purse in his hand, at which Ranger directed his eyes, as if perceiving in it the cause of offense.

"Has it come to this, that an old soldier is approached in charity by a foreigner and he a Britisher? Oh, General! General! you wouldn't have thought it." And he turned to the picture as if for consolation.

"If language can assure you of the depth of my apology, my dear Sir—as I see you are offended, and I was indeed abrupt and wrong—then you may yourself dictate the language."

"That's me yonder!" cried the veteran, not heeding what was said, and pointing with his cane—"that's me to the right of the American column. How young I was—how young—under thirty—and a captain!"

He had forgotten the present in contemplation of the past; which the stranger perceiving, made haste to pocket the purse, and so release himself from the dog's crouch and glare. The Englishman stood as if expecting the soldier to say something more. But the picture and the past were engrossing. He advanced and extended his hand.

"Sarvant, Sir—sarvant," said the old man, taking it, and now recollecting the matter. "You don't know an old soldier in this land. He asks charity only from his Government."

So, with a hearty shake of the hand, the intruder on the old soldier's meditations mingled with the groups, and Captain Sherburne, attended by his dog, moved down the east passage toward one of the Committee rooms—Ranger turning about to look angrily at the picture, as if his master's troubles were somehow connected with that.

The room which he sought had over the door "Committee on Claims." He knocked at it, and immediately a good-humored voice cried "Come in!" and he entered.

"Bow-wow-wow," said a facetious gentleman, at a table on which were a brace of bottles and a plate of crackers. "Look here, Smug, here's a bow-wow come for relief."

The facetious gentleman was a youth just installed as Clerk of the Committee. Smug (short for Samuel Smucker, Esquire) had been an old Department Clerk since the Monroe era of good feeling, and who did the researches and statistics for the Committee.

"I beg pardon—sarvant, Sir"—began the old man, looking at the young gentleman and his bottles and plate—"but I see I have made a mistake; my old eyes deceive me sometimes; I thought I saw Committee Room over the door:" and he began bowingly to move out.

"Hold on, bow-wow," responded the young man, throwing a bit of cheese playfully toward the dog, who merely sniffed it and looked up to see if the place was a wigwam of peace wherein the salt might be acceptably partaken.

"For shame, Bob!" interrupted Smug, now turning around from his seat at a corner table—"this is old Captain Sherburne and his dog Ranger—one of the Capitol institutions, Bob!"

"Sarvant, Sir—you have the advantage of me," said the Captain, advancing, while Ranger, now perceiving in his master's movements that war was not the order of the day, snapped down the cheese and came toward the table for more.

"Samuel Smucker, Esquire, familiarly called Smug"—responded Bob, doing the honors with a flourish—"Department Clerk and Sub-Committee on Claims, ain't afraid of any guillotine, although upon its shining blade be inscribed 'To the victors belong the spoils.'"

"Hush!" cried Smug, "and cheese the dog can't you?"

"I want to see the Chairman," continued the Captain, taking a chair.

"Ha, ha, ha! d'ye hear that, Smug?" laughed Bob; "wants to see the Chairman? So do we; don't we, Smug? D'ye see this pile of papers? they want to see him, too. Gaze on these four walls; they'd like to see him. But maybe he'll come next year, or the year after."

"Is it about your Bill?" said Smug, motioning for silence from Bob. "If so, Captain, Military Affairs has got that."

"Well, you see as how I've been there," answered the veteran, "and the person in charge looked over all the papers and said this Committee had it."

"Maybe it's Pensions, though," said Smug, soliloquizing to himself. "In these days every thing gets mixed up."

"It's been in all three in my time," said the old man, somewhat querulously.

"Here, take a drink," cried Bob, recalled to his sense of hospitality by (what he called in confidence to Smug afterward) "the thirsty tone of the hearty old buck." "And it's prime ale—best in the district."

"Thank you. Sarvant, Sir!" responded the old man, taking the glass. "Your health, Sir—and yours!"

"And all our healths—bow-wow included," added the facetious clerk of the responsible and attentive Committee.

"And success to the Bill, too," interpolated Smug.

"Been in all three Committees in my time," repeated the old man, setting down his glass, and wiping the ale-froth from his lips with a white handkerchief, on which was written his name, in the neat, Italian hand of a lady.

At the sight of it Smug jogged Bob, and said, sotto voce, "Grandfather of the pretty girl who sings at St. Bridget's, that you saw last Sunday."

"Ah, indeed," said Bob to himself; and instantly jumping down from the table, on which he had been sitting, he advanced to the old man as if he had just then been introduced, and shook him heartily by the hand, patting the dog in a confused retreat to the table. Remembrances of beauty always confused Bob. It's a way those remembrances have with young men who don't go much into the best of ladylike society.

"I'm glad you're going to help the Bill," said the old man, coupling the friendly hand-grasp with his thoughts; "and I'm glad it's here, in your keeping."

"But is it?" whispered Bob to Smug.

Smug shook his head, and replied, in whisper,

"It's Military Affairs—must be."

The veteran apparently heard the word; and he repeated,

"It's been in all three in my time; and I ought to know something about Committees. I was dropped from the Pension-list in 1821, and that brought me first to Washington, with Lawyer Montrose, who married my daughter. He fixed it. They said it was all a mistake. I wish he was alive; but Mary's dead, too, and now only Agnes left. Dear Agnes! The money's to be for her—and you'll help the Bill—and all three's had it. Then I came again in 1830 to help pass this Bill—"

And here the veteran fell off into incoherent mutterings, taking the glass which Bob had again filled.

"I say, Smug, what is this precious Bill he's talking of? Remember I've just come. Post me, won't you?"

"Oh, a Bill for giving half-pay to the Revolutionary officers. I've heard say that Congress passed such a bill very early in the Government. But before the money was raised another Congress repealed it. Daniel Webster, who's a good friend to the old soldiers, says it's vested rights, and Congress is bound in honor to pass it. The House did vote it once, but it got swamped up stairs. The old 'un's right; it has been in all the Committees. He's lived here, urging it, for seven years. Wright put it through the Senate last spring; but the House is getting economical now the Kinderhooker is in."

"Talking of economy," said Bob, a bright idea seeming to strike him, "that reminds me of Lillington—he's on both Committees."

"So he is," answered Smug. "Why, Bob, your improving! He's minority man on both, because he loves to go in for economy, eh? The Opposition always go in for economy—always!"

And Smug winked with that sagacity of statesmanship supremely felt by all Department clerks of twenty years' service.

"Captain, it has just occurred to us (with emphasis on the word 'us') that the Hon. Lysander Lillington is upon both Claims and Military Affairs, and if you call on him at his rooms you'll find out all about it."

"Sarvant, Sir!" said the soldier, rising from his incoherence as Smug addressed him. "Thank you; I'll go there to-night."

"Better leave the dog behind," said Bob, opening the door, and thinking of the charming grand-daughter; "the Hon. Lysander is a wolf-dog on the Treasury-box himself, and very savage, and there might be a fight and trouble, you see."

And so the old man left the sub-Committee to their alternation of public time and private enjoyment neatly adjusted into a Congressional sandwich, the like of which many in Washington bite upon and enjoy under the head of "Stationery."

The honorable gentleman alluded to was a veteran Member of Congress. An original Adams man, he had been now eight years in opposition, and was likely to be in the same rank for four years longer. He had a life-lease of his constituency, which, to do him justice, he amply deserved to hold, so far as mental ability and industry went. He was, however, painfully impressed with his own importance, and held rather extreme notions of economy. Hence his judgment was often warped, and his heart often wronged by his head; between these two came often a struggle. Born to competency, and having a taste for public life, he had followed politics as his profession. He had never married—the death of his "sweet-heart," as the gossips of his village said, having left him a true lover through life. But he had adopted the son of a deceased sister, and had educated him to follow in his own footsteps. Ned Leslie, otherwise Edmund Burke Lillington Leslie (the Burke added by the guardian-uncle to weigh the Edmund, and mark his destiny with a white stone; and the Lillington joined on by right of adoption: thus making a most respectable tribute to the alphabet from the autograph), had been educated at Harvard (both in the University and in the law school), and at the age of twenty-three was living with his kinsman at Washington, carefully adjusting and scaling the ladder of politics.

"He shall be as William Pitt the younger: educated to statesmanship from his cradle," said the honorable uncle, feeling himself every inch Pitt the elder.

But, unfortunately for the political horticulturist, the grapes thus forced refused to ripen; and Ned, although fond of his law, his poetry, and his literature, and as good a castle-builder as lives under the age of twenty-five, had become thoroughly disgusted with his one year's residence at Washington, and the political connections and society surrounding him. He was loth to let his uncle know it, out of regard to his pride and gratitude for his kindness. At first he was reasonably unhappy. The kinsman's devotion to the duties of place left him much leisure for himself; and while the uncle flattered himself that Ned was journeying from committee-room to committee-room, or cramming in the library, or haunting the levées of the great men, or frequenting House and Senate, and so preparing to become the American Pitt, the nephew had found the sweetest solace for his private griefs.

In his rides on the Georgetown Road he had often noticed with interest the graceful bearing of a young woman whom he had seen daily entering the Georgetown school of the Ladies of the Sacred Heart—a scholar or a teacher. A spiteful veil, however, had left to fancy only a tracery of the features. One evening, while on horseback, he saw some men approach from a lane toward her, and heard a cry. A few bounds of his thorough-bred, and he was among them, dismounted, and gallantly beating off the party, who were of the drunken loungers about Washington.

It is an old story, and one which happens every day somewhere. But is every thing old in heart-stories to be rejected? Then shut down the windows of Beauty's conservatories, and keep Cupid out in the cold; and let his arrows rust, and the little god freeze to death, even in sight of roses and tulips!

The young lady, lifting her veil, beamed from her features (no need of fancy now, Master Ned; and, oh! how short-sighted that fancy of yours had been!) such loveliness of gratitude that Ned then and there carried no heart of his own back to his saddle or to the rooms at Gadsby's, where uncle and nephew prosecuted together their emulations of Pitt the elder and Pitt the younger.

Ned felt bound to call the next morning. Fate put his hand on the knocker just as the door opened, and she came out for her walk. He must do escort-duty so far as the convent door. He had to talk as he went. Common politeness demanded all these. But the Muse of History thinks that it was more than common politeness which discovered for Ned, during the hour's walk, that she was named Agnes Montrose, and was an orphan daughter and teacher in the convent in whose faith her father had, on his dying bed, requested her to be instructed.

She was the grand-daughter of Captain Sherburne. His small pension was barely enough to give him necessaries. But she was as gifted mentally as she had been physically; and her sweet voice and Madonna-like demeanor won for her enough of salary to eke out handsomely the ways of life for grandfather and herself. The Sisters would have wished her to live with them; but could she desert the aged relative who was pursuing Congress for that which he knew would give his darling Aggie subsistence and comfort, when life, pension, and affection should be left at the cemetery gate? And she sang in the Church of St. Bridget's, too: which employment added a trifle more of income.

This, and more than this—unnecessary to here explain—did Ned learn in his repeated visits to the boarding-house of Mrs. Dyce, where lived Captain Sherburne and his grandchild.

The old veteran cared not to inquire who Ned was. He knew him as the benefactor of his child, and that was enough. Darby Dyce was proud to have for visitor at his house the rising nephew and heir of the Congressman: and he asked no questions and told no tales; though he often theatrically thought, "Maybe if the Hon. Lysander knew his Pitt the younger was in love with a pensioner's grand-daughter, and forsaking the thorny paths of politics for the roseate lanes of love, he might not be so well pleased." Agnes was an innocent and guileless girl; as ignorant of the world's ways as if she had been a dweller in the Shetland Isles. She only knew that Ned was good and kind to her, and had a rich uncle who was equally good and kind to him, and that she was happy when they were together, and was missing something when he staid away. Ned—the sly young Pitt—had read the story of the lady-slipper which belonged to his prototype, and was worshiped so lovingly by him for all his marriage to his country; and he knew very well that he was in love, and laying up for himself either a large fund of happiness or an incalculable amount of misery without any medium sum. So he concealed his affections and his intimacies from the uncle, and went on blindly, hoping all would be well. The Hon. Lysander might have found the thing out had he been an early riser, for Ned and Agnes were always together at the church. When the trembling soprano voice thrilled from the choir through the sacred edifice, you might be sure those moistened Protestant eyes down stairs belonged to Ned. But an M.C. in Washington at church? Preposterous!

Ned had only arrived in Washington the day before our story begins. He had been detained by business of his uncle, who preceded him by a fortnight. And when the elder and the younger Pitt parted at the Capitol gate—the former to hunt up his library statistics and air his rhetoric with Darby Dyce, the younger had briskly walked toward the Georgetown house.

While Ned was endeavoring physically to catch up with his thoughts, that had already reached the premises and were seated in the parlor waiting for her coming and for his tardy steps, Agnes prepared for her school.

How often those thoughts of Ned had gone up to her room, picturing it like a temple where saints were on the walls and angels sculptured overhead, and all the loveliness of piety hallowing the sacred place! The temple was a small room twelve by nine—builder's measurement. The carpet was faded, and the bedstead and chairs and table were of elderly mahogany. The mantle-piece was wooden, and the doors yearned for paint. But what fairy made one forget all this in admiration of the fresh lilac wall-paper; and of the frost-work of curtains, clothing the windows and covering the bedstead, as in winter the ugly shrub-oak is dotted into beauty by the newly-fallen snow; and of the dazzling toilet-cloth, which seemed built up into a wedding-cake pin-cushion; and of the hyacinths and camellias on the corner-table, just beginning to bloom; and of the cabinet paintings over the mantle; and of the prie-dieu in the embroidered temple behind the bed; and of the parterre of muslin, silks, and baregés by the half-opened closet-door; and of the atmosphere of refinement which seemed to belie mahogany and paint and Georgetown Road, whispering instead of palaces long ago—what fairy was it, but that one which watches over all women's home-temples, and blesses this mannish life of ours with its recollections and reminiscences even when we are behind the desk or are sculling over the dirty ocean of worldliness?

The best of all things to admire there was the image in the looking-glass (Ned would have dubbed it mirror). It showed her in the act of tying bonnet-strings. The hat, a coquettish black straw, hinting of summer on the outer braids, all dotted with golden wheat grains, but suggestive of winter inside, where the quilted lilac silk rejected the thrifty oil-silk between, and came proudly out to tinge the cheeks that had no need of tinge when Ned was by. How would he have loved to stand there, and with the glance that lovely absence always prepares, have proceeded to admire the auburn hair—like flossy silk—and so tender that one could see where last the cruel comb had crushed the tender fibres! How he would have worshiped the blue eyes, which appeared to him always in the church as saint-light, whose niches were the arching brows, and whose curtains were the lashes to be dropped when worship time was over! But Ned was a square distant when Agnes left the house, and as the reflection of the mirror stood suddenly at the corner before him he bounded forward, and, seizing her hand, seemed to invite some new chevalier to that rescue which had led to their friendship.

"Aggie!"

"Ned!"

Not much in those two words as they stand up in clear type—is there? Can any printer set up the tones which belonged to their utterance at that corner by the Georgetown Road?

Now that was all which was said at the meeting. Four months gone by, too, since the last one. And I've an idea that if you had seen the lilac come out upon the cheek, in all its pride, from the bonnet, and had heard that sigh from beneath Ned's watch-pocket in the new vest, you would have placed small reliance upon the omissions of any of those words like "darlings" and "loves," which can be filched so cheaply and quickly from any dictionary.

First a pause, when the eyes only were speaking; and then she said,

"Oh Ned, don't walk with me, please. There, go home—come to-night—I can't."

"Don't walk with you? Why—why—"

He did walk, however, ten steps or so, and she did also. Her bonnet strings became loosened, and she twitched them beneath her chin (a mere acorn in shape, with dimples round about for a cup) in that dexterous and decisive knót which women manufacture when they are in haste.

"Not walk with you, Aggie?" (The tone was that of a music-box on its last note of a Beethoven waltz.)

"No, Ned, for the Sisters, since the Tennessee elopement, have requested that neither day-scholar nor teacher should be seen attended on their way to or from school, except by a relative—and that you are not, you know, Ned. And I've promised it; but I'm glad to see you. Come to-night. There, good-by. I must keep a promise, and it's for example."

And she hurried on, leaving him in a bewilderment, repeating to himself the words "elopement" and "promise" over and over again, in a tone which, if the Hon. Lysander had heard, would have frightened him from his dreams of grandeur and patriot marriage entertained for his nephew. But how can the best of us keep the diamond Forget-me-not from going out of the window, off from the cushion, unless we see or hear the chattering magpie that is watching it from the trees near by?

II.

It is evening. Congress has adjourned over three days in token of the Christian holiday approaching. The buzz which has been for nine hours fluttering over the city now seeks, moth-like, the brilliant lights of hotel ante-chambers. No part of the buzz, however, has been allowed to enter the suit of rooms occupied by the Hon. Lysander Lillington and nephew. That distinguished economist has been writing. His table is loaded down with blue books and red books, calf books and cloth books. Its leaves groan with the weight of figures above it. Niles's Register is open on the table at a reference spot. The librarian must have got through his cocoa by the sight of the books scattered on the chairs around! The shelves of the national book-room had evidently been placed under heavier contribution than the rules allowed.

But the Honorable member had arisen, and now stood by the window, addressing the imaginary mass meeting in the distance. There was an unbounded expanse of vacant lots before his vision, ending in marshes; but his constituency were mentally expanded far beyond the marshes themselves.

He is in the midst of a glowing sentence, as you may see by the majestic wave of his hand, when a knock at the door rouses him.

A servant presents a card.

"Captain Sherburne," he reads.

"And a dog," adds the servant, "with him."

"Leave the dog outside, and show the Captain up," returns the M.C., methodically. "Some party hound, I dare say, after meat, or some naval captain, with a story of abuses. The Government must come to my doctrine by-and-by. What do we want of an army at all, or of a navy? Wars are over. Commerce is King. Commerce protects itself. Or what need of ambassadors? Trade is the universal diplomat now. It will save the nation millions per year."

The M.C. had turned from the window to walk the floor, as if thus conning a new speech upon retrenchment, when the door again opened, and the old Revolutionary hero of the Rotunda tottered in.

"Take good care of the dog," said he, half turning to the servant. "Don't beat him; he'll lie any where if you're good to him: and he's a firm friend."

There were as yet no lights in the room, and the old Captain had not perceived its occupant.

The latter spoke: "Don't trouble yourself about the dog, my good man. I presume our interview can't be long; for my time belongs to my country, who begrudges us any idleness."

"Does it?" said the old man, turning toward the voice and answering sharply. "Does the country begrudge us?—servant, Sir."

Candles being brought, the M.C. and the old soldier stood face to face.

"Some beggar," said the former to himself.

"A stern face," said the latter, aside, as both seated themselves by the table, where, besides the other books, an atlas lay open.

"The country is large, and powerful, and wealthy," said the old man, pointing to the maps. "It was otherwise in my prime. I think I loved it more then."

"To what am I indebted for the honor of this visit?" began the M.C., fidgeting uneasily on his chair, as if the guest was an intruder not only upon his twilight reflections, but threatened to also usurp his province of speech-making.

"This," said the old soldier, tapping the scar upon his head as he pulled up the red cap, "and that"—unfolding a printed page and handing it across the table.

"Hm—m! Senate bill, 164. Hm—m! I see—the long-talked-of act for reviving the half-pay."

"Introduced upon notice by the Honorable Silas Wright," returned the old man, and borrowing for the nonce the mechanical tone of the clerks.

"And already passed, I see by your memorandum at the foot."

"After remarks by Harry Clay and Tom Benton in its favor—passed, unanimously," continued the soldier, in the same tone.

"And now in the House, I see."

"In the House, on reference to a Committee to consider and report," concluded the Captain.

"Well, old gentleman, I perceive you've got the Parliamentary lingo pretty well by heart," returned the Congressman, in a more jocular tone.

"Ought to have by this time. Was here three years in Jefferson's day establishing my claim to a pension, and two more years in Monroe's time, after I was dropped—by mistake, they said. It got right after a weary while. And now this will be the seventh winter I've been here trying for this bill. It's a good bill, and an honest one, and was once almost a law, and will make Agnes comfortable when grandfather's under sod."

The old fellow paused for breath.

"You incorrigible lobbyist!" returned the M.C., breaking the pause; "and have you haunted Washington and pestered members so many years? Who's your member? Why didn't you correspond with the War Department? What do you waste your time and money here for? Where's the report in your favor?"

These questions were uttered with the volubility and precision of a martinet Committeeman.

In a saddened tone the soldier made answer: "I have no member—no home now but here. There were letters written and sent by the hundred. They were of no use. No one minds letters in Washington. I've learned that much here. The report in my favor was first made in the House four years ago; but it died on the adjournment. Then I got again on the docket. Last spring I met Mr. Wright on the cars. He heard my story, and his big heart opened at once. So did Harry Clay's. They brought me on the floor. They pointed to my scars. The bill was passed in an hour."

"There's an example of reckless legislation," cried the Congressman to the imaginary mass meeting in the distance, and waving his hand as if to impress the intelligence upon the country. "Benton's great heart, indeed! And Henry Clay's good-nature! What a shameful suppression of parliamentary law and destruction of precedent! No Committee—no report—no stages, and money voted from the Treasury on the impulse of spasmodic patriotism."

The M.C. turned from the mass meeting in the distance to the figure at his table.

"And act speedily, please—time nears—I may not see many Christmases more. I'm ninety years old on New-Year's Day."

"Ninety? Hm—m. This looks like imposture," said the honorable member to himself. "These Revolutionary heroes are actually increasing as time wears on. Here's a chance for cross-examination and exposure. Do you say you are a Revolutionary soldier?"

"I don't say so. This says so," responded the old man (rubbing his scar), "and these say so (pointing to his limbs and hair)."

"H—m—m—m. Scars are got in street fights, and—"

"You are right, and it was got in a street fight," interrupted the old soldier.

"Ha! I thought so," and the M.C. turned again for approbation to the mass meeting far away.

"The street fight was at Lexington. I was a boy of eighteen, sent on at midnight from Concord with a message to Adams and Hancock at the Clark House. It was not long after the Pitcairn murder on the green when I was going through the village. 'Walter,' said a man running by, 'the blood is shed—get a weapon—a scythe—a gun—an any thing.' I had heard the musketry, and knew what it meant. I still ran on. A scarlet coat on horseback cut at me—me, a boy—an unoffending, unarmed boy, and here's the scar as the sword glanced by, and I leaped the fence stunned the moment after, but in that hour made a man and a soldier." As the old man spoke the hue of youth seemed to return and his age to retire.

There was a noise in the entry outside just here, a bark and a rush, and then a scratch at the door.

"It is Ranger; he must come in; he knows the story all by heart; he knows I'm telling it; he loves to be by and hear it," and, almost straightened back to the Lexington time, the old Captain opened the door and let in the dog, who retreated, growling, under the table, near to the chair of the startled and astounded host.

"I was at Bunker Hill—in the prison ship. I escaped. I was at Valley Forge."

The door again opened, and ushered in Ned with another batch of books and papers. The dog smelled him in an instant, and bounding at him, began to whine recognition. Ranger had not forgotten the four months no more than his mistress had.

"Hello! Ranger, what brought you here?" said he, putting down the books; and then, looking around, he perceived Captain Sherburne. His heart beat violently, and he would have gone out were it possible.

"You know this dog, then, and perhaps this troublesome old soldier here?" interrupted the uncle, rising to take some of the papers.

"Know the old soldier and his dog? Ay, that he does—don't you, Ned?" broke in the Captain, "and Agnes, too?"

"Why, d'ye see," continued the hero, delighted at having found an ally, and turning alternately to the confused nephew and the wondering uncle, "it was Ned who saved Agnes from insult last winter. But mayhap you don't know Ned?"

"I should think I ought to, Sir," returned the M.C.; "he is my nephew and adopted son."

"Then he has told you all about it," the hero eagerly continued. "Why, Ned, you never spoke to us down at Darby Dyce's that you were nephew to a Congressman, and my bill so important."

"Will you explain this rigmarole, Sir?" said the Hon. Lysander, employing his most oratorical tone, and using his severest parliamentary manner to his nephew, whom Ranger still persecuted with embarrassing attentions in the corner by the door.

"There, Captain!—good-night to you. I'll try and help the matter," began Ned, somewhat recovering himself, and anxious for the departure of the old soldier—opening the door for him, and whistling off Ranger.

"Thank you, Ned—thank you;" and the young man soon led him to the front steps, and, retracing his way again, met his uncle.

Ned's story was short, and to the point. The era of veracity, long dreaded, had dawned. He told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, to his astounded and enraged uncle, who stormed and swore alternately at Darby Dyce, lodging-houses, his nephew, and the old man and the girl (as he termed her gratingly on his nephew's ears), not forgetting the dog—in dread of whom, probably the legs were trembling as he paced to and fro. He recapitulated his benefits to his nephew, and adverted to his hopes and his plans. How had care been rewarded with hypocrisy and concealment! How was the future imperiled with this foolish fancy of a girl in a third-class Washington lodging-house! Was not Ned to wed his country? Or, if he married, was it not to be for power, and family, and influence? Did he love the person? Had he asked her in marriage? Had he written to her? How far was he compromised? These and other questions came at Ned like a feu de joie.

"No, I have never said a word to her on the subject. We love—and that is all."

"Oh! that is all, Mr. Romeo, is it? We love—do we? Promise me, Sir, by all that you regard in the memory of your mother, who placed you under my charge on her dying bed, that you will not see her again."

While the uncle was enraged and stormed Ned seemed to recover all his energies, and became cool, silent, and thoughtful. In a low, sweet voice, he said, "Uncle, were you never in love?"

The veteran politician dropped on the nearest chair. Loosing his cravat, he motioned to the door of Ned's bedroom and study. And without waiting for an answer to his demand, the M.C., quivering either with rage or a new emotion, sought his own.

"Poor Agnes! you will expect me," said Ned to himself, "and I can not come."

She did expect him, and waited for him in her little room until the Captain returned to tell her "it was all right now. He had found out that 'our Ned' was the son of a rich Congressman who had their bill in charge."

Agnes waited, and her heart told her all was not right now; that something had happened. But, retiring to her little oratory, she forgot her new-born fears in accustomed prayers.

Nor were her eyes the only ones which looked upon a Madonna picture that night, before the solemn bed-time. The so recently worldly-minded and angry kinsman sat beside his cabinet with a miniature before him. As he gazed, he seemed to read, written upon the forehead, "Uncle, have you never loved?" and to hear the words spoken over and over again by the lips of the portrait. He thus looked and so heard that night, long after Ned and Agnes, in their respective dwellings, were sleeping the hopeful sleep of youth; and long after the old soldier had commenced, under leadership of the god of dreams, to fight over the past, with Ranger crooning in his doze before the fire, and to look toward a speedy fulfillment of all his holy wishes for his grand-daughter's competency in life.

III.

But however great had been the victory of the heart over the head during his midnight vigil, the latter resumed its sway when, on the next morning, the Congressman entered the Capitol grounds, and came within that atmosphere which to breathe seems to transmute all emotions into the one controlling passion of ambition; so that even deputy-clerks hope to become Presidents or cabinet-ministers. Again encountering Darby Dyce in the rotunda, Mr. Lillington took him severely to task for aiding and abetting his nephew in a love intrigue with the offspring of a mere Capitol hanger-on—a beggar for national charity—and, mayhap, an old lobby impostor, whom the present generation might be credulous enough to support.

"My worthy Sir," said Dyce, in his most dramatic style, but keeping to the political rôle, "my policy is masterly inactivity in every thing not directly concerning me. The young lady is beautiful and accomplished, although a portionless teacher. The young gentleman, for aught I knew, was his own master. How could I check the course of love, or interrupt its seeming smoothness, with any impertinent pebbles?"

And when Darby came home to dinner he imparted the interview to his bustling wife; who, making haste to Agnes's room after dessert, proceeded to a well-intentioned but mortifying conversation. The holiday vacation in the convent school had that day commenced. She had whispered the night before to herself, "He will hear of this vacation to-morrow morning, and will come to see me then." Instead of Ned came Mistress Dyce, whose ideas of crossed-love affairs smacked of the Nurse scenes with Juliet that she had been accustomed to play in upon the stage. Agnes, after the womanly aggravator had retired, sought her grandfather, and from him learned how Ned had been cross-examined by the uncle, and so brought to the old man's comprehension the truths ruthlessly impaled on the tongue of Mrs. Dyce.

"Dost thou love him, Aggie?" said the old man. Claspng his neck, she sobbed upon his shoulder an answer which stretched his age-worn heart-strings to an agonized tension.

Meanwhile Ned commenced to tutor himself into obedience to his uncle, unto whom he felt he owed education, and intellectual nurture, and gratitude of no common grade. But the hours lagged heavily by during two days of separation that succeeded so brief an interview, and one so liable to cruel interpretation. The third was Christmas Day, which on this year came with Sunday.

He knew now where to see her. Impliedly he had promised not to visit or to write to her. Perhaps absence, without explanations, were best. No trysting had been consecrated as yet. But to meet her going to church, or returning thence, would not break his resolutions, nor cross his uncle's request. There is no casuist like the lover.

Awakened early on the Christmas morning, he walked, breakfastless, to St. Bridget's, and again listened to the dear voice from the hidden choir, swelling and dying away through the edifice. He fancied that it was sweeter than ever—as if, losing some of earthly tones, it sought for higher sympathy.

Contrary to the custom of almost a lifetime, his uncle had also arisen early on Christmas morning; still, all of the second and third nights the portrait came between his eyelids and that world of sleep into which his vision sought in vain an entrance, and during all these second and third nights the question, "Uncle, have you never loved?" seemed whispered into his ears. Mingling with a little crowd of church-goers, and swayed by irresistible impulse, he found himself in the church. That voice from the choir? This well-remembered voice! Those tones which carried him back many, many years! Were they delusions, or did the dead speak and sing to his mortal ear? Thus questioning himself, the uncle at the church-gates encountered his nephew, when service was over—each surprised, but each repressing its manifestation.

"Ned," said the former, with more of kindness in his voice than he had used in two days, "have you ever been here before?"

The start was equivalent to an affirmative; and so the elder accepted it, as he continued:

"But who is the singer? Is that the attraction?"

"It is she—the old man's grand-daughter," was his simple and touching answer, as his voice somewhat broke.

"Am I ever to be thus tricked into feeling, and conquered into a foolishness?" cried head to heart. His uncle turned the corner, saying to Ned,

"Meet me in an hour, at breakfast."

"Alas! I shall not see her, after all," he said; "for he has turned to the side street, into which she will enter, and I dare not follow."

So, with heavy heart, he walked toward his room.

As Ned anticipated, the parties met by the choir-door. The soldier recognized the Congressman, and, taking off his hat, said, "Sarvant, Sir! and a merry Christmas to you! But remember the old soldier. Don't forget Lexington and the prison-ship, Sir; and that I'm ninety years old on New-Year's Day."

Instinctively the proud politician had paused and raised his hat, as Agnes threw back her veil and sadly smiled. The old man had whispered to her,

"'Tis Ned's uncle, my dear!"

More illusion? Was this the face of the miniature? No! for the original of that had been food for worms many Christmases ago. Yes, it was illusion. Some trick here. Grandfather and nephew were leagued together to lead head away, and give the heart the mastery. Sherburne! He had never known one of that name. Not one of her family had been—yes, one. And he? Why, he was dead, too—unmarried. Ay, it was logically a delusion, and an illusive snare!

Thus he thought and pondered, as he walked hastily and moodily away, leaving his abrupt courtesy to Agnes's sorrowing remembrance, for not even Ned was with him. Nor during the breakfast meal did he exchange a word with his nephew, beyond commonplaces of the usual stamp when conversation, like appetite, becomes forced.

He had been invited out to a Christmas dinner, as had been Ned. The latter pleaded sickness, which his uncle understood. The Congressman went, however, and proved himself the merriest of the party—head before heart this heat! The atmosphere was congenial. The Cabinet, the diplomatic corps, army and navy, and the beauty of the Capitol, each sent representatives to the perfection of the feast. And as the repartee chased the bottle around, and good fellowship awakened old resolves of family pride, the Hon. Lysander Lillington forgot the portrait and the delusion, and wondered how long it would be before Ned should drop his fancy, and, dismissing the pensioner's daughter, who taught in a convent school upon week days, and sang every Sunday in a Catholic church, choose wife—if wife he must have, to distract ambition—from among such representatives of birth and family fortune as were now up stairs in the drawing-room, enjoying the merry Christmas in a properly dignified way.

But at eventide, in the solitude of his own room, the Congressman remembered the choir voice and the face by the church door, and the merry Christmas greeting from the old hero, who bade him think of Lexington and the prison ship, of suffering and of victory.

And so remembering, with the counter exhilaration of the feast withdrawn, their faces and voices seemed to strangely mingle. Next, shadows of the olden time passed before him and gathered about his arm-chair. The portrait arose out of its case, and assuming the robes and mien of the Goddess of Liberty, came between the table and the Christmas log in the fire-place, and seemed to motion him into dreamy silence. Delicious music lulled his senses as the figure, radiant with the beauty of maidenhood, pointed upward. There were sweet hymns which he heard; and their burden was of martyr faith and martyr triumphs in the holy cause of liberty. As the music would for a time cease, the goddess would wave her cap toward the familiar Capitol, as seen from his window. It would seem to vanish, and in its place would appear scenes of the by-gone Revolutionary time.

"Hearken, the earliest martyr anthem," said the maiden in the panoply of liberty, still stretching her beautiful hand, crowned with the starry cap, toward him. And immediately the invisible choir, with the one remembered voice sweetly predominant, sang: "How great for our country to die, in the front rank to perish; firm with breast to the foe, victory's shout in the ear, long they our statues shall crown and in songs our memory cherish; we shall look forth from our heaven, pleased the sweet music to hear." The anthem died away, and eye taking the place of ear in the dreaming man, he saw stretching before him, as though he stood upon an eminence, miles and miles of a New England landscape, a city in the far distance, surrounded by hills on three sides and the ocean encompassing it on the fourth. Sounds of life and drum in all its streets, and scarlet uniforms gleaming in the setting sun. Troops forming into column. Guards and pickets standing at all the streets and roads of egress. None but uniforms permitted to walk or ride away from the city. But as the serried column march rapidly along one or two figures are more hastily stealing in advance, crouching under stone walls, and in the angles of the roads, or cross-cutting fields and skirting the woods—sometimes entering houses; always with finger on the lips and pointing backward, as if to say, "They come; patriots, be ready!" The sun declines, and twilight precedes the night; and yet under the sentinel stars the troops march and the scouts precede. Candles burn all night in houses on the route, and lanterns warningly swing from upper crevices of church steeples. Miles away from the city of scarlet uniforms, that is now in deep repose, men are hastily moving in all the villages, wheeling cannon into thickets, and burying casks and bags and leaden bullets under ground or beneath barn floors. Midnight passes; the bells toll two; upon a village green before a rude, square church resolute men, old and young, in yeoman dress, with various fire-arms, are drawn up in hasty semblance of military rank. The stars glimmer away into the dawn. The morning comes cold and raw. From the road toward the city is heard by the meeting-house array the sound of drum and fife; and soon the scarlet uniforms, that have been marching all the night, stand before the yeomanry. "Disperse, ye villains! Disperse, ye rebels!" cries the man on horseback, drawing sword and wheeling from the sanctuary of peace to fulfill the butchery of war. Fast to the ground stand the yeomanry. The insult is repeated, and for home and for family and for native land they level the private fire-arms, as the serried guns of an oppressing nation meet them muzzle to muzzle. Flashes, and sharp reports, and then the dull clouds overhead scud more grayly as the smoke arises; and next the dewy sod grows more dank as life-blood is poured upon the village green. The yeomanry disperse to cornfields and hedges; and scarlet uniforms vaunt themselves before the church door as the sunlight comes to drive the clouds away, and to smile upon the scattered yeomanry who rally and make further stands for liberty in villages beyond. Not far from the scene of massacre a beardless boy has been escaping over a stone wall, when toward him gallops scarlet uniform on the foaming horse; there is an uplifted hand, a flashing sword, and the boy falls, turning face upward, and the features present the young impression of the hero's face who had led this young maiden, now in the guise of a goddess, into the Christmas choir at St. Bridget's. But list again; a strain of the anthem arises: "We shall look forth from our heaven, pleased the sweet music to hear; we were firm with our breast to the foe and victory's shout in our ear."

"Gaze once more," whispered the sweet voice of the liberty maiden to the Congressman, dreaming in his Christmas chair.

He sees a valley scooped out from bold and rugged mountains, surrounded with ruined mills and deserted forges. He beholds eleven thousand men in Continental array defile around the mountains, and deploying throughout the valley—for days they come, and for hours they march to and fro. The eastern horizon is heavy with snow banks, and the winds from the mountain tops sweep down cuttingly to the marrow, and stilling the blood-current. The sound of axes echo through the woods. Trees fall. Rude huts arise—slab-roofed and plastered with clay. Coatless veterans and shoeless recruits walk to and fro; some with fagots on the back, and others harnessed to artillery cannon-carriages, upon which the heavy timber has usurped the place of cannon. Now the snow falls in driving fury, and the rude huts that have thickly arisen in the valley and over the mountain gorges are weakened with the drifted weight upon them. Blanketless and breadless, with the coarsest food to be cooked over scanty fires, the eleven thousand crouch by day and night in the snow-crowned huts amidst the desolation of winter, and await, with holy hopes and brave hearts, the dawning of some brighter era. "Hunger and nakedness howled like wolves throughout this camp at Valley Forge. There destitution held her court, and ruled with icy sceptre." Such came the burden of another anthem to the dreamer's ears from the invisible choir.

"Look closer yonder," said the sweet voice, directing her cap-crowned hand into a depth of the forest. Lying upon straw, on the outermost hut of all, was the same young man who had been cut down at the fence-side by the sword of the scarlet uniform. Scurvy in his eyes and in his blood and in his limbs, and scurvy binding the young patriot to an inert bed, with scarce a blanket above him. His lips move. Draw near. Are they curses at his lot? Bend the ears closer down.

"Bear on, stout heart. My Concord home was sweet; but suffering for liberty is sweeter still. The red-coats killed my father; and though this be night, joy cometh with the morning."

"Behold yet one more scene," again said the liberty maiden.

In a copse carpeted with snow and hung about with frosted fringes, and by the side of a frozen creek, there kneels upon the crunching ice a patriot General. His arms, put forth from beneath a gray mantle, are folded across his breast; the tears are rolling down his cheeks; and the winter wind hushes itself to deep silence as rises, amidst the cheerless scene, a fervent prayer for courage and relief. As the dreamer gazes the invisible choir sings, and over all the sweet voice of St. Bridget's service: "Oh, who shall know the might of the words he uttered there: the fate of nations turned by the fervor of a prayer! And wouldst thou know the name of the wanderer thus alone? Go read, enrolled in heaven, that prayer of Washington."

The dreamer, tightening his hands upon his chair, seemed wrestling with some potent spell. His breast heaved, and the tears streamed from his closed eyes. But still, with his mental vision, he saw the sweet figure pointing down that vista of the Past.

And he beholds the hulk of a dismantled ship, anchored upon the bosom of a peaceful bay, near to a smiling village. Toward the southward, stretching into the embrace of ocean, a broad harbor. Before the mocking figure-head of horns of plenty, pouring forth fruits and flowers, arises the forest hills of a future metropolis. At the stump of the mast flaunts the red cross of St. George. But smiling village, and broad silvery harbor, and horns of plenty, and quiet forest hills are around only to mock the thousand wretches who call this dismantled ship at once their home and catacomb. Toward it a boat steers its way, crowded with patriot forms. How resolute, how noble, how stalwart they look! Resoluteness—alas!—to wane amidst foul air. Nobleness—alas!—too soon to weaken before the filth of a prison-ship. And stalwart forms—alas!—to shrink into skeletons with unwholesome food, tortured by thirst, suffering for the nursing of the far-away home, and only despair and contagion as the handmaidens of the crowded hatchway. See! from the boat cheerfully leaps up, as if to defy the oppressor's gaze, the form of the young soldier yet outlined in the wearied frame of the Hero of the Rotunda and the suppliant for a nation's charity.

They register his name in a huge book—a catalogue of funeral gloom. They march him over the deck, and thrust him down a hold. How the defiant gaze of upper air has been already deadened at the sight of the hundreds upon hundreds here covered with filthy rags; unshaven, unwashed men, with vermin unheeded creeping over their half-naked limbs! The sunlight pours mockingly down, and the aggravating sounds of liberty are heard from shore to shore. Night comes. Face to back the hundreds upon hundreds lie down to sleep, turning from right to left upon the universal oaken bed at the derisive word of command from the midnight sentinel. Morning dawns, and adown the steaming hatchway is heard the never-varying and daily-spoken voice: "Rebels, turn out your dead!" Every week they muster the dying prisoners on the deck, and at the capstan stands the King's sergeant: "The bounty and liberty for enlistment in the royal service, if you will. Captivity and death is the refusal." But weekly ever in vain; the King's sergeant turns away, and his bounty-money rusts in the pocket of his flaunting uniform amidst the patriot rage.

"List to the final martyr-hymn," whispered the sweet voice; and the choir sang in the dreamer's ear in touching strain:

"By feeble hands their shallow graves were made: no stone memorial o'er their corpses laid: in barren sands and far from home they lie: no friend to shed a tear when passing by."

And then, as the music died finally away, the figure vanished, and the scenes closed, and the chimes of midnight ended the Christmas Day. But still the Congressman sat with the greeting of the soldier uppermost in his mind, and could not shake the fancies off. Would he not now remember Lexington and the stricken youth, the prison-ship and the hero whom suffering could not bribe nor starvation win from the patriot conflict?

Would he yet kindly answer his nephew's question: "Uncle, have you ever loved?"

IV.

Next morning after Christmas Day Captain Sherburne was unable to rise from bed. It was evident he had caught a severe cold—perhaps from standing in the transept of the church in the early morning, waiting for Agnes. She had been often during the night into his room, and at times had found him in a severe fever and flighty—muttering now about the Bill, and then of Ned, and next as if deprecating the Congressman's anger, and again repeating over and over the battle scenes of the past, or childlessly importuning his grandchild for a song—Ranger keeping incessant sentinelship beside the fire, and looking wistfully into her eyes each time her footsteps stole softly in.

She hastily determined to seek a physician; and having been promised a speedy call from an army surgeon near by, who had always been kind to the old man, she returned to his bedside.

"I fear for the result at his time of life, my dear Miss Montrose," said the medical gentleman, "unless his mind can be composed. It is evident that if even false hopes could be excited for the project so near to his heart, that their cherishing would immediately relieve him; and you must do your best."

"Why not try the truth?" said Agnes to herself when the surgeon had retired, leaving some opiates in the room. "Why not seek the Congressman himself, and if he be angry at grandfather and at me for Ned's account, say to him that which may appease him, even though it bring me sadness and desolation?"

That same love which, in a few days, had shown to her more of her heart than she had ever understood before, now taught her both policy and tact.

"I will go instantly," said she. And stopping for a moment in the lodging-house hall below to consult the inevitable Congressional directory to be found in all places at Washington, she was soon at the door of the uncle's rooms.

He was home, and alone; for there remained yet one Congressional vacation day. And as he sat in the chair of his dream, with the untasted breakfast before him, it was apparent that in the struggle of heart over head the former had made most headway; particularly as Ned had that morning suggested he should now be permitted to quit Washington and return to his legal pursuits, as the readiest method of breaking off the intimacy that his uncle repudiated; coupling the suggestion with the request to be permitted a parting interview for explanation. This head-and-heart wrestle was at its height when the servant announced a young lady, and Agnes entered.

With perfect self-possession she advanced to his greeting; for at the first he did not recognize her, until, lifting the veil, again he saw the face of the portrait! Misconstruing his agitation and emotion for anger, she proceeded at once to the object of her visit.

"I believe I address the Hon. Mr. Lillington?"

He bowed without speaking, and as the voice filled his ears he substituted a large easy-chair for the less comfortable one she was about taking.

"And I am the grand-daughter of that Captain Sherburne who called upon you some evenings since in reference to his Bill. I greatly fear that some misapprehension has come from the old gentleman's absorption in his scheme of life—one which is part of his soul, as schemes so often become when brooded over, whether ambitious or otherwise—" —Her auditor winced somewhat here, as heart whispered to head that this was true, too true.

"—And that the misapprehension may warp your feelings toward him. Did he speak of Mr. Edward, your—your—"

At this point of the communication, begun with so much self-possession, her voice faltered. Clearly in this atmosphere of the room heart was fast conquering head on all sides! Especially clear was it when the Congressman, in a softened voice, interrupted:

"Pray do not be agitated, Miss Sherburne."

She recovered herself, and added: "If you please, Sir, that was my mother's name. I am the Captain's grand-daughter. My name is Montrose."

"Montrose!" ejaculated Mr. Lillington, rising suddenly to his feet; "and your father's name was Montrose?"

She also had arisen, and the full light shone upon her face. Her bonnet had fallen somewhat back, and the auburn hair rippled in the sunbeam, while the Madonna features paled with inward agony.

"Yes, Sir—Alexander Montrose."

"Merciful Powers! it is not delusion, and the dead do speak!" he exclaimed with energy, sinking upon the chair, while she moved toward the bell-rope.

"It is nothing; do—do—not ring," he gasped; "at least not yet. And your father?"

"Immediately upon the death of a beloved sister he went into another part of the country from that in which he was bred."

"Ah! my Nelly—my Nelly!" gasped the proud man to himself.

She was standing now by his side, and her presence overpowered and yet soothed him.

"Your father," he continued, taking her hand most tenderly, "was my college friend. I was to have married his sister. I—I—but why speak of it? I alone was to blame. It was all my accursed pride and anger that did it. But she died long ago. And I suppose your father never mentioned her nor me."

"My father died when I was yet a child, and so did my mother," she added, this time placing both hands in his, so glad in her joy; and with the tact and adroitness subdued by the girlish tenderness of her nature, for she had found a father's friend in Ned's kinsman, and all—all must be right.

All was right. How should it be otherwise? He brought the portrait from its case, and showed her aunt to her in all her virgin loveliness. "So much like you," he whispered to her as she bent blushing over the ivory. "I heard her voice in yours yesternorn, and thought it delusion." He told her—he, the proud man of last week to the young fondling of to-day—of his past, and of his quarrel with the love of his youth. And then they talked of the grandfather and of his pet scheme. And she spoke of his midnight mutterings and wish for songs, while he, surprised at the coincidence, narrated the dream, and how he heard the patriot hymns. And next they spoke of Ned. But here she became silent and arose to go.

"Don't think to escape him; for he shall be there, even at the house of the despised Darby Dyce," he concluded, smilingly, as he kissed her hand at the door.

Beat away hearts. Throb away with vein and artery in mill-race play. Be calm and tranquil, statesman head. The victory is with youth and hope and love and memories of the past; for policy and pride are by the wall, fast bound.

So he called her back from the stairs, and, whisperingly, said: "I shall not see you again until New-Year's Day—the old man's birthday. I will call to take you to the morning church. It is Sunday, you know. Ned and I will both be there, and perhaps we shall have for his New-Year's dinner a birthday present that will make him young again."

Again he kissed her hand, and waved her smiling on her way.

She thought she breathed an amber atmosphere, and trod upon rose-leaves on her way to the old hero's bedside—so happily she breathed and lightly walked in the crisp December air. Crumpling bonnet and dress as she fell on her knees by her grandfather's pillow, her auburn ripples flowed over the scar and clothed it with youth, and her lips touched the wrinkles of age into smoothness as she then and there whispered it would all go right, and how she had seen Ned's uncle, and that he must not fret again, because, in the holy ways of Providence, whose praises all, whether with voice or heart, had sung that Christmas morning, the difficulties had proved to be but preparations to success, and angels in disguise.

V.

Another next morning, when a thin House of Representatives meets for a day or two of tussle with public affairs before the nation again goes to the wall for a New-Year day or two of private rest and enjoyment. As the Speaker glances at the clock and strikes his gavel the Chaplain offers up a fervent prayer, that goes wandering, spiritless, through the empty galleries and around the vacant desks. Some of the M.C.s are at their homes cking out the vacation, and spending in holiday fun the per diem pay that the clerks down here are scoring up. Others are at the late and stereotype Congressional breakfast, made up of a digestive alternation of manuscript and eggs, beef-steak and Globe or Intelligencer newspaper, cold public documents and hot coffee. A few are lounging in the corridors, extending graciously the Congressional button-hole to the constituency finger. Darby Dyce is chasing up the pages in the lobbies, who are comparing notes on Christmas-boxes. And while the Journal clerk begins to chant the manuscript pot pourri of the last day's proceedings, the members, one by one, appear, and the galleries gradually fill up from the coteries of lobbyists and curiosity-monsters, to whose service the fat deputy-sergeant at the narrow stair head is so pie-crustedly devoted. While the clerk chants, the minute-hand of the clock goes sulkily around, until chant and tick seem together to say, "This is all a Buncombe business at best, and 'twere better for the country were it put to rest. Politics is but a horse-race after all, and when the winner's put into his stall up the turf springs green again; while the booth and stands remain until comes next racing day, and the crowds go dustily away to cure shouts, oaths, and bets freely spent upon their pets. One nag is vicious and another something moral, as one horse is bay and the winning mare is sorrel. One colt is Southern thoroughbred, and another Western fed; but they all come together when the sweepstakes are put up, and the spoils and jockey-hunters see the shimmer of the cup. In this Congress-stud of ours there is many a fast-time-nag, the fifty-four of Oregon, for instance, that we brag. One Pegasus to dash away, despite constituency-curb, another that's a galled jade that editors disturb. Uncle Sam's a first-rate groom when his curry-comb is siller, and the feed he gives his horses is the choicest from the miller; but do the sweepstakes, after all, enrich the States both great and small?"

Thus the chant and the click were in the midst of their roundelay, and the buzz of the rotunda was getting on its full head of steam, when the Hon. Lysander Lillington was busily engaged in consulting fellow-committeemen. And when the Journal clerk drowsed to his desk, and the day's business began in earnest, that economical M.C., to the surprise of the whole House (and each man so surprised that he forgot to object), asked unanimous consent to make a report.

He proceeded to read, from hastily-adjusted manuscript, that, while at Valley Forge, General Washington had urged upon Congress provision, by half-pay during life, for the officers of the army; and that Congress, by a small majority, had at first sanctioned it, and subsequently reconsidered it; and that from the first administration of one General to the last administration of the present General the question had been left open, while the survivors were rapidly dying, and justice was tardy.

The buzz had flown into the lobbies as he rose to read, and was now flitting about the floor, hither and thither, every where. What miracle was this? He who was the universal objector—the mill-dam of all legislation—the opponent of every scheme on the Treasury—and a man in Opposition, receiving unanimous consent to make a report in favor of the Bill to award half-pay to Revolutionary officers; and a Bill so young as to have only been kept in a committee-room over recess, when all parliamentary usage demanded it should become hoarse with bawling in the lobby for admission!

And so, amidst the buzz and the astonishment, no resolute objector arose to pay off the Hon. Member in his own coin; but the Bill of the old hero was now on the House docket, ready for action upon it in Committee of the Whole, to the next one of which, still by the consent of buzz and assent of the miracle-astonished House, the Hon. Committeeman forthwith moved it, and found it accomplished.

The ensuing Committee of the Whole would be upon the next day but one, and before it arrived he would recount the old man's history to the members all about, and deify him in their eyes, even as the Christmas dream had showed him worthy of the task.

The invalid Captain rapidly revived when the promise to his ear by the grand-daughter was realized to his dimmed eyes by the sight of Agnes and Ned again together, and likely so to be through life. Darby Dyce had his own ideas of what was up; but, in pursuance of his policy of masterly inactivity, made no interference, and said nothing, except to his wife, which being in confidence must not be repeated. Smug and clerkly Bob, in the Committee-room, grew jocose over their bottle, drinking the health of the "glorious old file of a revolutionary hero" that had come it so 'cutely over the stern-faced and hard policy Lysander Lillington, of Lillingtondale, M.C., etc., etc. Nor was that honorable gentleman's head or heart idle during the two days rapidly passing. His horse had stood for a full hour before the Georgetown Convent, and his frank had been upon a letter addressed to his Grace the Right Reverend Catholic Bishop of the diocese. He had entertained many of his adherents and some of his enemies at an impromptu dinner-party. But he had nevertheless kept away from Captain Sherburne, and once denied himself as he and the dog left card and bow-wow at the door, and had been taciturn to Ned; only saying, "Bring Miss Montrose [how he loved to say the name aloud to Ned, and privately to himself in the seclusion of the library!], her grandsire, and yourself to the House gallery on Friday, and let us see whether the day will be unlucky or no."

Friday arrives; and so does the Speaker at his desk, and the chanting Journal clerk below, and so in due time comes the Order of the Day, after much rigmarole of Mr. Speaker, and hurrying up and down the aisles of pages with little bits of paper in their hands, as if they were political doves with olive-branches during deluge-time.

"The House is now in Committee of the Whole on Senate Bill No. 164, entitled, 'An Act to provide for establishment of a back half-pay fund for officers in the Revolutionary War. and for other purposes,'" says a portly member who is called to the chair by the retiring Speaker, according to the etiquette of the occasion. The clerk chants the same announcement. And the reading of the Bill being dispensed with, its title is a third time announced; when, surrounded by the buzz, and faced by Ned and Agnes and the old soldier in the gallery, the Congressman arises to move that the Committee rise and recommend the passage of the Bill. But before perfecting his motion, he proceeds, with a fervor of eloquence seldom heard in the body, to speak of the regrets he feels for previous policy in respect to so meritorious a measure; and goes on to portray the claims of the old soldiers on the Government, and reproducing his Christmas Dream, attuned his voice to the memories of the anthems and the hymns of freedom until the Senators flock in to listen, and the buzz is awed, and even the clock ticks more quietly, and the pages imitate Darby Dyce in his statuesque repose by the marble column.

The Committee rises. More jargon at the desk. Speaker and Chairman bow and cross-bow, and advance and retire and cross-fire, and the chant announces more audibly than it has ever before sung that in the Bill entitled, etc., the House concur, and it will be sent to the President for approval.

A hush, and then a buzz, and then a shrill "Hurrah!" from the gallery. It is the veteran on his feet—Ned and Agnes vainly pulling at his elbows. "Hurrah for Washington and Jackson!" says the shrill cry. Bustle—bustle—by the door and in the aisles. All eyes up stairs, and groups clustering by the pillar opposite the Ladies' Gallery. "It is one of the veterans himself!" exclaimed Darby, on recognizing Captain Sherburne; but almost ready the next moment to bite his tongue out, as he sees the pages exult before him. "Have him out! have him down!" calls some of the lobby; and members beckon deprecatingly to the gallery door-keeper, who is officiously interrupting the most striking tableau these benches have seen for many a day. More bustle—and the tableau breaks up. The door-keeper has left his place by the stair-head, and trills of barks resound through the House, now entirely thrown off its equilibrium. "Bow-wow-wow!" says Ranger, no longer awed by the fat door-keeper, but leaping up into the old man's arms as he is held by the door-keeper, and then bolting at that fat functionary's legs as he smells out the trouble. "Move we adjourn!" is heard above the bow-wow, buzz, or bustle; and amidst the chant a gavel falls, and a rush is made for the outer chamber, where the old man already is, with Ned crazy with laughter, and Agnes half-dead with confusion and fear, the dog still yelping like mad, and the lobby crowd killing the buzz outright in emulating the old man's shrill and repeated hurrahs for Washington and Jackson!

VI.

While ten thousand urchins and damsels over all the land were exclaiming, in holiday chorus, "What a pity New-Year's Day should come on Sunday!" a party of four at the side door of St. Bridget's were congratulating each other because New-Year's Day and Sunday did meet together. There was the Congressman and the Captain—he had found his member at last—and Ned and Agnes also. The snow, seldom seen in the Federal metropolis, had fallen liberally overnight, and Ned, commissioned for an early carriage, had secured almost the only hack-sleigh in town. Joyfully the sleigh-bells pealed at the door of Darby Dyce's, while the household were at breakfast; for there came uncle and nephew to redeem the promise of the church-meeting. Lightly beat the hearts of all, and lightly flew the heels of the exhilarated horses to the church door.

"Valley Forge," said the uncle, pointing from the avenue over the snowy landscape far away as they drove along.

"Lexington rather," answered the old man, sadly pointing to a company of soldiers drawn up on the square preparing for a comrade's funeral.

"But never the prison-ship, or suffering, or worriment any more," added the Congressman, taking the hands of the Captain, while tears streamed down the cheeks of all.

"Are we not very late?" asked Agnes, suddenly, as the clock chimed its quarter.

"Yes, late for what you were expecting to do," said Mr. Lillington, gallantly taking her hand and handing her from the sleigh.

Before she could ask his meaning, he continued aiding in lifting the veteran carefully on the icy walk.

"Ned, you shall take Captain Sherburne, and I will escort Miss Montrose."

"Call me Agnes, if you please;" and she flushed as she said it.

"Not yet. Miss Montrose to-day; but Miss Montrose no longer than to-day."

"The church service is over," said Ned, looking through the door.

"I knew we were late," said she; "and oh, how we had counted on this service!"

The uncle smiled, and, taking her arm still closer in his own, drew her into the little robing room where stood the parish priest.

"I have a little favor to ask," said he, who held the trembling arm. "It is your grandfather's birthday, and the first day of the year. How better can we celebrate both than by one present all around? No need of gaud and show—that would illy become you—I have a special dispensation from the bishop, or rather our good friend there holds it, who also has taken to your convent the benefaction for supporting many Sister Agneses in your place. Present to Ned a wife, and to me a daughter—not a niece—for you are doubly—"

He paused, and before his agitation and kindness maidenly reserve fled, and only girlish trustfulness remained.

She placed her hand in his and smiled. Who was it at that instant rushed forward, and, lightly brushing bonnet-strings and furs and mantle, left her ready for the veil and altar? who but Ned?

The priest smiled, and, motioning to the side-door, they all entered—the fast-expiring name of Montrose breathing gently on the lips of bride and groom and kinsmen—the younger supporting the oldest, and the oldest lover and the newest beloved arm in arm. And so before the altar.

The old hero, waiting not for word or sign, nor caring whether it were etiquette or not, knelt down before the rail, and there continued, never looking up during the long service which followed. Agnes seemed almost a bride of the Church as the canonical veil was folded around her form. Ned's heart beat high with holy joy, and amidst the clouds of incense floating around the altar the uncle heard the singing voices and saw the salient features of his Christmas dream.

"And now, my dear Sir, wishing you a Happy New Year, and congratulating you upon attaining your ninetieth birthday," said Mr. Lillington to Captain Sherburne, as several hours afterward they were gathered together at the New-Year's dinner-table—"Ned and I having had a sudden New-Year's present, nothing remains but for your grandchild, Mrs. Leslie, here to bestow her present and your reward."

Rising from her seat, and blushing as she heard her new appellation, Agnes kissed the beloved forehead, while the scar broadened and reddened with delight. Then taking from beneath her plate a fold of paper in a long envelope, she said: "And this, grandfather, is the certified copy of your Act of Congress—a New-Year's present—not only for yourself, but for many more old comrades besides, to whom tardy justice arrives through your means."

"Bravo—bravo, indeed!" cried her uncle; "Henry Clay himself could not have said that better."

"And allow me also to show you, Sir, the original Act, that is loaned to me by permission of the State Department, with the signature of the President himself—Andrew Jackson—firm and bold, as one hero's autograph should be that consecrates an act of justice to so many other heroes:” and the old man put the writing to his lips. “But a truce to sadness,” he added, as the tears began to flow upon the furrowed cheek; “you are a lobby member no longer, and therefore you shall have your hunger appeased before the end of the feast. After that we will discuss Ned's future and your own; for we hope to share many Christmases and New Years together from this day forward.”

Returning to the table, the old man dropped his envelope, and Ranger, darting from his place of privilege under the table, seized it in his mouth caressingly and sported with it round the room. This incident restored the humor and hilarity of all; and while the butler is adroitly occupied in extricating the Bill from the last jaws of danger that will ever surround it, let us hasten to drop the curtain over “THE CONGRESSMAN'S CHRISTMAS DREAM AND THE LOBBY-MEMBER'S HAPPY NEW YEAR.”

THOMAS OLIVERS,

“COBBLER,” POET, AND METHODIST HERO.

THOMAS OLIVERS, the “Welsh Methodist Cobbler,” figures largely in the religious literature of England in the last half of the last century. The writings of Toplady, Sir Richard Hill, Rowland Hill, Fletcher of Madeley, and John Wesley mention him often. He is a hero in Southey's romantic life of the great Methodist founder; Coleridge gave him a few annotations, and it can hardly be doubted that his curious history was one of the chief of those attractions of Southey's book which enabled the great Highgate thinker, as he tells us himself, to read and re-read it, with ever-increasing entertainment, in days of illness or ennui, when no other volume could interest him. “A member of the House of Shirley and Hastings” often recognizes the important “cobbler,” in the voluminous “Life and Times of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon.” Wesley inserted his biography in the old “Arminian Magazine;” and Dr. Jackson gives him a place in the “Lives of Early Methodist Preachers.”

A curious biographical study is this Methodist Welshman; a genuine character in his sterling individuality; a unique example of poetic genius, and one of the most remarkable instances of moral self-redemption on record. His autobiography is marked throughout by candor, and a naïve simplicity and directness which, together with its striking facts, render it the most dramatic of those numerous sketches of early “Itinerants” which Wesley published, and from which the history of Methodism derives its most significant and most interesting materials.

To the religious world he is known chiefly by his great hymns, and as a champion of the controversy which divided the Calvinistic and Arminian leaders of the Methodist movement. Wesley pronounced him “a full match for Toplady;” and the latter is still recognized as the giant Calvinistic polemic of that day. Southey acknowledges his ability and spirit in the contest. He was also a man of genius, as his poetry and music attest. He produced the sublimest lyric in the hymnology of our language or of any modern language, and composed music hardly less sublime. His prose writings are perspicuous, vigorous, and often eloquent, if not always elegant. The introduction to his “Scourge to Calumny” (addressed to Sir Richard Hill, in defense of John Wesley), alluding to the disparity between his own social position and that of the baronet, would be creditable to any English writer of his age, not excepting Burke or Junius. His exuberant soul gave strength and fullness and sometimes majesty to his poetry, his prose, and his preaching.

He was a “sturdy Welshman”—as sturdy in his virtues as he was at first in his vices. The latter were so enormous that, while we read of them in his bluntly honest and self-indignant autobiography, we are astonished that such reprobacy could be awakened even by the thunders of Whitefield—that such imbruted humanity could rise, and, at last, soar heavenward, hymning to all coming ages the seraphic strain of “The God of Abraham praise!” Such an example of the power of both genius and religion is worthy of being commemorated. We propose to record some of the scattered facts of his history, reminding the reader who may not relish their occasional pietistic tone, that this is characteristic, and essential to the curious story.

He was born in Treganon, Wales, in the year 1725. He lost both his parents by death before he was five years old. His kindred took care of him till his eighteenth year, not neglecting his early education; for they sent him to school, he tells us, and taught him to “say his prayers morning and evening, to repeat the Catechism, to sing psalms, and to go to church in general twice every Sabbath.” He assures us, however, that “his carnal mind soon discovered itself,” leading him into a “multitude of heinous sins.” “There was terrible swearing in our army in Flanders,” says Uncle Toby; but the army carried it thither from England; our English great-grandfathers were voluminous in profanity; it was rife about young Olivers, and he says that he knew only an old man or two (“whom all supposed to be crazy”) who had any scruple about the prevalent blasphemy. A certain parishioner made it a very study, usually compounding “twenty or thirty” different expressions into one long and horrid oath. When not more than fifteen years of age Olivers was the rival of his “infernal instructor” in this vice, and was considered the worst boy in “those parts for the last twenty or thirty years.”

When eighteen years old he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, but did not half learn his craft, because of his unconquerable idleness. Dancing and convivial company engrossed his time; and on the day of his majority “I gave,” he says, “scope to my inclination to such a degree that out of sixteen days and nights I spent fifteen of them without ever being in bed." He plunged into grosser vices, and found it desirable to retreat from the town; for, corrupt as it was, he was too debased for it. He went to Shrewsbury, where one of his amusements was to divert his associates with his profanity and vulgarity, at places of public worship. He confesses, however, that in his incredible excesses his conscience made him miserable. "I thought, I live a most wretched life! If I do not repent and forsake my sins, I shall most certainly be damned. I wish I could repent of and forsake them. If I could but hate them as I love them, I should then be able to lay them aside; but till then I despair of doing it; for I have always gone to church, and have frequently prayed and resolved against them, and yet I can not leave them."

He resolved to attempt again to redeem himself. He thought he would "try the sacraments," and borrowed a popular book called "A Week's Preparation," read it on his knees, went to church, partook of the sacrament, maintained a strictly correct outward life for a fortnight, and, returning the volume with profuse thanks, replunged into his habitual vices. Subsequently he was smitten down by dangerous sickness. On getting up again he wept, prayed, went to church twice every day, and read books of devotion at home. "For," he says, "I saw very clearly that if I had died at that time, I certainly should have gone to hell." His resolution soon vanished, and again he was groveling in his depravity. With another young man, of like character, he "committed," he writes, "a most notorious and shameful act of arch-villainy." They deemed it best to escape from the town—Olivers leaving many debts unpaid, "as was generally the case," and his accomplice deserting his apprenticeship. They journeyed together through several towns, encouraging each other in vice, and at last reached Bristol, where Olivers passed through some sad and some comical adventures; but he forever had reason to remember gratefully that town; for there a good influence at last arrested him, and turned the whole current of his life.

The auspices were not very favorable for him there at first, for he found himself lodging with a "backslidden Methodist," now a drunkard. He sketches the scene characteristically. His landlord's wife "had been a religious woman, but was eaten up with the cares of the world. There was also a lukewarm Moravian in the house. With these I had various disputes, particularly about election, which I never could believe. One day the Moravian and I quarreled so highly that he struck me; and as he was a tall, lusty man, I knew I should have no chance in fighting him. However, for a whole hour, I cursed and swore in such a manner as is seldom equaled on earth or exceeded even in hell itself; and, what was the greatest aggravation, it was all in confirmation of a lie. For though I swore with all the rage of a fiend, and with all the diversified language of hell, that I would prosecute the man—and though I wished, perhaps not less than a hundred times over, that vengeance, ruin, destruction, and damnation might lie on body and soul forever if I did not do it immediately—yet I never so much as attempted to do it. Indeed, such a habit of horrid swearing had I acquired, that though I saw it was dreadfully wrong, and at times wished and labored to break it off, yet, on the smallest occasion, I was carried away as by a mighty torrent; yea, I daily and hourly did it without any provocation whatever, and frequently not knowing what I did." We can not doubt poor Olivers' fluency in profanity after this sketch of it; for the honest confession has an unmistakable smack of the old habit.

His drunken landlord was so shocked at his depravity that he threatened to turn him out of the house. But the scene suddenly changed. Helpless in his moral weakness, and apparently possessed of the very devil whose name was "legion," the wretched man lived as in a delirium of wickedness and misery. He met a multitude of people one night in the street, and inquired of a woman whither they were going. "To hear Mr. Whitefield," was her reply. "I thought," he writes, "I have often heard of Whitefield, and sung songs about him. I will go and hear what he has to say." He was too late; but went the next night three hours before the time. The text of the great preacher was: "Is not this a brand plucked from the burning?" The tears, trickling down the faces of hearers around Olivers, arrested his attention from a sort of stupor; and though, as he says, "when the sermon began he was a dreadful enemy of God and of all that is good, and one of the most profligate and abandoned young men living," by the time it was ended his life was changed forever. It would have seemed that so sudden and so thorough a revolution in the moral character of such a man was impossible; but it was real; and Olivers is one of the most surprising proofs of the theory that the restoration of the soul to virtue needs not the slow process of education; that in its highest form it is a miracle, wrought by divine power, and possible to the most degraded minds, in circumstances even where the necessary conditions of moral culture are at first impracticable. Such was the opinion of Whitefield, Wesley, and their coadjutors, and Olivers was unquestionably one of the noblest trophies of the moral triumphs of Methodism. As he stood in the crowd hearing Whitefield his fierce Welsh heart was broken. "Showers of tears," he says, "trickled down my cheeks. I was likewise filled with an utter abhorrence of my evil ways, and was much ashamed that ever I walked in them; and as my heart was thus turned from all evil, so it was powerfully inclined to all that is good. It is not easy to express what strong desires I had for God and his service; and what resolutions I had to seek and serve him in future; in consequence of which I broke off all my evil practices, and forsook all my wicked and foolish companions without delay, and gave myself up to God and his service with all my heart.

Oh! what reason had I to say, 'Is not this a brand plucked from the fire?'"

The apostate family with which he lodged were astonished, as well they might be, at his change, "seeing him weep almost incessantly." The native poetry of his strong soul burst forth with his new life. "The first Sunday after I was awakened," he says, "I went to the Cathedral at six in the morning. When the Te Deum was read I felt as if I had done with earth, and was praising God before his throne! No words can set forth the joy, the rapture, the awe, and reverence which I felt." He obtained again the "Week's Preparation"—this time with more hope; he read it on his knees "by day and by night." "This," he adds, "and the Bible were far more precious to me than rubies; and God only knows how often I bedewed them with my tears; especially those parts of them which speak of the love and sufferings of Christ. As to secret prayer, I was for some time almost continually on my knees." He actually became lame in one knee by incessantly kneeling, and went about limping, and in a short time his other knee failed, so that it was with difficulty he could walk at all. "And so earnest was I," he writes, "that I used by the hour together to wrestle with all the might of my body and soul, till I almost expected to die on the spot. What with bitter cries, unheard by any but God and myself, together with torrents of tears, which were almost continually trickling down my cheeks, my throat was dried up, as David says, and my eyes literally failed while I waited for God."

Let no man cavil at this simple, earnest record, however he may construe it. The lost man was struggling with the demon—struggling out of the abyss; and he did struggle out of it, and rose to a pure and noble life. In the presence of such facts let us rather remind ourselves of the hope they afford of the reclamation of the most fallen souls, even when all hope seems gone. The case of Olivers explains half the history of the Methodism of Whitefield and Wesley. It won such trophies by thousands—won them from the very "gates of hell," and by a "foolishness of preaching" which was jeered at by ecclesiastical dignitaries (like Lavington and Warburton), who knew of no way of reaching such cases; and hooted at by the mob, which it subdued and led, weeping, by tens of thousands, into its humble temples.

Though Olivers complains that he was, through all his life, too much inclined "in favor of rational religion," and prejudiced against "visions and revelations," we can not be surprised that his own extraordinary regeneration disposed him at first to a degree of credulity. He records a few remarkable dreams and visions, and some very striking cases of sortilege; but his good sense preserved him from any serious abuse of such marvels.*

* No Protestant records afford more astonishing examples of the sortes sanctorum than the Methodist writings of the last century—a fact somewhat attributable to the influence of Moravianism on the first years of Methodism.

The reclaimed profligate proved the reality of his reformation. He forthwith began to repair, Olivers was delivered from several despondent plights by this expedient in the early days of his reformation. In an hour of nervous depression he began to speculate about his final salvation; the terrible "Quinquarticular Controversy" (in which he was afterward so great a master) got hold upon his troubled spirit, and he sunk in despair under the impression that he was a "reprobate." He thought of giving up prayer as useless to him. He seized his Bible, then threw it aside lest he should open on some text confirmatory of his fear. Seizing it again, he cast his eye on the words, "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all." "But what struck me," he says, "above all, was those words in the following verse: 'I will therefore that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting.'" At another time, when sinking in anxiety, he opened the New Testament at the text, "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end."

Southey mentions a remarkable case in the life of Wesley. Whitefield had begun to preach in the open air at Bristol, and sent for Wesley to help him. Wesley and his brother Charles "consulted the Bible on the subject, and stumbled upon uncomfortable texts. The first was, 'And some of them would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him;' to which they added, 'Not till the time was come,' that its import might correspond with the subsequent lots. Another was, 'Get thee up into this mountain, and die in the mount, whither thou goest up, and be gathered unto thy people.' The next trial confirmed the impression which these had made: 'And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days.' These verses were sufficiently ominous, but worse remained: 'I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake.' They next opened on the burial of Stephen the proto-martyr."—SOUTHNEY'S Wesley. In fine, all the texts opened upon were of this ominous character. Charles Wesley, who complained severely of his brother's design of going, "receive!," says Wesley, "these words, spoken to himself, and he answered not again: 'Son of man, behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke: yet neither shalt thou mourn nor weep, neither shall thy tears run down.'" The question was referred to the "Society" (mostly Moravian), where again sortilege was tried. The first text was alarming: "When wicked men have slain a righteous person in his own house upon his bed, shall I not now require his blood at your hands, and take you away from the earth?" The last one read: "Ahaz slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the city, even Jerusalem." So many coincidences were perhaps never known in any other case of this sort of superstition; but they all proved false. Wesley had the courage to go to Bristol, and thereby "crossed the Rubicon;" for he there began his "outdoor preaching," and formed the first Methodist Society. Isaac Taylor attributes the Methodist movement to the fact that Whitefield and Wesley there took the "open field." The whole history of Methodism might have been changed had Wesley been kept back by these omens.

Berridge, the famous rector of Everton, a Calvinistic Methodist of that day, and noted for his Aristophanic wit as well as his Greek scholarship, remained a celibate all his days on account of one of these absurd abuses of Scripture. He was rich, kept house, and wanted a wife. He says that he opened his Bible while upon his knees, and was astonished to cast his eye upon, "When my son was entered into his wedding chamber, he fell down and died" (2 Esdras, x. 1). This was terrific to the good vicar; but as he really wished a wife, and Esdras was a book of the Apocrypha, he tried again, hoping to find better encouragement in the authentic Scriptures. He opened on Jer. xvi. 2: "Thou shalt not take thee a wife," etc. This was peremptory, and he went through a long life a confirmed, conscientious bachelor. See his humorous letter in "Life and Times of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon," l. p. 383.

as much as possible, the wrongs of his life. He attempted to rescue his old accomplices in vice. Religious people could hardly credit his conversion, and seemed afraid to receive him; they discouraged his wish to join their Societies, but he bore with meekness their apparent neglect. He loved Whitefield "inexpressibly," he says. "I used to follow him as he walked the streets, and could scarce refrain from kissing the very prints of his feet." He went to Bradford; and there for two years never missed a single sermon among the Methodists, "late or early"—and that was the day of five o'clock morning sermons among the Methodists. He heard, he says, "generally with many tears." During the usual "Society meetings," after the preaching, where all but members were shut out, he used to go into the field behind the chapel, and "listen while they sang the praises of God. I would then weep bitterly at the thought that God's people were there, praising His name together, while I, a poor and wretched fugitive, was not permitted to be among them. When they came out, I have followed at a small distance those of them whom I thought most in earnest, particularly the preacher and his company, that I might hear something further concerning the ways of God. I often followed them nearly two miles, and then returned praising God for this farther instruction, picked up, as it were, by stealth, and meditating thereon all the way home." The members at last began to notice him: they sent a young man to inquire about him, and received him into their Society. He became one of the devoutest of their communion.

His conscience was now as scrupulous as it had been reckless. He could do no injustice, "not even to the value of a pin;" he could not mention the name of God but when it was necessary, and then with the deepest awe and reverence. His daily meals were received as a sacrament. As to his "thoughts, inclinations, and desires," his constant inquiry was, "Is this to the glory of God?" If not, he dare not indulge it.

In due time he was "exhorting," and at last preaching among the neighboring rustics, spending his Saturday nights, till one or two o'clock, in preparing his sermons; rising at five o'clock, walking twenty miles during the day, and returning so fatigued as to be hardly able to get over a stile. On one of these preaching excursions he was tempted to believe that he "was running before he was sent," and turned back despondently. "This may be a temptation of the devil," he said to himself; and opening his Bible, cast his eyes upon the passage, "He that putteth his hand to the plow and looketh back is not fit for the kingdom of heaven." He took courage, and, turning about, went to his "appointment." His renewed conscience troubled him about his old debts. "I felt," he writes, "as great confusion and sorrow as if I had actually stolen every sum I owed." Some money was due to him from the estate of his kindred, and he set out to receive it in order to pay his creditors. A notable journey was it; one that might have delighted the heart of the good Knight of La Mancha, as he pored over his books of chivalry, in his library, before arming for his own memorable adventures. He preached in most of the Methodist Societies on his route, and, when he arrived among his old neighbors, astonished them as much by his reformation as by his discourses. An uncle, a rich farmer, could not comprehend the marvel, and ascribed it to some terrible fright. "Thou hast been so wicked that thou hast seen the devil!" exclaimed the surprised yeoman.* A profligate nobleman of the parish had him seized on Sunday and sent to the stocks; but the men who took him thither, struck by the miracle of his reformation, and affected by his Christian spirit, only simulated the punishment, and stood with him "near the stocks the whole time, which was near two hours, talking about religion."

After paying all he owed in his native place, he purchased a horse, and rode from town to town, paying not only principal but interest, and astonishing his creditors with his religious exhortations. "You ought to thank God," he said, "for if he had not converted me I never should have thought of paying you." One of them he found in prison; he paid his debt, and then preached to the prisoners. He went to Whitehurst to pay a sixpence; for no sin seemed small to him now. From Fordham to Shrewsbury, to Whitehurst, to Wrexham, to Chester, to Liverpool, to Manchester, to Birmingham, to Bristol, he rode on this singular pilgrimage, paying his debts and preaching the Gospel. He paid about seventy; and, before he got through the list, had to sell horse, saddle, and bridle for the purpose.

Of course Wesley's keen discernment would appreciate such a man. He sent him to a "circuit" among the miners in Cornwall; but as he now had no money for another horse, he set out, October 24, 1753, on foot, with his saddle-bags (containing books and linen) across his shoulder. A layman on the circuit offered to pay for a horse if he would buy one. He obtained a colt, which, says Southey, "was as well suited to him as Bucephalus to Alexander, for he was as tough and indefatigable as his master." "I have kept him," wrote Olivers, twenty-five years afterward, "to this day; and on him I have traveled comfortably not less than a hundred thousand miles."

He encountered some of those "fights of affliction" with rioters which were common to his brethren of that day. At North Bolton a noted ruffian interrupted the worship, and led the rabble after him through the streets, "throwing whatever first came to hand." In Cornwall the high-constable came to impress him for the army while he was preaching, but staying to hear the sermon, thought better of him, and allowed him to go on his way. At Yarmouth he found good advantage in his young "Bucephalus" amidst a frightful mob, which had sworn that any Methodist preacher who should enter their town should die there. The menace could only challenge such a man as Olivers to go. He was accompanied by a timid friend, who expected to suffer martyrdom with him, and was terribly dismayed with the fear that he was not prepared for it. Olivers got him into the town, however, and began to sing a hymn in the market-place. The rabble soon rallied, and commenced their assault. A townsman rescued the itinerant and got him into a house. He sent for his horse, which was brought down an alley; the mob thronging in after him. Olivers, mounting him, charged upon them, driving them, pell-mell, before him. "But," he says, "the women stood in their doors, some with both hands full of dirt, and others with bowls of water, which they threw at me as I passed by. When we got into the open street we had such a shower of stones, sticks, apples, turnips, and potatoes as I have never seen before or since." His fellow-traveler galloped out of town as fast as he was able; but the evangelist, more cool and courageous, watched the motions of the sticks and stones which were likely to hit him, so as to preserve what he calls "a regular retreat." "When I overtook my companion," he says, "we were thankful that we escaped with our lives, as were our friends in Norwich on seeing us return." The scene was characteristic of the times as well as of the man.

For forty-six years did Thomas Olivers belong to Wesley's unconquerable itinerant corps, doing valiant service, and enduring severe hardships in England, Scotland, and Ireland. But while the brave man was fagging through his humble work, his grand hymns were resounding in the great churches of the kingdom. Dr. Jackson says that his "Hymn of Praise to Christ" was set to music by a gentleman in Ireland, and performed before the Bishop of Waterford, in his cathedral, on Christmas-day. Belcher, in his "Historical Sketches of Hymns," says that the celebrated Mrs. Carter heard Olivers' hymn,

"'Lo! he comes with clouds descending,' sung at St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, as an Advent Anthem, in 1753, and gives it at full length in her 'Letters.'" Creamer, in his "Hymnology," affirms that there is not in the language a hymn which has elicited more praise than his "God of Abraham;" and James Montgomery remarks, in his "Christian Psalmist," that "there is not in our language a lyric of more majestic style, more elevated thought, or more glorious imagery. Its structure, indeed, is unattractive; and, on account of the short lines, occasionally uncouth; but, like a stately pile of architecture, severe and simple in design, it strikes less on the first view than after deliberate examination, when its proportions become more graceful, its dimensions expand, and the mind itself grows greater in contemplating it." Blackwood's Magazine has pronounced it "one of the noblest odes in the English language." It was originally published in a pamphlet of eight pages, and entitled "An Hymn to the God of Abraham. In three parts. Adapted to a celebrated Air sung by the priest, Signor Leoni, etc., at the Jews' Synagogue in London. By Thomas Olivers." Jackson says it reached its thirtieth edition as early as 1779. Though it appears in hymn-books of most denominations of Christians, it is so often given in a mutilated form, that it may properly enough be here inserted entire:

HYMN TO THE GOD OF ABRAHAM.

PART THE FIRST.

The God of Abraham praise,
Who reigns enthroned above,
Ancient of everlasting days,
And God of Love:
JEHOVAH, GREAT I AM!
By earth and heaven confest;
I bow and bless the sacred Name,
Forever bless'd.

The God of Abraham praise,
At whose supreme command,
From earth I rise—and seek the joys
At his right-hand;
I all on earth forsake,
Its wisdom, fame, and power;
And Him my only portion make,
My Shield and Tower.

The God of Abraham praise,
Whose all-sufficient grace
Shall guide me all my happy days,
In all my ways.
He calls a worm his friend!
He calls himself my God!
And he shall save me to the end,
Through Jesus' blood.

He by himself hath sworn,
I on his oath depend;
I shall on eagle's wings up-borne,
To heaven ascend:
I shall behold his face,
I shall his power adore,
And sing the wonders of his grace
For evermore.

PART THE SECOND.

Though nature's strength decay,
And earth and hell withstand,
To Canaan's bounds I urge my way,
At his command.
The watery deep I pass,
With Jesus in my view;
And through the howling wilderness
My way pursue.

The goodly land I see,
With peace and plenty bless'd;
A land of sacred liberty,
And endless rest:
There milk and honey flow;
And oil and wine abound;
And trees of life forever grow,
With mercy crown'd.

There dwells the Lord our King,
The Lord our righteousness
(Triumphant o'er the world and sin),
The Prince of Peace:
On Zion's sacred height
His kingdom still maintains;
And glorious with his saints in light,
Forever reigns.

PART THE THIRD.

Before the great Three-One
They all exulting stand,
And tell the wonders he hath done,
Through all their land:
The list'ning spheres attend,
And swell the growing fame;
And sing, in songs which never end,
The wondrous Name.

The God who reigns on high
The great arch-angels sing;
And "Holy, Holy, Holy," cry,
"ALMIGHTY KING!
Who was, and is, the same;
And evermore shall be;
JEHOVAH—FATHER—GREAT I AM!
We worship Thee!"

Before the Saviour's face,
The ransom'd nations bow;
O'erwhelm'd with his almighty grace,
Forever new:
He shows his prints of love—
They kindle to a flame!
And sound through all the worlds above,
The slaughter'd Lamb.

The whole triumphant host
Give thanks to God on high:
"Hail, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,"
They ever cry:
Hail, Abraham's God—and mine!
(I join the heavenly lays)
All might and majesty are thine,
And endless praise.

There are stanzas in this ode fit for archangels to sing; and if ever heaven borrows strains from earth, the "Welsh cobbler's" verses reverberate among the spheres, louder than any Hymn of Milton, or Goethe's "Chorus in Heaven."

We have seen a doubt expressed somewhere about the authorship of the hymn, "Lo! he comes with clouds descending;" but Jackson says that both the lyric and its "fine tune were composed by Olivers," and published by Wesley in his "Sacred Harmony." The reader will thank us for inserting here this noble ode, however often he may have seen it:

Lo! he comes with clouds descending,
Once for favor'd sinners slain;
Thousand thousand saints, attending,
Swell the triumph of his train:
Hallelujah! God appears on earth to reign.

Every eye shall now behold him,
Robed in dreadful majesty;
Those who set at naught and sold him,
Pierced and nailed him to the tree,
Deeply wailing, shall the true Messiah see.

The dear tokens of his passion
Still his dazzling body bears;
Cause of endless exultation
To his ransom'd worshippers:
With what rapture gaze we on those glorious scars!

Yea, Amen! let all adore thee,
High on thy eternal throne;
Saviour, take the power and glory;
Claim the kingdom for thine own!
Jah! Jehovah! everlasting God! come down.

Jackson gives a catalogue of sixteen works from the pen of Olivers, four of which are poetical.

The latter part of his life was spent in London, where he superintended Wesley's press and preached incessantly. He says he never labored harder in his life; but Wesley erred in subjecting such a man to the drudgery of the printing-office. Though he had genius, and some literary ability, he was naturally unfit for this minute typographical work. He had too much genius for it; and the Arminian Magazine teemed with inaccuracies, which Wesley sometimes tried to mend by formidable tables of errata. He had at last to displace him.

Thomas Olivers "the cobbler's"* participation in the long "Calvinistic controversy" procured him a reputation which still renders his name familiar in most of the Methodist world. His few great lyrics have given him a unique place on the catalogue of hymnists, and will never be allowed to die; but his self-redemption under the influence of religion is the most extraordinary part of his history. "Well," says Southey, "might this man, upon reviewing his own eventful life, bless God for the manifold mercies which he had experienced, and look upon Methodism as the instrument of his deliverance from sin and death."

He died suddenly. He was struck with paralysis in the morning, and was dead at the noon of the 7th of March, 1799. He was worthily laid to rest in the tomb of Wesley, at City Road Chapel, London. Wherever the worship of God has extended, in the English language, his grand odes resound to-day in its temples; and wherever that language may yet extend, the Hebraic sublimity of his strains will rise above all ordinary hymns, like the sounds of trumpets and organs soaring above all other instruments of the choir. Such is the regal prerogative of genius, though it come before the world in the person of a "cobbler."

JOHN OWEN'S APPEAL.

ALTHOUGH I have always been rather fond of reading, I have never tried my hand at writing any thing but my accounts, or a short letter, before in my life. I hope that the public will bear this in mind, and excuse whatever mistakes I may fall into, and, perhaps, a dull way of relating a story which I am sure a professed novelist would make very interesting. But a series of circumstances, involving a secret—I may say crime—came under my observation some ten years back that has lain heavy in my recollection ever since. I have never been able to impart it to any one who could afford me the slightest relief. Some people have discredited

* This sobriquet was given him by Toplady, who represented Wesley as saying:

"I've Thomas Olivers, the cobbler
(No stall in England holds a nobler),
A wight of talents universal,
Whereof I'll give a brief rehearsal:
He with one brandish of his quill
Will knock down Toplady and Hill."

Belcher, in his "Historical Sketches of Hymns," by a curious blunder, ascribes to Wesley the authorship of this doggerel, as a part of a humorous description of his competitors. Wesley was morally, if not intellectually, incapable of such a production.

what I said; and others, who could have done much, have refused me any assistance; so that I have fallen into a way of brooding over this little history, which in reality is nowise particularly connected with myself.

Being a prosperous man, and having had no special trials, thank God! since the time—now fifteen years ago next Christmas—when I buried my little Mary, the only child it pleased God ever to give me, I dare say I have got more into a habit of thinking of the troubles of others than I should if I had had more at home to employ my thoughts. However that may be, certain it is that many a quiet evening, when I have cast up my accounts for the day, and had nothing to do except, perhaps, to look over the paper again, or to go a visiting, I have, instead, fallen into a fit of musing on those past events, and got so unhappy with dwelling on the wrongs I could not punish, that afterward I could scarcely sleep for sorrow and indignation. I don't know when it was that it first came into my head that it would do me any good to write this out; but when once the idea did suggest itself, it grew upon me until it seemed a sort of duty to inform the public of these facts, and thus make one more attempt to obtain justice. Hoping, therefore, that this simple narrative may meet the eye of some person both able and willing to do what little can now be done to redress past wrong, I beg—with another apology for my poor scholarship—to begin my story:

I am a baker by trade, and my name is John Owen. Some people have jeered me by saying I ought rather to have been called "John Know-in," because I have managed, in the course of thirty years' devotion to my business, to accumulate a little fund of money; however, I never minded this joking, as my conscience is witness I never earned a penny otherwise than honestly, and Owen is a good Welsh name, of which no one need be ashamed. But that is neither here nor there, and has small relation to what I had to say, only that it seemed proper to state this about myself for the better comprehension of what follows.

My shop is in a good position, on the corner of Sixth Avenue and Decem Street. Since the first morning that I took down the shutters from the front windows, where I had carefully arranged a tempting show of cakes and bread, I have been fortunate enough always to have a good run of customers; but although many of them have been excellent friends of mine, none of them ever interested me as much as the young girl who is what the novelists would call the heroine of my story.

The first time I ever saw her was on a rainy December afternoon, just five years to the day from the time when we buried our little Mary. I remembered the anniversary very well, and always celebrated it by making an extra quantity of bread, and sending it out to the poor families in the neighborhood. But now the day's work was pretty much over, and I was sitting thinking sadly of how desolate our home would always be, when the door opened, and a little, light bit of a young girl came in. She evidently had no umbrella, and her poor scant dress was quite wet; there was a dingy old shawl wrapped about her shoulders, and on her head she had a hood of faded silk. Altogether there was poverty written all over her figure, and I do not know that I should have noticed her any more than many other such poor creatures I saw every day, only that, as she came forward into the light of the one gas-burner I had started to shed some brightness on the dull afternoon, it struck me that she was just about fifteen—the age our Mary would have been if it had pleased God to spare her to us. Then, although our little girl was fair—and I am not sure she would ever have been pretty—and this stranger was dark, with eyes like blackberries, cheeks with a lovelier color than I ever saw before or since, and altogether decidedly handsome, it seemed to me, oddly enough, that there was a strange likeness about her to our lost child. Since then I have discovered that it was in the mouth; both girls had full red lips, and it was in the expression that hovered around them that the resemblance lay.

The little maiden advanced to the counter, and putting out a small brown hand from under her shawl, laid down a sixpence and asked for a loaf of bread.

I took down one of my large shilling loaves, and, pushing back the money, I said,

"There is your bread, my dear; but I don't want to be paid for it."

At the sound of my words she looked up quickly, and hesitated a moment; then she answered,

"If you please, Sir, I had rather you would take the sixpence."

"No," replied I, firmly, "not to-night; to-morrow, if you want bread, you may come here and buy it; I won't refuse your money; but to-day is one of my anniversaries, when I never allow any one but my old customers to pay me."

She looked a little surprised at this explanation; but her face was very innocent, and so I think she was satisfied, for she said simply,

"Very well, Sir, if you say so; but I am greatly obliged to you."

Then, with a grave little courtesy, she put the loaf under her shawl and hurried away.

When she was gone I felt vexed at myself that I had not done more than give her the bread; it seemed as if I ought to have detained her and asked her some questions, and not let her go out again into the rain. I mentioned the facts to my wife, and she quite agreed with me as to what I should have done. So that I determined, if I ever saw the pretty stranger again, to find out something more about her.

It was two days before she reappeared in my shop; then she came in at the same hour as at first, that is, late in the afternoon; but it was bright and pleasant. There were several people in the store; and although I do not know but she had on just the same clothes she wore before, there was so much more of an air of neatness about her dress that it seemed as if it would be a sort of insult to address her as a beggar. So I merely gave her the bread, taking the money she offered; though I said to her, as I tied up the bundle,

"You'll be here again, won't you?"

"Yes, Sir; I am to come every other day for a loaf."

This satisfied me that I should see her, and made my mind a little more easy, as I thought her answer implied that she might perhaps be in the employ of some decent family.

So it happened that a week passed and I had no chance to talk with her, until one afternoon, when it was snowing so furiously that even the busy avenue was almost empty of people on foot, when she came in. I knew it was her day to be there, but I had hoped she would not come, it was so very stormy and cold. When the poor maiden entered she was quite wet and dripping, and seemed even more poverty-stricken than the first time I saw her. I came forward quickly to meet her, saying,

"My dear little friend, you must be very much chilled. Take off your damp hood and come to the fire."

"Thank you, Sir," she answered, smiling, and without that quick look of suspicion that one so often sees in city-bred children. She obeyed my suggestion by laying off the ragged covering that hung around her pretty head. As she did so I saw that her hair, which was quite black, curled in a nice, natural sort of way, adding to the young beauty of her face; and I thought what a very dangerous thing it was for one so unprotected to possess such a charm in this wicked city. As I drew her toward the stove, and opened the lower door a bit, the better to warm her little cold feet, I said,

"Sit down here a while, I want to ask you a few questions, if you will let me."

She looked at me as I spoke in a startled sort of way, that was oddly in contrast with her late trustfulness, but as she said nothing I went on—

"What is your name?"

"Susan," she answered, readily enough.

"Susan what?"

"I can't tell you. Please don't ask me any thing more. I am much obliged to you, but I had better go."

She uttered all this very rapidly, and in a frightened tone, at the same time getting up from the chair I had placed for her, and putting out her hand for the hood. I was a good deal disappointed at this want of confidence; but I saw that she was distressed, so I only said,

"Don't be troubled, Susan, I won't ask you any more questions if you don't like it; but sit down again, and warm yourself a bit longer."

"Thank you, Sir; but indeed I had better go."

She was evidently still very uneasy. I had somehow aroused her fears, and all I could do was to tell her, in a bungling sort of way, that I only wanted to find out about her because I took an interest in her, and that I hoped she would continue to come to the shop just the same.

"Yes, Sir, I should like it if you will let me; I had rather come here than any where else, you are so kind."

She spoke very simply and earnestly, with the distrustful look all gone out of her pretty young face. My heart warmed toward her so much that I felt very badly to think of her going out into the increasing snow and darkness, and I could not help saying, as I went to the door with her,

"Take good care of yourself, my child—this is a bad city for you to be out in alone."

She looked at me as if she hardly understood what I meant, and then, with a pleasant smile, bade me "Good-night," and tripped lightly away down the dull street.

When she was gone I fell to puzzling myself with all sorts of useless conjectures as to what could be the motive for her strange secrecy. I was even sometimes tormented by a dreadful suspicion as to what her occupation might be; then, when I thought of her innocent look, and her pretty, genteel way of speaking, I put the idea of shame as attached to her from me as an impossibility. Finally, I worried about it in a restless sort of way that made me quite miserable.

It happened that my wife was away for two days visiting a cousin in the country. I always had an uneasy wretched feeling when she was absent, and I dare say this helped to increase my annoyance. When she came home the next day one of my first acts was to tell her about Susan. She quite shared my solicitude, for she was almost as much interested in her as I was myself; but she scornfully repelled the thought of sin as associated with her, saying, with womanly pride in her own superior powers of questioning, that "she would find out something from her she would promise." However, although the next time Susan came my good woman coaxed her into her own little parlor, and said, I have no doubt, every thing that was kind and motherly to her, she succeeded no better than I had done, only frightening the poor little thing so much that she began to cry. However, she was very easily comforted by promises of future silence, and seemed to bear no malice for what must have been an annoyance. My wife would like to have given her a small sum of money, but Susan resolutely declined it, though she afterward accepted a warm woolen cloak, which, in fact, must have been more comfortable than her forlorn shawl.

After this two or three weeks passed without any occurrence of interest. Susan came regularly every other day, and got to be the best of friends with both my wife and myself. She always came at the same time, that is, late in the afternoon, but we could never persuade her to stay more than half an hour. Once we asked her take dinner with us, but she was so frightened at the request that we never liked to repeat it.

Sometimes we succeeded in inducing her to take a small present; and we had thus given her a warm stuff dress and a neat plain hat, so that she had a far more decent appearance than when we first saw her. Perhaps it was that her pretty face was thus set off to better advantage than formerly; but I very soon began to notice that she never came in or went out of the shop without attracting more attention from any idle loungers there might be about than was best for so friendless a girl.

I can not remember when I first began to remark that there was one young man who was quite constant in his attendance at a neighboring grocery at about the same hour of the day that Susan came for bread. He was a good-looking fellow, I can't deny, and had that sort of air about him that made me feel that he was probably far more at home on the fashionable avenue next to us than in what I dare say he considered our vulgar street. Yet, in spite of his genteel appearance, there was a sort of expression on his face that I did not like—a certain dissipated recklessness that made him very disagreeable to me, from the first time I saw him looking with his evil eyes at our little forlorn Susan.

It was not long before it came to be a regular thing for him to stand in the door of the grocery smoking until she passed, and then for him to lounge idly up and down before my shop all the time she was in it. I did not say any thing to Susan about him, because I feared it might uselessly alarm her; I was, therefore, greatly startled when, one evening that she had left the store later than usual, and I went to the door to watch her, as I often did, I saw him join her about a block off, and accompany her down the avenue.

I was exceedingly troubled at this, more so than I can express. I felt that it meant no good to this pretty little waif, to have a strange young man, with such a face and that stylish appearance I have mentioned, following her. What honest purpose could such a man have toward a poor young girl like Susan? I really felt almost as anxious during the next two days as if it was a child of my own that was in danger, and was vastly relieved when she came in again, looking as innocent and happy as usual. Glancing outside, I saw the disagreeable man standing on the corner smoking complacently. Upon this I could not forbear drawing Susan into the back part of the shop, and there saying to her very earnestly,

"Who was that young man who walked home with you the last time you were here?"

A bright red color came all over her cheeks and forehead; but she answered in a straightforward way, though with a tremulous voice,

"He says his name is Robert Dare."

"Is he a friend of yours?"

"Yes—no—that is, he says he is."

She hesitated more than ever, and became exceedingly embarrassed.

"Susan," said I, gravely, "don't you know that it is very dangerous to make friends with strange young men? How could you let him go home with you, when you would never allow me, although I would be a proper protector, to go even a little way?"

"Indeed, Sir," she answered, quickly, "he did not go home with me; he only went a square or two. He does not know where I live any more than you do; and I am sure, Mr. Owen, you are a better friend than he, and I would much rather tell you if I could—"

The tears came into her eyes as she spoke, and I felt vexed with myself for distressing her with my suspicions. So I only added,

"My dear Susan, I do not intend to find fault with you, only I want to warn you to be very careful."

Her tears were quickly dried, and she was soon smiling as brightly as before. She was such a child, poor simple thing!—so confiding, so easily pacified and amused!

Another week passed. Robert Dare continued to hang about the grocery, and Susan made her regular visits. I did not see them together again, but I had a sort of undefined suspicion that they did meet, though I said no more to her about him, through fear of wounding her. My mind was, therefore, greatly relieved when he disappeared from his post, and for a whole fortnight was nowhere seen. During that time Susan came and went as usual; and my fears being set at rest by the absence of that sinister man, I grew to love very tenderly this innocent little girl, who, as we thought, became daily more like our lost darling. Her confidence seemed to increase constantly, and my wife and I were sanguine that some day she would explain the mystery that surrounded her. If she could only be induced to do this, we were not without a hope that she might be persuaded to leave her home, which must be a wretched one, and come to cheer our lonely house with her bright young presence. Regarding her in this light, it is difficult for me to express how dear she was to us, and how we prized her visits during that tranquil time.

It was a disagreeable March day—how well I remember the sullen look of the earth and the sky!—when Robert Dare came back.

I was talking to Susan, in a pleasant sort of way, about how, when warm weather came, she and I were to go some day to visit a friend of mine who had such a pretty garden, when, chancing to glance out into the dark street, I saw that disagreeable face gazing in at us from the pavement in front of my door. I started, and stopped short in what I was saying; and Susan, noticing my confusion, turned and looked out. She started too, but she did not say any thing—only lingered uneasily for a while longer, and then went away. I walked to the door with her, and peered anxiously into the street. Robert Dare was gone.

Although somewhat reassured by this, I still felt such an uneasiness at the reappearance of that ill-looking man, that, almost without reflection, I stepped back into the shop, and giving a few necessary orders to my apprentice, seized my hat and hurried out to follow Susan. I had often before thought of doing so, and thus discovering where she lived, and was only deterred by the feeling that there was a sort of meanness in it, and that I would much rather leave it to her own good sense to tell us all about her home. But this time I seemed irresistibly impelled by a presentiment that some danger was threatening the poor young thing. I was only a few moments behind her, and I knew so well the direction she always took, that I was intensely surprised when, on reaching the first corner, I perceived that she was nowhere to be seen. In vain I looked up and down the cross streets, and peered into the doors of all the stores—there was no sign of the little graceful figure I knew so well. A fine, drizzling rain was beginning to fall, so that all objects at a short distance were very much obscured, and this, perhaps, favored her escape. But since then I have often thought that probably she had entered a car during the moment that I was away from my door. At the time this suggestion did not occur to me; it was so unlike her usual course on leaving the shop.

After a long, useless search, I turned my steps homeward. The rain was falling in a monotonous drip; the pavement was shiny with the water standing upon it, reflecting the lights from the stores and the cars in a dull sort of glare; the people I passed were all dingy under the shade of their great black umbrellas; the lanterns, which were just lit, seemed to burn with a sullen glow, as if they grudged giving any aid to illumine so dismal a scene; and altogether I felt most unaccountably depressed and out of spirits when I reached my home. At the door I met Mrs. Carroway.

Now I have not said any thing about Mrs. Carroway before, because it has not seemed needful to the proper understanding of my story; but here a few words of explanation may not be amiss. The upper part of the building containing my shop was finished as a dwelling-house, and had a private entrance on Sixth Avenue. It was very small, containing only four rooms—two on each floor; but we had been in the habit, ever since Mary died, of letting one of these to some decent body, whose little payments would go some way toward our rent. The person who had lodged with us for nearly two years past was Mrs. Carroway. She was a distant cousin of my wife, and a most neat and respectable woman. There was only one objection to her, and that was what she called her "profession." She was a monthly nurse, in a good business; and the dreadful hours of the night at which people were in the habit of sending for her had been for some time past the trial of my life. It used to seem as if no lady, by any possible chance, was taken ill by daylight, or at any time when any one was likely to be up and able to attend the door. It was always in the quiet stillness of the small hours that there would come tremendous rings of the bell and violent calls for the nurse to come with all possible speed.

I wonder why it is that babies have such a fancy for coming into the world in the darkness. I have heard somewhere the remark that it is because their guardian angels, knowing what a wretched change this world will be from the heavenly home their little souls have just left, kindly sends them into it while it is shrouded in gloom, so that when daylight comes the contrast may be pleasant enough to reconcile them to their new abode. Be that as it may, certain it is that all Mrs. Carroway's babies chose the hours of sleep for making their appearance, and routing all the people anyhow connected with them out of their warm beds. But then our cousin kept her small room so neat, and it was unoccupied so much of the time, for which she paid the same rent, that, on the whole, we thought her a good lodger, in spite of the objection I have mentioned.

Well, as I was saying, I met Mrs. Carroway at the door, and as soon as she saw me she began:

"Oh, Cousin Owen, I am so glad to be able to see you a moment. I have just been sent for, all in a hurry, to go to Mrs. Higgins; but I want to give you her number. Here it is on this card. Don't lose it."

"Oh no," said I, feeling very thankful that she had for once been called for at a decent hour. "I suppose, now, no one will come for you for a while again."

"Well, I don't know about that. There is Mrs. Joyce expecting every moment; but of course I can't go there. 'First come first served,' you know. But if she does send you can recommend Mrs. Hubbard. Good-by."

So the worthy woman bustled into the carriage that was waiting, and I went into the shop, and fell to thinking of Susan again, and wondering what could have become of her. Talking about this lasted my wife and I all the evening, and I went to bed with my mind full of an anxiety for her that I could not shake off. I dare say it was this that caused my dreams to be so haunted with her pretty face and Robert Dare's ugly one, that it was almost a relief to be awakened, as I was soon after midnight, by a terrible ringing and calling at the private entrance.

I jumped up quickly and put my head out of the window, which was directly over the door. There was a carriage below, and a man standing on the steps, who was making such a noise that it was several minutes before he heard me shouting to him. When I had succeeded in attracting his attention, he said he wanted Mrs. Carroway for Mrs. Joyce, who was taken suddenly ill. Of course I explained to him that she was gone, recommended her friend, Mrs. Hubbard, and then the man and the coach drove off.

As I have said, it was after midnight, the rain was still falling in a dull, monotonous way, the cars had all stopped running, and only a mournful wind came sweeping up the deserted street. The lanterns shone with a red, watery gleam on the wet pavement and the dark houses, and, in short, it was a very gloomy scene to look upon. My wife called to me:

"Come, John, you will catch cold if you stay there."

And indeed I do not know why I lingered, as I did, for a moment after the man and the coach were gone. I was just about to close the window when I heard a rushing, rattling sound coming up Decem Street. It sounded like some vehicle driven very fast—indeed faster than any one, even rowdies, ever drive in the city—and I paused a moment, leaning out to see what it might be. The sound increased rapidly, and then on a sudden a close carriage was driven furiously past. It was but a moment that the black mass and galloping horses were in sight; but in that brief time I heard one, two, piercing shrieks, and then a voice, raised to the utmost pitch of its power, and rendered unnatural with fright and horror, cried out distinctly—

"Mr. Owen! Mr. Owen! help! help!"

After that there was only a rush and rattle, growing fainter in the distance. Even my wife, lying in bed, heard that scream that rings in my ears to this day; but she did not know, as I did, instantly and undoubtedly, that it was Susan's voice.

I can not tell how I managed to get on clothes enough for decency, and then to dash out into the street all stockingless and hatless, and rush frantically in the direction of the carriage.

It was quite out of hearing long before I turned the corner of Decem Street, and of course was nowhere to be seen, although I ran at the top of my speed, and in a manner to which I have been utterly unused these forty years past. Seeing that my own single exertions were quite useless, I very soon turned my steps to the nearest police station, and arrived there so breathless and exhausted that it was some moments before I could make myself understood. You may be sure I was considerably indignant to find half a dozen watchmen, who should have been patrolling the streets of the neighborhood, all comfortably seated around the station fire, which was, no doubt, more inviting than the wet streets outside. If they had been at their posts, as was their duty, they might have arrested the flying carriage; and feeling this, I was so carried away by indignation as to mingle many reproaches with my request for aid. Perhaps it was owing to the heat of my words that they manifested a certain reluctance to accompany me on my search, some of them affecting to disbelieve my story, and one of them even suggesting that I had been drinking! I, who have always been as sober a man as lives!

Smothering my wrath at this unjust accusation, I even condescended to offer a reward to these dishonest men for doing what was only their duty. At this one or two arose with alacrity and went out with me, and the rest, ashamed of lingering there any longer, sullenly went off to their beats.

With my two companions I started on what was, of course, a useless search; for when we began it it was nearly an hour since I had seen the coach, and we could do no more than follow blindly in the direction it had taken, which might have been changed a dozen times. However, we did all we could under the circumstances by giving notice at the police head-quarters, and making such inquiries as we thought might lead to something. I did not turn my face homeward until I was satisfied that further exertion would at that time be useless. I parted from the two policemen with additional promises of payment on my part, and on theirs earnest assurances that every thing in their power should be done to recover the lost girl.

I reached home about daylight wholly worn-out, and very wretched, mind and body. I was painfully conscious that every moment was precious, and that already sufficient time had elapsed for the villain who had stolen her to have accomplished at least a part of his wicked purpose.

My wife was awaiting my return in the greatest anxiety; but not all her kind nursing, nor the hope she continued to urge upon me that some other poor girl than Susan might have uttered that cry, could prevent me from tormenting myself so much that this, combined with my exposure, brought on a high fever. For two days I was so ill that I was part of the time quite out of my head, and when sane, in such a stupid state that I could scarcely think coherently. However, being blessed with a naturally strong constitution, I rallied on the third day, and from that time rapidly recovered. The first question that I asked my wife was,

"Has Susan been here?"

A mournful shake of the head was my reply; and if I had wanted confirmation for my worst fears, it was given by the little maiden's absence on her regular days for coming for bread.

As soon as I was able to see them, the policemen came to make their report; but what could it be but failure? I did not know where Susan lived, nor even her last name, and my directions were, therefore, hopelessly vague.

Three more days passed without any tidings of the lost girl. During that time I was gradually gaining strength, and on the third afternoon I came down into the shop and sat there in a large arm-chair without feeling much fatigue. Things had gone so wrong in my absence, and there were so many directions to give, that I had become quite interested in my business, and for a moment poor Susan was out of my thoughts, when suddenly the door of the store was thrown open with a bang and a woman came swiftly in, and walking directly to my chair, said, in a low, strange voice, and with an excitement of manner oddly at variance with the ordinary question,

"Is it Mr. Owen?"

"Yes, Madam," answered I, much startled; for she was very pale, with glittering eyes that were fixed upon me in a wild, desperate sort of a way. I had scarcely spoken when she burst out, frantically,

"Give me my daughter!—give me my own little Susan!—tell me where she is!—oh, for God's sake, give her back to me!"

The last words were choked in a sob, and followed by a burst of tears that seemed fairly to tear her with its violence.

Exceedingly shocked, I started up, and, while forcing her to seat herself in the chair I had recently occupied, I protested, with an earnestness that, I presume, carried conviction with it, that I knew nothing whatever of her daughter. When she at last comprehended this, she took her hands from her face, and, looking at me for an instant, as if to read in my eyes confirmation of my words, sprang up, exclaiming, in a mad sort of way,

"Lost!—great Heavens!—lost!"

Before I could catch hold of her she staggered a few steps toward the door and fell in a dead faint.

By this time my presence of mind, which was at first quite upset, had returned. I sent the staring apprentice up stairs for my wife, and together we succeeded in carrying the woman into our parlor and laying her on the sofa. The remedies we used brought her to consciousness after a few moments; but it was only to weep and go on in a manner that was truly frightful. However, after a while, my wife's gentle talk soothed her somewhat, and our united assurances of our desire to aid and comfort her, brought her into a state of calmness that enabled her to tell us her sad story.

She was Susan's mother, and her name was Howard. She was of a very good family—as our city people think—belonging, as I afterward learned, to a household on Fifth Avenue. She had married against her father's will a poor and obscure person, and had, in consequence, been refused all assistance by her outraged parents. She and her husband at first hid themselves in a small village, and there struggled on for many weary years against crushing poverty. About a twelvemonth ago Mr. Howard had died, leaving his widow with this one little girl, the sole survivor of eight children. With her she had come to the city in hopes of obtaining aid and forgiveness from her father. In this she had been disappointed. The news which awaited her here was, that he had died suddenly some two weeks before her arrival, leaving his property, which was by no means as large as was supposed, to his infant grand-children, the representatives of her only brother. The charity of the lawyers to whom she had applied had supplied her with a small sum of money, and with this she had sought out a cheap and obscure lodging, where she had languished during the past winter, unable to procure work, and too proud to attempt to obtain aid from distant relatives or old acquaintance who had known her in her youth.

From Susan she had heard of what she was pleased to call our great kindness, but from a morbid dread of meeting strangers she insisted that her name and residence should be kept a secret, even from us. Of Robert Dare she had no suspicion; and as Susan had never returned to her home since her last errand to us, she naturally concluded that we knew where she was, and, after a brief struggle between love and pride, had come to us with the whole of her sad history.

All this was told in a disconnected, almost incoherent sort of way, that proved how much she must have suffered. She seemed much affected by our evident sympathy, and listened with disproportionate gratitude to my account of the efforts I had made to recover the lost one; although her grief was, if possible, increased and rendered more poignant than before by the suggestion, which I made as delicately as possible, that Robert Dare was her abductor.

"Sometimes I feared that some such evil had befallen her," said she, "this city is so large and wicked; but it seemed more probable that you, who she represented as being so kind, had detained, without thinking of the pain her absence would cause me."

"No, Madam," replied I, "much as we loved your daughter, we would not have been so cruel."

"I know it, I know it now, my friend; forgive me, if I have seemed unjust. But oh!"—and here she fell into a dreadful fit of agitation—"I could not believe that one so young could have fallen!"

"Fallen, Madam!" exclaimed I, very much horrified at the suggestion; "you can not suppose that she went with that young man voluntarily."

"I do not know! I do not know!" cried the wretched mother, wringing her hands. "Why did she not come home? She must have gone freely at first. She could not have been forced off by daylight, although no doubt she was carried away during the night against her will. No, no! she probably did not know what would be the consequences of her foolish coquetry: she was not criminal, only imprudent; but that I ought to have expected—it is my proper punishment. I, too, was thoughtless and wayward: I, too, went away without my parent's knowledge! She is my own daughter! Oh, Susan! Susan!"

Here her utterance became inarticulate, and she went on again in such a wild sort of way that it required our utmost endeavors to bring her into any kind of calmness.

When she was composed we talked long and earnestly of what was to be done, and both my wife and myself suggested hopes which we could not ourselves cordially feel. We did all we could to induce her to remain in our house, at least until some tidings came of Susan; but although she said she should spend most of her time with us, she insisted upon returning to her lodgings, which were very near, in a wretched cross street some few squares below. Of course, now that I had won information, I was enabled to prosecute the search for Susan with better chance of success, and before poor Mrs. Howard left us for the night I had seen the policemen and stimulated them to fresh exertions.

Alas! they were followed by no better result than before. Day after day dragged wearily by, and still no tidings of the lost one. The distress which we naturally felt at this dreadful suspense was increased a thousand-fold by the agony of the poor mother. It was piteous to see her coming every morning with the eager question, that was answered by our sad faces before it passed her trembling lips. Then to have her lingering all day about our house, scarcely ever quiet for a moment, going and returning constantly between the shop and the little parlor up stairs. We could not prevail upon her to remain in one place: at the slightest sound she would start up and come forward with a piercing, restless look, that at last came to be the fixed expression on her poor haggard face. I could see that all this wore terribly upon her. She had told us that for years she had been a great invalid. Seldom able to walk any distance—which was the reason why she was obliged to send Susan on any errand that was necessary—and I felt that this constant anxiety and over-exertion was wearing her away. Each day she seemed to grow more thin and pale; both my wife and I saw that only the excitement of grief kept her up, and feared that even if her daughter were restored to her arms quite well and happy, the poor lady would sink into some dangerous illness.

Thus three weeks crept by. It seems to me the most wretched three weeks of my life; for although I have had my share of sorrow in this world, never any days seemed as dark to me as those dreadful days of a suspense that was almost a certainty that some terrible evil had befallen the poor young thing in whom we were all so interested. The latter part of that sad time it seemed as if we could not go on any longer in that dreadful way—as if any knowledge, however horrible, would be better than this distressing anxiety; yet, after all, when that knowledge came, it found us wholly unprepared for its crushing effects.

About the end of the three weeks Mrs. Carroway came back from her attendance on Mrs. Higgins. She was such a good-hearted soul, and took such an interest in our trouble, that she said it really made her low-spirited to be in the house. On this account, as no lady sent for her, she very gladly accepted the invitation of a friend of hers, who lived down near the water, to go and spend the day with her. She went off quite early in the morning, and after she was gone it seemed as if a deeper gloom than ever settled upon us three wretched people.

The day dragged wearily away, without any incident to break its monotony, until about the middle of the afternoon, when there came a coach driving up in such haste that our hearts beat, and we all rushed to the door together. However, it turned out to be only a messenger for Mrs. Carroway. I told the man that she was out, and tried to describe to him where she was to be found; but as I did not know the number of the house, and he was in great haste, I finally proposed to go with him and show him the way, feeling that perhaps the drive would do me good. With many thanks he accepted my offer, and we were soon at the place, which, if I recollect right, was on Forbes Street, somewhere beyond Tenth Avenue.

I went in myself and summoned Mrs. Carroway. She was in the midst of a comfortable chat with her friends, and a little annoyed at the interruption; so that I heard her muttersome disparaging remark about babies, that appeared to express an opinion coinciding with mine in regard to those wrong-headed bits of humanity. However, after a little bustle she was ready, and I handed her into the carriage; then, as they were going off into the upper part of the city, quite in the opposite direction from my shop, I declined taking a seat with them, and turned away, resolved to have a short walk before setting my face homeward.

It was a bright, mild afternoon in April; the sun was near setting, and there was such a suggestion of spring in the atmosphere that I thought I would go down toward the water, and see if I could not get a breath of sea air. There was only one block between the point from which I started and the shore—if shore it could be called, which was in reality a row of low hovels, with an occasional warehouse looming above them. It was warm enough to bring out all the dreadful smells that infest that part of the city; and I thought, as I went on, I had never seen so much squalor and filth as appeared in the windows and by the doors of the miserable dwellings I passed. Notwithstanding this, following I know not what irresistible impulse, I pressed on toward the water, though naturally all these sights and the shocking sounds I heard did not tend to raise my spirits, so that I came out on a little wharf which jutted into the river wholly unrefreshed. Even here I found no chance of purity or fresh air. The pier was quite surrounded by small boats, and an inferior sort of craft in which all the operations of life appeared to be performed on deck, so that there came from them a mingled smell of bad cooking and vile brandy. Several sailors of the worst description were lounging about; and there were barrels containing tar, molasses, and other filthy substances, piled up along the edge of the wharf.

The waters of the river rolled past muddy and sluggish, as if tainted by contact with our wicked city; the opposite shore was brown and dreary, with its fringe of bare trees on the summit of the hills; and even the sky was half-veiled with the dingy smoke that hangs above us like a pall. There was nothing in such a scene to cheer me, and I was just about to turn away, when I heard a cry from one of the boats that lay farthest out in the water. The sailors that were idling about all rushed to the spot, and in an astonishingly short space of time the whole pier was covered with a crowd of the worst-looking set of creatures I ever saw.

that were whispered from one to another, that a body had been found floating down the stream.

The horrible fascination there ever is in such a scene seemed to seize me, forcing me to linger, and I found myself pressing eagerly forward to the front rank, so that I was one of the first that saw the rude group of men that were staggering forward under that awful burden. A dozen eager hands were stretched out to help them up the sloping plank on to the wharf where they were, close beside me. I saw that it was the body of a woman, clothed in a long white dress, somewhat torn; one long loose rag was twisted round the head, so as quite to conceal the face. With coarse oaths and curses the sailors cleared a way among the crowd to a low shanty near by. There they laid the poor dead thing down on a low wooden bench, and one of the men unwrapped the cloth from the head.

Then I knew that it was Susan!

The short black hair, all wet and matted, elung curling round the fair young face, whose beauty was all gone in the livid contractions of death. On the fixed features there was a terrible expression of horror and fright, and in one of the temples there was a small deep wound, from which the blood trickled slowly, drop by drop. For a moment an involuntary hush fell on the rough crowd; then some one said,

"She was murdered!"

And there arose a Babel of questions and conjectures that brought me out of my first great horror, and warned me that it was time to act. I came forward with an air of authority, and, laying my hand on her forehead, said,

"I know this young woman, and I will take her home."

At this moment a policeman bustled through the crowd, and informed me that the body could not be removed until after the inquest had been held. He and I together managed to clear the room, and he allowed me to sit beside her during the time that elapsed until they prepared to go through the solemn farce which the law requires. They would not permit me to put any more clothes upon her, so that all I could do was to dispose her damp garments decently over her round young figure, and to cross her small brown hands upon her breast. In doing this, I saw that on one of her fingers there glittered a diamond ring.

I can not describe the pang which shot through my heart as I caught the flash of that treacherous stone. I knew then that she had not been killed by any merely mercenary villain; and I felt an absolute conviction, strong as if I had seen him do it, that Robert Dare was the murderer.

I drew off the ring, in the hope of finding some inscription within it that might point out the giver, but it was blank—as speechless as the pallid corpse beside me.

For a long time no one came. I sat there while the sun went down, glancing its last crimson rays into the wretched hovel, and bathing Susan's head in a glory as of fresh blood, thinking what hopes of happiness were blasted in that mute ruin. I pictured to myself her mother's despair at the awful story I had to tell her; and I fancied what that poor young girl must have gone through in the three weeks since I last saw her so innocent and well, until it seemed as if I should go out of my mind with grief and indignation.

At last the coarse men who were to form the jury came. I pass over in silence the outrageous mockery of justice that followed. It is useless to describe it, and I fear my narrative already wearies.

It was quite late before I was enabled to take my poor dead child into a carriage and convey her to my home. Arrived there, it was my intention to inform my wife of what had occurred, and have Susan neatly dressed and laid out before the poor mother saw her. But Providence willed it otherwise. I took the precaution to stop the carriage a short distance below the shop, but as I passed up the steps, and the light from inside struck upon me, it blinded me so with the sudden transition from darkness that I did not see a figure crouching beside the door. I was therefore inexpressibly startled by a wild, shrill shriek, that sounded clear above all the noises of the street, just as my wife hurried out to meet me.

"Good God!" cried I, "what was that?"

"Mrs. Howard!" gasped my wife. "Where is she? What has happened?"

Then, breathless, we both hurried to the carriage, and there we saw a sight that, to this day, I shudder to think of. The poor mother, quite out of her senses, had clasped her daughter in her arms, and was covering her livid lips with frantic kisses, at the same time uttering shrieks of wild, frantic laughter that were most dreadful to hear.

A mob was fast collecting; but it needed all the strength of the two policemen who accompanied me to drag her off and force her into the shop. Then they brought in the unresisting corpse, and, closing the door, we shut the whole horror into our own house.

The news soon spread, and kind neighbors came in to help us watch with the poor maniac. All our efforts to soothe her were in vain. She never ceased her wild cries until overtaken nature gave way, and she sank into a stupor. In this state she lingered some few hours; but before the next night the mother and daughter were reunited in that world where there is neither tears nor parting forever.

My statement is finished. From that day to this my efforts to bring the murderer to punishment have been unavailing. No one would listen to my story; or, if they did, would allow that, on such slender evidence, Robert Dare could be arrested and convicted. I have never seen him since, all my efforts to find him having proved utterly useless; and I make this appeal, in the hope that wherever that man, with his sinister eyes and his bad face, may be, there will be some one possessing the courage to remind him of his crime; or that, at least, he may read this history of our sufferings, and it may awaken in his cold heart a tardy remorse.

OUT IN THE STORM.

HOW wet and dreary the streets are!
 'Tis a wild and lonesome night;
 And the air is full of voices—
 I shudder with cold and fright.

Ah me, for a little fire!
 I will creep here under the cart;
 Something whispers of patience,
 But I'm cold—at my very heart.

What is it there in the shadow
 That wavers and beckons so?
 Nothing. Dear little Nelly—
 Dead, years and years ago!

Does she know that her poor old father
 Is dying here in the street—
 Cold, and ragged, and hungry,
 With not a morsel to eat?

Sweet girl! I believe she loved me.
 I remember her voice, her smile.
 She is gone! Ah, well, I shall see her,
 Perhaps, in a little while.

I am cold—my heart is freezing.
 Heart! Why do I babble so?
 What little I had to be frozen
 Was frozen long ago.

There's a light just there, at the baker's,
 But I can not crawl, for pain;
 Perhaps he would let me in a while—
 O God! to be warm again.

How wet and cold the pavement!
 I could pity my own white hair—
 Alas! if my heart were younger;
 But there's nothing but ashes there!

Is it cold in the grave, I wonder—
 Ugh! the cruel and pitiless storm!—
 No matter; 'tis all that's left me;
 Thank God if it's only warm.

WILLIAM WINTER.

A STRUGGLE FOR LIFE.

I.

IT was the last day of the Indiana Conference. All business was dispatched, and the assembled preachers waited only for that last and most important announcement which should decide for each the scene of his next year's labors. In our Methodist communion the bishop who presides over the annual meeting called the "Conference" wields the appointing power. His word, in this matter, has been wisely made supreme; and though, with us degenerating Methodists of the East, the body of presiding elders prompts the wisdom of their superior, while the larger and wealthier congregations go one step farther and ask privately beforehand for the man of their choice, in the generous West they stick to the primitive mode, trusting to the experience of the bishop that he shall so fit the men to the churches that neither may be wronged.

Nor, let it be said here to the honor of those venerable men, who have now for more than half a century exercised this somewhat arbitrary power, has there often been found just cause of complaint.

The list of appointments is prepared during the session of Conference, and is kept strictly secret; so that no one knew, nor could form even a probable guess at his fate. The murmur of voices was therefore hushed, and all listened as with one ear when the bishop rose to solve their riddles for them.

One by one the willing servants bowed their accepting heads, with a sigh of relief or sorrow, and lost their general curiosity in their particular interest. Presently was read out:

"SHOTTOVER STATION: PAUL CLIFTON."

Whereat a few of the elder brethren looked over toward the young man so named, scrutinizing him with critical eyes, as though measuring his fitness for this "Shottover Station;" while others, the younger preachers, looked up with eyes in which pity for him was mingled with ill-concealed joy at their own escape.

For they were hard cases at Shottover Station. The Church was small and weak; the "outsiders" a turbulent set, irreverent to the last degree, exceedingly sharp at discovering the preacher's weak points, and very ready to take advantage of them. A very stronghold of Satan was Shottover, where the poor minister need hope for but small pay and less respect, and might think himself lucky if he got off with whole bones. Once or twice, indeed, in years past, they had driven the newly-appointed man away by force of their brawny arms and leathery lungs; and once, taking an exceeding dislike to a young fellow just from college, and serving here his first year (and who, as they complained, "knew every thing"), they had combined together and literally starved him out.

Therefore Shottover was a place to be avoided by all means; a plague-spot which had driven several tender-hearted men into other Conferences; and to which now for some years the youngest member was, by general agreement of the bishop with his subordinates, sent to make trial of his budding powers—just as boys who have run away from home to sea are on their first voyage placed in charge of the sky-sails and royal studding-sails, to loose and furl them. Whereby at least those whose romance lies but skin-deep, and who were indeed called, but not chosen, grow to hate the glorious sea-life in the precise proportion as they scrape the skin off their tender shins, and are glad, at the first port, to run away home again.

Which I take to be a fine example of Mr. Darwin's recently advanced theory of "Natural Selection."

Paul Clifton, who sat in pleased unconsciousness a little on one side of the room (like a young bear, all his sorrows before him), was a recent acquisition to the Conference. He had graduated with honor two years before at a Theological Institute in the East; had preached experimentally, and very acceptably, on various occasions, and to different city and country congregations; had "taken a run over to Europe," and was now counted a promising young man, whom any Conference would be glad to receive; when lo! to the surprise and disappointment of his friends, he set his face Westward, and eschewing the flesh-pots of New York, resolutely wandered into the desert of Indiana. Another John Baptist, said Miss Thomasina Dobbs, a romantic young lady, who was shrewdly suspected of designs upon the reverend Paul's heart—though very unlike John Baptist indeed, thought the rough Hoosier preachers, when they saw him pull off his neatly-fitting kid gloves on coming into Conference room, and spread an immaculate pocket-handkerchief on the dirty floor whereon to kneel at prayers.

The fact is, young Clifton had been bred in ease, and had the outside of a gentleman, which is a disadvantage sometimes; particularly if the inside does not correspond. He had a young man's natural longing to go out into the world, and see a little of the rough side of it—to try his own wings, which he had now for some years been impatiently fluttering on the edge of the paternal nest. Add to this the honest enthusiasm of a young fellow who believes himself called to show the heavenly road (not as a finger-post, as Jean Paul suggests, which only points the way, but does not move itself). And this tempered, perhaps, by the modest thought that it would be easier for him, a young and inexperienced man, to lead rough Hoosiers up this steep and narrow path than the more refined and intellectual congregations of the East—a little mistake I have known wiser men than the reverend Paul to make—as though the wildest horses did not need the best drivers. Put these together, and you have, I suppose, nearly the mixture of motives which brought him to avoid the soft ease of a "first-class city appointment," and join himself to this unknown future of the backwoods.

The bishop regarded him with mild pity as he read him his fate. A set custom could not be violated on his account; nor, indeed, did the venerable man believe that this trial had best be spared the young preacher. When the last hymn was sung, and the prayer and benediction had dismissed the members to their homes, he walked over to where Clifton sat, and shaking his hand encouragingly, said,

"Keep up your spirits, Brother Paul! the sword of the Lord is on your side—the sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

"Yes, yes," remarked an old fellow who overheard these words: "I wish there was a little more Gideon though"—while a hard-featured circuit-rider growled to himself, "'Tain't right, hardly. I've a mind to change places with him; he looks like a good young fellow."

"You leave him alone," interrupted old Father Sawyer; "probably the bishop knows what he's about. Let the young man take his chance. The Lord will provide."

"I don't believe the Lord knows any thing about Shottover," retorted the circuit-rider, who had enough of Gideon about him, at any rate; and who probably would have rather enjoyed a tussle with that devil of mischief, who was said to be so strongly intrenched in Paul Clifton's new station.

In which regard he differed much from Paul, who was not what you would call a muscular Christian, forcing people heavenward by the fear of the Lord and a big fist; but eminently a mild-mannered man, slender, and more given to his Greek Testament than to his dumb-bells. Old Peter Cartwright would have counted him but small potatoes. But then, even Peter is mortal. In fact, I find nothing so very mortal as muscle.

That he might properly prepare himself for personal contest with the sons of Belial who made Shottover a by-word and a reproach in the mouths of the brethren, these took care fully to inform Brother Paul of the various disagreeables and trials he might expect in his new station. (Just in this way my grandmother used to describe to me beforehand, and with great minuteness and conscientiousness, the nauseous horrors of that inimitable flavor of disgust, an impending dose of castor-oil. From which resulted to me, in the end, a strong dislike, not so much of castor-oil, as of grandmothers—and particularly those of the male sex.) Thus advised, and in no very sanguine temper, Paul rode into Shottover on top of the stage, on a Saturday morning; and after refreshing his inner and outer man at the hotel, proceeded to view his church.

Now, to an earnest and unsophisticated Christian like the Reverend Paul Clifton, used all his life to the comfortably-cushioned pews, carpeted aisles, sofa'd pulpits, and scrupulous cleanliness of our city churches, the little meeting-house of Shottover was like to be a shock.

A shock, certainly, to his sense of comfort and decency; perhaps (who knows?) to his faith in the Christian doctrine.

It is unpleasantly situated in the extreme edge of a bare and sterile clay-bank—down which, I verily believe, it will tumble some rainy day. Its low roof; its mud-bespattered walls, once painted a dirty white; its narrow door-way, making no allowance for sinners in crinoline; its ragged wagon-shed, like Jack Straw's house, neither wind-tight nor water-tight, and through whose board-sides several generations of idle horses had gnawed sundry holes, which gave their successors occasional privileged squints into a cool meadow beyond—thus pointing a Sunday lesson even to obstinate horse-flesh, by this pleasant vision of heavenly grass fields; and this flanked by an appalling architectural novelty—a bell-tower, or embryo steeple, standing on its own base, and giving the impression to an unfamiliar eye that it had been lifted down from its proper place on the roof by some light-handed giant—all this does not promise well to a man who holds his faith by the ties of mere use and comfort.

Within, the narrow aisles are covered with a fine coating of rich Indiana mud. The hard, straight-backed, uncushioned pews afford no rest to the wicked; nor indeed to the pious either, unless, as is sometimes the case, piety and adipose tissue are found in the same body. The preaching-stand has at least the merit of consistency, being neither cleaner nor more ornamental than the rest of the church. Rain-stained windows; bare, white-washed, and partly "pooled" walls, white where no stains of tobacco betoken the resting-place of some saint who chews the cud of Virginia content beneath the shadow of the preacher's long arms; and a huge stove, whose pipes stretch like vast arms along the ceiling on both sides, as though preparing to shed a fervid blessing on the assemblage: truly here was found cause sufficient for a series of shocks to Christians of weak faith or sensitive nerves.

II.

Nevertheless, though cleanliness is next to godliness, a dirty shirt is not evidence of the unpardonable sin; and, thank God! I have known men whose hard hands and soiled clothes hid a soul so clean that, if you were not wretchedly near-sighted, and could see at all through a coating of clean dirt, you at once took such to your heart.

Such an one was Farmer Leighton. A tall, raw-boned, hard-featured man, with the awkward straddling gait, uncertain poise of body, and splay feet, which are the rewards of an inscrutable Providence for a life of severe toil—perhaps to teach us to look beneath the surface for the truest worth; perhaps also to tell us that man does not live by bread alone, and that Mary did indeed choose a better part than serviceable Martha.

Farmer Leighton was now a well-to-do personage in his little world. A man of some forty-five summers, in most of which corn-planting, hay-making, reaping, and housing crops—the multifarious, never-ceasing toils of the farm—had left their marks not lightly upon him; with scant, grizzled side-whiskers, and a chin wretchedly shaven by a dull razor and an unsteady, wearied hand; hair of that tawny sandy hue which betokens several generations of rough struggle with forest-life, hanging down in straight and tangled locks about his ears and coat-collar; and a Sunday suit of blue Kentucky-jeans, home-made, and ingeniously contrived to show every angle and rough knot and ungraceful line in the poor, ill-used body beneath. This was the man whose harsh, cracked voice, with a querulous quaver in it at first, and a strange after-tone of protecting and longing love, called out,

"Now, then, old lady!"

At which a bright bay mare, harnessed to a mud-splashed buggy, standing near the hitching-post at the gate, pricked up her ears and wondered what she had done now.

As though there were no other old lady in the world!

"In a minute," answered a voice from within doors, having in it also a certain uncertain tremble—a quaver, however, which stood for the fearfulness of a long and much-loving heart, whose meek habit was to fit its motions to the convenience of others; a voice soft and agreeable, even though it was cracked, and hinting of many cares and much housewifely forecast. And presently appeared in the covered way of the comfortable double cabin a portly dame to whom this voice belonged.

Her followed a young girl, blue-eyed and fair-haired, as they are in Indiana, and of such buxom and shapely form, combining both strength and grace, as is the natural result of "hog and hominy," plenty of fresh air, and a total lack of servants and other incentives to a lazy life. Her name is Miranda Leighton—for which I am sorry, for I can not but believe that she should have been called by some such honest and plain name as Susan, Jane, or Eliza. But the Hoosier farmers, having little other grandeur to bestow upon their children, are pretty sure to give them grand and outlandish names. And I have a respect for facts, which are stubborn things, but useful in their way.

Miranda unfastened her pony from a rack beneath the wagon-shed, where he had stood under shelter—lucky beast!—and leading him up to the horse-block, leaped lightly into the saddle. As she settled herself there, helped by her father's kindly hands, a horseman rode into the open by a turn of the road.

"There's John now," said Mrs. Leighton. "John, come, go to church with us."

"I'm goin'," said he. "Ther's a new minister, ain't thar?"

"Yes; and no tricks now, John," urged his mother, beseechingly.

"No, indeed; we're goin' to listen—see what stuff he's made of. Guess the boys'll be still enough to-day."

"I'll warrant they'll all be thar," grumbled old man Leighton.

Which was a safe guess. For, next to a circus, nothing draws so large a crowd in an Indiana village as public speaking of any kind; and above all, a new preacher. A talent for oratory is worshiped by all the West; and a man who really has something to say, and knows how to say it as though he believed with all his heart, could not have a more appreciative audience than these rough, unlettered Indiana farmers. Nor will you find any where sharper or more relentless critics than these. As logical as children, and as impatient of humbug, they are ever ready with a biting word, which inevitably pierces to the core of some conscious misstatement, or sophistry which the speaker is not himself taken in by.

So the sister and brother rode off together in advance, while the old folks followed at such leisurely pace as suited the bay mare, who had had her own way so many years that she took it now as a matter of right.

Miranda had just returned from school. In Indiana the boys must work, and their schooling comes, if at all, by fits and starts—as they say lawyers get to heaven. It is theirs to battle with the primal curse from their earliest years, and such learning as they get is picked up at odd times, and chiefly from their Bibles and the agricultural papers. But the girls go to school. For them money is laid by; and as they grow to young womanhood, poor indeed must be the farmer who does not send his daughter away to boarding-school in some city or larger town, where she has, at any rate, the opportunity to gather such of the ways, and thoughts, and accomplishments of a more finished culture as may assimilate best to her nature. With these advantages the daughter becomes the oracle of the house, cherished by all as a being of superior mould, and greatly held in awe by younger brothers, who submit, with what grace may be, to her dominion. Miranda, as I said, had just returned from school. The free air and pleasant sunshine of this Sunday morning, and the exhilarating canter of the pony, raised her spirits, and gave her courage to administer a scolding to John, some of whose tricks she had heard of on her return from school at Louisville.

"Don't you see it's very wrong?" she asked, with such a sparkle in her eyes as made it vaguely doubtful to contrite John whether it was nearly so wrong as he had before thought to tie a kitten under the bench occupied by the young ladies' Bible class in church, where it had miawed dismally at every pause in the sermon, to the great distress of the young ladies and the intense delight of the boys.

"Don't you see it's wrong?" she repeated. "Didn't mother always tell you to be a good boy; and didn't I always tell you to behave?"

"I'm going to be as good as pie, now you've come back, Sis," said John, turning toward the pleased Miranda a face really expressive of a vast amount of contrition. But alas! as he turned in the saddle a horrifying screech of feline agony interrupted this charming scene.

"O Lord!" exclaimed John, sliding nimbly off his horse, and making a desperate grab after his coat-tails, from a pocket in one of which presently emerged a good-sized cat, spitting out in evident rage at her treatment, and with eyes sparkling, head down, and tail erect, rushed off into the woods.

There was a dead and ominous silence for the space of twenty interminable seconds.

"Now, JOHN!" at last exclaimed Miranda, very slowly, and with an injured air; "now, JOHN!"

And then the little witch could hold her grave face no longer, but burst out into such a peal of laughter that the pony was really at a loss to know what it all meant, while the bay mare hurried up her lagging paces, very much surprised indeed, and anxious to discover the cause of such sudden merriment.

"You BAD, WICKED boy!" exclaimed Miranda, catching a moment's breath, and with it a grave face; but seeing John still standing by his horse, with red face, and hands closely held to his coat-tails, she broke away again into a laugh which the woods were very glad indeed to echo.

"I didn't mean to've sot on her," said John, respectfully, willing to mollify his sister; "guess she ain't hurt much.

"I'll catch her if you like," he added, suddenly, in the hope that an offer of service, of whatever kind, would help him out.

"Tain't that, you dreadful boy. You know very well," laughed Miranda, trying to assume that severity of countenance which she felt the occasion and the offense demanded. "What was the cat doing in your pocket, you dreadful fellow?"

"Can't a feller take his cat to church without you pitchin' into him?" retorted John, in injured tones; and then feeling that defense was worse than useless in his case, and seeing, besides, the bay mare approaching, with father and mother peering curiously at their children, he judged it prudent to remount his horse and ride off at such pace that he was not likely to be caught. But as he rode Miranda noticed, with a chuckle of satisfaction, that he still held one hand carefully near that coat-pocket which had contained the luckless cat.

III.

The Reverend Paul Clifton rose early on this Sunday morning, and was the first man—after the sexton—to enter the church. To say that he felt comfortable would be to make him out a fool, which he was not. It was a novel situation; and I dare say it costs a gentleman more serious thought to preach to a congregation of Indiana farmers than it does Peter Cartwright to expound his Gospel to a Fifth Avenue audience. When he had seen his church (or meeting-house)—when he had made the acquaintance of the sexton, and some others of the leading members—when he had slept upon his impressions—and now, on this bright Sunday morning, was arrived at the climax of his troubles, the reader who can realize that the Reverend Paul was not only an honest young fellow, but also a man who thought modestly of his own abilities, will not be surprised that he sat in uncomfortable anxiety for the result.

For to fail here was to fail utterly. I am ashamed to refer again to Mr. Darwin (whose philosophy, by-the-way, I distinctly repudiate), but here was what that eminent naturalist very properly calls a "struggle for life."

It was only in these two days that the solemn question, What is the full force and meaning of this office I have taken upon myself? began to crowd upon him in all its wide and serious bearings.

And what, indeed, is it to be what we call indifferently preacher, pastor, missionary?

The Natural History of the Clergyman is still to be written. I do not intend to bore the sufficiently impatient reader by interpolating in this place any attempt at so important a work. But pending the advent of the great ecclesiastical Agassiz, who shall prevent me from setting down here my little preliminary "Essay on Classification?" See: there is,

1. The wishy-washy young man, who would starve in any other calling, and therefore literally "preaches for a living;"

2. The fluent young man, who preaches because that is the most impressive way of saying nothing;

3. The ambitious young man, who sees that the prefix Reverend gives, even in our Protestant America, a certain power and influence to its possessor;

4. The wide-awake young man, who knows that for him there is no such easy way to gain bread and butter and honor (and a rich wife), as the pulpit;

5. The studious young man, who turns clergyman that he may gain leisure for his favorite books and studies;

6. The young man who has a certain intellectual theory of Christianity, with which he thinks it desirable to quiet the world. This one, I sometimes think, lacks only a little true piety to be indeed the model clergyman of the age;

And, lastly—not to make this list too long—there is your man who, feeling not only his neighbor's but his own pride, and selfishness, and arrogance, and forgetfulness of God, and of all good words and works, feels also that above all mere dickerings for place, or power, or superfluous bread and butter, or any low ambition whatever, is the divine office of leading his fellows from these abysses, where devils lie in wait for their souls, to those green fields where Christ the Shepherd ever waits his sheep. To such men He said of old, and says to-day, "Go ye into all the world and proclaim the Gospel to every creature, beginning at Jerusalem." To such Christ is He who "came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." These are they, the true ministers of his Word, following and teaching Him with that divine love and charity which compels the rudest souls. Shall we complain if any such go forth comprehending their great work vaguely—looking out upon it as through a glass, darkly? Doubting—hesitating—in fear and trembling? Like Gideon, the son of Joash, asking vain signs of their Lord? I think few men set out on their life-work—if it be any thing higher than mere selfish toil—with any clear ideas of what they are to do. Your logical man is your thorough rascal. So let us not doubt of Paul Clifton, if his heart sank down into his boots as he sat in his pulpit on that Sunday morning, watching the entrance of his congregation; who now began to slide in in little awkward squads of six or seven, bashfully examining "the new minister" as they pushed up the aisles into their seats.

They need not strain their eyes to see him. Here was no dim religious light, such as some of our city churches affect, and which is so admirable an anodyne that I don't wonder wearied Wall Street cultivates it. The broad pleasant sunshine poured in boldly through that part of the open and curtainless windows, not obstructed by the opaque bodies of sundry Hoosier lads who preferred a seat in the window ledges—a luxury refused them on week days, when slab-sided Jehoram Baker, the Yankee pedagogue, here taught the young idea how to shoot.

And now as Miranda, her face composed, and her hand holding her brother's arm, marched that reluctant youth up the aisle, her dress caught one of the intellectual popguns which lay at random about the floor; whereat a small boy, coming behind with his mother, gave an anxious glance, then dove down desperately into the crowd, crying out in his shrill treble, "Dog on it, that's my speller!" Then brandished aloft the precious dog's-eared volume he had rescued, and was incontinently suppressed by his irate mother, who looked maternal thunders at the unlucky urchin who had dared to "holler out in meetin'!"

Paul smiled as his eyes took in the scene, whose grotesque humor relieved him for a moment from his load of anxiety. A man who has really a laugh in him never carries it nearer the surface than when he is thoroughly wretched. And now the service began.

If you think I am going to give you the sermon—or any part of it—you are mistaken. A mere sermon don't often convert any body—not even the preacher. Old John Wesley angured badly of the man who told him that he (Wesley) had converted him; and begged him to pray the Lord to do it over. Webster defines a sermon to be a pious and instructive discourse. Now, it can't be pious without being instructive; and, moreover, Dr. Webster's definition excludes a considerable class of sermons, which are neither pious nor instructive, but only logical, or theological, which is worse. For I believe, with one of our greatest preachers, that all theology comes of the devil; and when a man gets into his pulpit and begins to lay out the Christian doctrine to me by rule of thumb, or by any other rule but that golden one of which Christ said that he who keeps this fulfills all the law and the prophets—then I try very hard to run my thoughts off on some little side track of my own, where they may quietly take another train and go to a quite different place from the preacher's.

When Paul rose he read aloud those beautiful promises of Christ on the Mount. And as he read, his heart, so long dumb with fear before this strange people, grew strong and full with the dear love which speaks in every line of those blessed words. It is not so much words as speaker or needs as thoughts; and not so much thoughts as the one great inspiring thought which shall bind his audience to him, and make him and them from that time kindred and of one spirit. In this sign we conquer. And this sign? We call it sympathy. He called it love. In what manner should he speak? How should he manage, to please them? had been Paul's troubled thought. But now they were no longer they. No longer farmers, rude, uncouth, peculiar, different—but men and brethren, of the same thoughts, the same hopes, the same fears, the same heaven-born aspirations. Not strangers, but kindred, saved by the same blood, reaping the same promises, tempted in all things, even as was He who suffered all that we might follow him. "Be you all things to all men," said the Apostle; to whom this command was doubtless plainer than to some of his successors.

Do you think words fail the man whose heart is full to bursting? Words these were of Paul's, neither brilliant, nor fine, nor profound, nor trashy; but very simple indeed. And though this young man had satisfactorily displayed his talents before diverse cultivated city congregations, this was in truth the first sermon of his which went to his own heart. Do you know what Christ meant when he said to them: "Go ye and preach this gospel to all the nations, beginning at Jerusalem?"

Jehoram Baker, the callous Yankee pedagogue, who could stand more hard preaching than any man I ever knew, was cheated of his customary nap that morning. The people were very much surprised. They didn't quite understand it. That is to say—they did. When Paul came among them after service it was not as "the new minister," but as an old friend. He needed no introduction to men and women whose hearts he had touched so nearly. He was one of themselves. No fine city gentleman come to teach rough Hoosiers what they knew perhaps better than he. Nor any rude soldier of the Cross, so overwhelming them with the thunder of his Gospel artillery as to leave no hearing for the soft loving voice of the great Captain of our salvation, who wills not the death of sinners (and surely never wished to see them damned before they were dead). Nor, lastly, was he, to their conception, any theological mummy, stiff with the wrappings of old formulas, and with dry husks where live men keep their hearts.

Only a gentleman.

I hope nobody will ask me to say "Christian gentleman;" because then I shall think my corrector does not know what it is to be a gentleman.

And do you think a gentleman can not prevail with such plain folk as these without bluster, and casting away his own true nature? Does not the greater contain the less? And who told you that this old Hoosier farmer, in cowhide boots and homespun clothes, slow of speech and awkward in manner, is not the truest gentleman God ever made?

IV.

"Father says you must come home with us," said Miranda Leighton, pointing to where "Father" stood before the meeting-house door holding the mare, who was restive for her dinner. There were invitations a plenty to "come and stay with us;" but "Squire Leighton" carried the day, and bore off Paul, who found himself presently in a comfortable farm-house, where his host presented him in farmer fashion:

"This is the old lady; this is Miranda; and this is John, my boy. I wish he wasn't such a bad boy. Make yourself at home, and try to like us and our ways. They ain't very fine; but we mean what we say."

"In what way is John such a bad fellow?" Paul ventured to inquire, by way of setting himself at ease with that young man, who looked at the minister with a certain degree of suspicion, as one of his natural enemies.

Whereupon John's mother made sorrowful confession of his tricky propensities, of his dislike to church, of his fondness for other boys who were just like him; and Miranda completed the display of John's utter depravity by relating the incident of the cat.

At which the Reverend Paul laughed so heartily that even glum John ventured on a smile, and Miranda had her fun all over again.

When dinner was over, and while the old folks smoked their pipes, Paul persuaded John to show him over the farm. The consequence of which showing was that John returned to Miranda with a puzzled look, and the remark that "that thar minister warn't a bit like any other he ever saw."

"Why, Sis," said the poor fellow, "he laughs just like other people; and made me tell him about every thing on the place. And he likes fishing, and I'm going to show him the creek. And he didn't know what a harrow was till I told him," added John, with a chuckle, "and I'm to show him how to plow."

"So you think he'll do?" queried Miranda, quietly.

"I dunno yet," said John, resuming his cautious look; "I dunno yet—but I think."

Having won over John, Paul's fame soon went through all the country-side; and as he proved himself a tolerable shot, a good fisherman, and a sensible fellow generally, "the boys," who had been so long the plague of Shottover meeting-house, presently made him their honored captain, without whose presence or countenance no fun could prosper, while they delighted to be for him a guard, often more zealous than wise.

But what avails to recount at length the peaceful triumphs of the Reverend Paul Clifton? His first victory decided the campaign; and he surprised the brethren at the next annual Conference meeting by requesting (unless some one else wished the place) to be "continued" in Shottover another year.

"What Paul Clifton could have found in Shottover?" was a question which puzzled every body but Paul Clifton himself, till one day——Fair, and gentle, and dearly-beloved reader, you guessed it long ago, didn't you? And I am not such an ungrateful boor as to disappoint you—

—till one day the bishop was invited to dedicate a new meeting-house in Shottover; and this done, was requested to “unite in the holy bonds of matrimony” (which bonds they bear lightly to this day)

THE REVEREND PAUL CLIFTON

AND

MISS MIRANDA LEIGHTON.

John was present, in a great state of mind and shirt-collar, and after the ceremony was over, and the company had adjourned, privately bestowed his blessing on Miranda, declaring that “she’d got the best feller that ever lived for a husband—ef he was a preacher.”

Picking of de wile flowers dare.
Jiggeree bu! Jiggeree bu!
Jiggeree bu-bu! bu-bu! bu!

THIS lively but not particularly sentimental song, which rang out merrily on the clear, warm summer morning air, proceeded from the lips of a tall, gaunt, white-headed old negro man, who, seated in the full blaze of the sun, upon a bench just outside of one of the kitchen windows, was busily polishing his master's boots, and lightening his labors by his own heartfelt but untutored minstrelsy. He was evidently singing con amore; for though, through the main verses of his song, he contented himself with keeping time by rolling his eyes and convulsively jerking his body and arms in accordance with the measure, yet when he reached the refrain—the “jiggeree bu” portion of his song—the spirit of melody fairly conquered, captured, and ran away with him, and, raising his brawny arms above his head, the left enveloped in a boot, the right hand encumbered with a blacking brush, he beat time audibly upon the sole of the boot, and at the same time, without rising, performed a sort of sedentary dance with his lower limbs, heel and toe marking out the measure in a sort of double-shuffle, more accurate to the ear than graceful to the eye.

Pompey Megus, or Old Pomp, as he was more commonly called, was a Southern negro by birth, and had been, until mature age, the slave of a Southern master, who, dying childless, left his goods and chattels to be divided among his nearest of kin; and thus it chanced that, in the division, Pomp came, with other valuable property, into the possession of his present master, Judge Osborn, who, having a Northern prejudice equally against slave-holding and slave-selling, was at a loss for some time what to do with his undesirable inheritance, but at last cut the Gordian knot and solved the problem, to the mutual satisfaction of himself and Pomp, by manumitting him and bringing him to the North.

Pomp had proved himself a worthy and grateful recipient of this favor. He had continued a faithful and attached servant; and by careful accumulation of his wages, and the kind co-operation of his friendly employer, he had been able gradually to effect the purchase of his old wife, and then of his children and grandchildren, his last purchase, made about ten years before our story commences, being his youngest daughter with her two children—a fine bright boy of eight or ten years, and an infant girl. This last acquisition made up the sum total of old Pomp's family and of his own content. While they occupied a cottage about half a mile from the Judge's residence, and were all in his service in some way or other, old Pomp continued to reside at “Masser's,” enjoying a hearty, happy old age, tranquil and satisfied as the patriarchs of old when they sat in their tent-door in the cool of the evening.

But Pomp's jubilant minstrelsy had had an unsuspected listener. Suddenly the window above and a little one side of him was opened, and a young and pretty face (pretty in spite of a sort of puritanical demureness) peeped out upon him. This was no other than Rhoda Tibbets, the nursery-maid and personal attendant of the Judge's youngest child; but as Rhoda was something of a character in her small way, we must be pardoned for a slight delay while we strive to indicate some of her little peculiarities.

Rhoda was young, pretty, well-meaning, and good-tempered; but she was early left an orphan, and had fallen into the hands of persons who had given a strange twist to a character naturally upright and lovely. We know not under what religious denomination the individuals who trained the girl would have classed themselves; but they were practically of those “Who hope to merit heaven by making earth a hell!” And under their strange guidance, the girl's mind had developed, like some free-growing plant shut out from heaven's air and sunshine in a damp, dark cellar; shrunk and distorted; gnarled, twisted, ghastly, and unnatural; a morbid tendency for the horrible ran through all her being; sin, death, and condemnation seemed to be her favorite topics of thought and conversation.

There are, as we all know, certain states or conditions of the physical system when an unnatural appetite is awakened, when a strange craving for slate-pencil scrapings, chalk, cobwebs, and the like is manifested; and there are certain morbid conditions of the mental powers, which seem to be analogous to this physical derangement, when the mind, rejecting its natural and customary aliment, preys gloomily upon the supernatural and horrible. There have been men (ay, and women too) of birth, wealth, and refinement, gifted, too, with artistic taste and genial feelings, yet who have sought in the anatomical lecture-room, amidst all the (to them) unnecessary horrors of surgical operations, for the excitement which the theatre, opera-house, and academy of art or music could no longer furnish. Something of this nature had been induced in Rhoda by her early education. Fear, not love, had been the motive power held up to her. She had been driven, not led, into the way of salvation, and her religion, as if drawn from the Old Testament not the New, seemed ever to hang as a heavy pall above her, and shut out from her sight the visible world of youth and joy and sunshine. The thunders of Horeb, the fierce-flashing fires of Sinai, came ever between her and the Mount of Olives. The gentle voice which uttered the Beatitudes she never seemed to hear; the stern denunciatory, "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees!" was far oftener on her lips. It was more to her taste; it suited her better.

It seemed a strange thing, this warring of education and nature; for all the girl's natural impulses were kindly. But she, who would grieve honestly over the mouse caught in a trap; who cried far more than the baby did when he cut his teeth; she, whose warm, human sympathies went forth freely to every living thing which came within the sphere of her actual observation, from the strolling beggar at the gate, to whom she gave the money from her purse, the shoes from her feet, and, it must be added, the fiercest condemnatory texts from her Bible, down to the orphan kitten that she fed with a tea-spoon, and foster-mothered up to an independent rat-catching cathood—could talk calmly of "the worm that never dies," and of "the fire that is never quenched;" and really seemed to regard the consignment of a large proportion of her fellow-beings to endless torment as a rather pleasing episode in the economy of the world, or, at any rate, as a grand and by no means unsatisfactory finale to its history.

Well is it for us poor weak mortals, so quick to mark and judge each other's offenses, that "He who is merciful in might"—He, whose love and wisdom are alike infinite, has said, "The curse causeless shall not come;" for poor little Rhoda, in her blind and ignorant zeal, would have "Dealt damnation round the land," as Pope expresses it, as freely, and with as much unconcern as ever she handed round tea.

It may be questioned why Mrs. Osborn suffered such a person to be in her nursery; but she was a faithful and capable domestic, and fondly attached to the child, who was yet too young to be influenced in any way by her strangely gloomy theology. To be sure she would sometimes hush him to sleep with a pleasant little ditty, commencing,

"When I am dead and turned to clay,
And all my bones are rotten;"

or, another, which (whether owing to the necessities of the metre, the peculiarities of the tune, or simply to her own choice, we undertake not to say) she always divided and emphasized thus:

"I'm bound for—the kingdom will you—go to glory with me?
Hal-le-lu-jar!—oh!—hal-le-lu-jar!
I'm bound for—the kingdom will you—go to glory with me?
Hal-le-lu-jar!—oh!—praise ye the Lord!"

This sung in a sharp high key, and accompanied with a sort of spasmodic rocking, in a chair naturally destitute of rockers, she evidently considered as a very panacea for untimely wakefulness. But the baby's own especial favorite was a sprightly little thing, beginning,

"Remember, sinful youth! you must die! you must die!
Remember, sinful youth! you must die!
Remember, sinful youth! if you quit the ways of truth,
You must die!—you must die!—you must die!"

So decided indeed was the preference of the little auditor for this particular tune, that if at any time Rhoda attempted to coax him off to sleep with,

"Where now—is weeping Mary?"

or,

"I wonder why old saints don't sing,

the little Sebastian would lift the soft fringes of his sweet, sleepy blue eyes, shake his little curly head, and say, earnestly, "No, no! die, die;" the two last words being given with a coaxing persuasiveness of tone, as irresistible in effect as it is incapable of being rendered in print.

Whether it was that, knowing he was not himself an "old saint," and being yet too unfledged to aim at any striking performances "on the wing," he considered the call to sinful youth more applicable to his present condition; or whether the chosen hymn, being set to a rather peculiar air, allowed a greater amount of tributary trotting and patting, must be left to the decision of persons more conversant with babyology (perhaps the learned umpires who presided over Barnum's baby-show might be induced to undertake it). But whenever Rhoda struck back into the required song, he would close his eyes with a satisfied smile, drop his head on her shoulder, and with one little dimpled white hand on the back of hers, he would beat time with her, gradually subsiding into quiet lassitude until "Death's twin-brother, Sleep," stole from him all remembrance of his sinful youth.

This was the young person, who, having flung open the blinds, suddenly announced herself to Pomp as his auditress. She was fair, plump, and decidedly pretty, though with a certain prim demureness which was evidently the result of cultivation and training, and not indigenous (a sort of masked coquetry), which seemed to say, "It is not my fault if I am pretty: I can't help it; I know it is all dust and ashes, sin and folly, but I can't help it: I am just as my Creator made me." Yet would not have parted with a curl or a dimple if she could.

She wore a simple but becoming blue morning dress, the loose sleeves pushed up displaying her fair round arms; and with her soft, wavy, brown hair rolled plainly back from her young face, she looked cool and fresh as the early morning. She had some muslins in her hands which she was clear starching; and resting her elbows on the window-sill, she continued to clap with faithful assiduity, while she leaned out to hold a little friendly gossip with old Pomp.

"My goodness gracious!" she said, speaking in short crisp tones, "Well, I never!—why, Uncle Pomp! is that you a singing so, and a making all that noise and ran-dan?—why, I declare, I never did!"

"Yes, Rhoda! massy-soul-sakes-alive," said the dusky singer, looking up at the window with a good-natured but coarse negro-laugh.

"Yes, dat are's me, I 'spect; and I 'clare I b'leve I was a singing too, but I didn't know it; can't help it nohows, I's so happy, seems as if it jest run out its own self—I's blest to Heaben if it don't. Hope I hain't been and 'sturbed nobody; 'clare I did not think nobody was a listening an' a hearing of me; but I can't help it nohows—it's so real warm an' bu'full out he'ar, and de sun so hot; and ki! how dem are birds is a singing. Guess dey can't help it nuther—ho! ho! ho!"

"Why, Pomp!" said Rhoda, affectedly, "seems to me you're terrible happy always."

"Happy!" repeated Pomp, "massy-soul-sake! yes; bress yer! I guess I is; and why shouldn't I be? Happy? yes, I's jest as happy as de days is long; and dey is pretty considerable longish now; jest as happy as de days is long! and if dey was any longer I s'pose I'd be dat much more happier, coz yer see"—and here he looked up at the window with a face of maudlin wisdom that would have done honor to some half tipsy demagogue—"coz yer see, if de days was longer, I s'pect dey'd be hotter, and I loves de hot. I dunno, Rhoda," he continued, brushing at his boot with imperturbable gravity as if propounding some weighty matter, "I dunno as yer iver made de obseruation, but I's allers minded dis fac', de longerest days dey allers comes in de hot wedder, in de summer time!"

"S'pose so," was Rhoda's laconic answer, seeing that he paused for a reply, holding his head sideways, and glancing up at her with his great white rolling eyes.

"Yes," he continued, "the most longerest days dey allers comes in de summer; in de real hot wedder; don't dey, now? Yo've took notice of dat, hay?"

"Shouldn't wonder," said Rhoda.

"Dey does now, dat's a fac'; and now, Rhoda," continued the sable oracle, "why does dey kim in de summer? Does you know de reason ob why dey does it?"

"Well, I declare!" said Rhoda, hesitatingly, "I s'pose there is a reason, but I don't rightly know as I do know."

"Wa'al," said Pomp, "look a he'ar; I'll tell yer; yer sec, in de warm wedder, when 'tis hot, de days dey enjoys demselves; and dey isn't a going to hurry demselves, not for nobody; dey jest stretches demselves out, and dey lolls dis-away, and dey lolls dat-a-way." (And here Pomp, whose elocution was always very demonstrative in action, rose and stretched himself out in an "Alexandrine measure," rolling himself with a long, lazy motion from side to side.) "Laws-a-massy! dey is uncommon comfortable, dem days is: and so dey jest takes it easy like, and spends demselves a longways, and makes a day ob it; and I 'clare I don't blame um, not a mite! But in de winter time, laws-soul-sakes-alive! it's awful cold an' shivery; an' you see, de days dey don't like it, dey can't stand it nohow; dey is all shrunk up, and mis'sible; and dey jest cut t'rough jess as tight, as tight as ever dey can, and glad enuf to hev night kim, and adone wid it; don't yer see? And I don't blame dem nuther, not a mite; an' dat's de way," said Pomp, decidedly and triumphantly, "dat de days kim to hev dat are fashion; I knows all 'bout it, I's watched um."

Here there was a few moments' pause, while Pomp brushed his boot vigorously, and Rhoda picked out the embroidered edge of the frill she was clear starching in silence; then the latter spoke again:

"Well, I do declare, Pomp! I don't see what there is to make you so dreadful happy!"

"Yer don't?" asked Pomp, looking up in surprise. "Why, yer on'y look a he'ar now! He'ar I is, a setting out he'ar, jest as warm as wool; wid dat yare bright sun a shining hot right on me; and look at dis yer laylock-bush alongside ob me, and dat are seringee-bush tudder side of me, don't yer see all dem white posies, jest as sweet as sugar, and de green leaves a smelling fresh as a cucumber! And ain't I a setting he'ar a free man? and hain't I got my free, and my wife's free, and de free ob all my chillun, an' my gran'chillun; all made out proper, and safe in masser's hands? Why, I couldn't help being happy, nohow, if I would! And you why, Rhoda, ain't yer happy?"

"No," said Rhoda, with a deprecatory shake of her head, "I ain't so mighty happy."

"Yer ain't!" said Pomp, gazing earnestly at the girl, with a look of combined curiosity and friendly solicitude. "Well, now, dat are seems curus. Why, yer young, and white, and healthy. Laws-a-massy! I'd tink yer'd be fit to fly yer'd be so happy."

"Well, I ain't," said the girl, gloomily.

"And why ain't yer? what's de matter ob yer? what's yer trouble, Rhoda?"

"Oh! well I dunno; I hain't got no great trouble, nothing to speak of, on'y— Well, this is a hard world, we all has our troubles, I s'pose; this 'is a vale of tears;' I have my little worries like other folks, and they fret me some."

"Yer mustn't let um," said Pomp, soothingly. "Now dat's jes' like yer Aunt Clo'."

Cloe was Pomp's wife, and highly beloved and esteemed by him, but she always served him for an illustration; he always took the liberty of holding her up as an example, either for good or evil, for warning or encouragement, as the case might require. He seemed to feel she was, as the hymn book says, "Fit for reproof and counsel too;" and whether as guide-board or beacon, he was content to hold her up to public notice.

"Dat are's jest like yer Aunt Clo'," he said, "a talking dat a ways; Aunt Clo' she's allers a worretting, and a worretting, 'bout suthing or udder; good woman too, in de gen'ral, as eber was in dis world; on'y she will be allers a wor-retting. Coz it's wet, coz it's dry; coz it's cold, cos it's hot; an' what's de use? 'tain't no use at all. 'I tell yer now, Aunt Clo'!' I sez, 'what ever's the use of yer worretting so? yer can't hev tings yer own way, nohow yer can fix it. Yer can't be President, nor Gov'ner, nor even school committee man, an' 'tain't no use. If tings don't go to please yer, jest let um slide, mebbe nex' time 'ill be better luck!' I sez to yer Aunt Clo' sometime, I sez, sez I to her, 'Aunt Clo', sez I, 'yer a real honest critter, I knows yer be, and yer don't want to wrong nobody; but yer'll die in debt,' sez I, 'jest as sure as yer alive, for yer borries so much trouble yer niver can pay it all back as long as yer live, not if yer live to be as old as Hallilulah!'"

"Methuselah," suggested Rhoda, mildly.

"Wa'al, Miss Thuselar then, or any oder old lady or gentleman, I don't care who; 'tain't no use, I sez to her; but there, massy-soul-sakes! it's her nater, and she can't help it; but yer, bress yer, Rhoda! if yer begin now, young gal as yer be, where will yer bring up when yer as old as yer Aunt Clo'? Don't yer go to get dat are fashion ob worretting, I tell yer it'll spile yer! Now jes' look a he'ar—here yer is, young an' strong, an' mighty good-looking! Yer white, an' free, an' got a good home in de best place in de world! an' yer masser an' misses is de berry bestest folks in de world, ain't dey now?"

"Well, I don't know about that," said Rhoda, pertly, for the Southern terms "master and mistress" had jarred upon her Northern ear, and produced discord.

"Why, Rhoda," said Pomp, opening his eyes in wide astonishment, "ain't yer misses kind to yer?"

"Well, yes, I s'pose so; sort of."

"I guess yer tort so tudder day," said Pomp, "when she giv yer dat are han'som black silk mantle-piece for yer shoulders; didn't I hear yer a tellin our Elsie it cost fifteen dollars when it was new, an' dat it was jest as good as new now?"

"Well, yes," said Rhoda, blushing and conscious of her own ingratitude, "so she did; she is very generous to me, I'm sure; and I didn't mean she warn't kind to me; on'y you said they was good, and the ain't no body good; no, 'not one.'"

"Not one?" repeated the old man. "How is it den 'bout dat young Methodes minister comes to see yer Wednesday nights?"

"He ain't a Methodist minister," said Rhoda, with a blush and pert toss of her head; "and I wish you wouldn't call him so."

"Wa'al, I won't, den," said Pomp. "But ain't he, really? I 'clare I tort he was; he looks jes' so. But, Rhoda, ain't he good?"

"No!" said Rhoda, with an air of solemn resignation. "No, indeed! He would tell you we was all far enough from good. He says we are all lost sinners—guilty sinners—'vessels of wrath—broken cisterns which can hold no water!'"

"Wa'al, I dunno 'bout dat," said Pomp, gravely. "Mebbe he is; but he kin hold a sight ob ginger-beer—I know dat! Yer see, he kim he'ar one day, when yer was out awalking wid de baby, an' so, as yer warn't at hum, de Judge (I s'pose he wanted to show him some 'spect on account ob you), an' he told me to take de yong man into de buttery an' lunch um; and if he didn't— Oh my! Wa'al, yer see, ginger-bread, an' cheese, and ginger-beer, dey is putty perwissions—werry putty! Can yer make dat are ginger-bread, Rhoda? Coz, if yer can't, yer'd better larn how, right off a reel; for dat yong man he is most uncommon fond on't. He is now, I tell yer."

"Well, s'pose he is," said Rhoda, flippantly; "that ain't nothing. He can't expect to have every thing he likes in this world."

"No," said Pomp, gravely, "he didn't ought; an' mebbe 'twouldn't be good for him if he did. But I dunno noffing 't all 'bout his 'spetations—on'y I'm real sorry to hear he ain't good."

"Law! yes, he is," said Rhoda, quickly.

"Good! how you talk! He's good enough. I guess you never heard nothing against him, nor you won't nuther."

Here another silence ensued, and Rhoda clapped her muslins and picked out the borders in thoughtful silence; then recurring again to her former theme, as if still unsatisfied, she said, suddenly,

"I don't see, Pomp, how in creation you can be always so terribly happy in a perishing, sinful, dying world."

"De world ain't adying," said Pomp, stoutly. "I's knowed her dis eighty year, an' I niver see her look better, han'somer, nor more healthier. She ain't agoing to die, I know!"

"Well," said Rhoda, laughing in spite of herself, "I did not mean that the world was adying—though she will one day be all burned up, and perish like a scrowl; but the folks is adying—you, and I, and every body. I s'pose you know you've got to die, Pomp?"

"Don't I?" said Pomp. "Got to! I'd be mighty ashamed of myself if I hadn't. Why, hain't all de best folks in de world—all de good folks and de great folks—died ever sence de world wor made? An' wouldn't I feel small enuf if I war lef' out? Die! why, I tink it's splendid! Why, I 'clare to yer, dis yere minnit, if one ob dem angels wid de shiny wings, sich as de song-book tells on, was to flounce out ob dat little white cloud, an' come flop down onter dis grabble walk, an' say to me, 'Good-morning, Misser Pomp Megus, Sir! How do you do, Sir?—hope I see yer well—how's yer health? I hev come to tell yer yer ain't agoing to die, niver; it ain't expected ob yer; yer may live he'ar forty-leven thousan' hundred years, an' more, too (if dare be any more ob um), and yer kindly welcome to dat same,' I wouldn't take it as no compliment at all—I jes' wouldn't. I'd jes' up and say, 'Yer sarvant, Miss Angel! How does yer do, marm? I hope I see yer well—how's yer health?' (Here Pomp, who prided himself upon his manners, rose and made a grave and reverential salam to the imaginary angel.) 'I'm werry much obligated to yer for de trubble yer've took; but I ain't so awful per-tic'lar 'bout living. I ain't in no hurry to die; I don't want to go edactly now. I'd like to stay till de yong chickens an' ducks is, riz, and de husking is ober, and mebbe till arter Thanks-givin' (dat is, if so be it's agreeable all round), coz I'd like to see if our turkey ain't agoing to beat Colonel Frazier's man's. But any ting in reason, an' I'm ready. When de Master say, "March!" I'll go; an' dis receipt shall be yer discharge.'

This last sentence, picked up in the Judge's office, Pomp was fond of using, as giving force and dignity to his remarks.

"No, Rhoda Tibbits," continued the old man, unceremoniously dropping the celestial companion, and turning to the terrestrial; "no, Rhoda, my old mudder, all my broders an' sisters, three ob my chillun, an' two ob Elsie's, is all gone ober de riber—dey is all awalkin in white on de odder side—an' do yer tink I wants to stay poking round in dis yere ole niger-skin for ebber? No, no, Rhoda, I's on'y a niger, an' I don't know as much as some nigers does, but I ain't sich a fool as dat are comes to, nudder. Laws-a-massy-soul-sakes, no!"

Here a bell within the house rang, and Rhoda started.

"That's the nursery bell," she said. "I s'pose the baby's woke up, and I must go." And drawing in her head, she closed the blinds, and was gone.

While the above colloquy had been carried on two persons, a young man and a little girl, walking hand in hand, had been slowly approaching the house, observant of the speakers, though unseen by them; these were Ralph and Lottie, the only remaining children of Pomp's daughter, Elsie.

These two young persons, born in Southern slavery, and strikingly alike in person, betrayed in form and features the mixed lineaments of the two races from which they sprung. The young man was tall and slight, and with well-developed limbs; but he walked with a loose, swinging, lounging gait, as if loosely hung together, and conveyed to the mind an impression that, if taken up by the neck and suddenly shaken, his arms and legs would be apt to drop off, like those of some ill-conditioned jointed doll. His skin was of a dark, tawny brown, not coal-black like his grandfather's, but two or three generations lighter, and his features, if not quite European in their character, were yet far removed from the original African stamp; his eyes, full and intelligent, had the Southern expression of mingled fire and softness; and his hair, though thick and curling, was loose enough to be handsome. Altogether, though no one would for a moment have supposed him to be a white man, most persons would have looked twice, and hesitated, before pronouncing him a black.

Walking slowly, with his eyes bent upon the ground, and a look of habitual grave sadness on his face, the young man, holding the hand of his little sister, who was like him in all but the pensive expression (which on her face was exchanged for that look of mingled mirth and precocious brightness so often to be observed in the young persons of her race, but which usually deadens out to dullness as they advance to maturity), drew near the house, and their shadows fell across the path before the old man a moment after Rhoda had withdrawn herself.

"Good-morning, Grandsir!" said the youth, kindly, and rousing himself to speak with an evident effort; "and how is the rheumatism this morning?"

"Hil-lo! massy-soul-sakes! he'ar yer is, ain't yer? Who'd a tort it?" said the old man, briskly. "Why, Ralphie boy, how be yer? An' how's all on um to home? An' I 'clare he'ar's my little Lottie, too! Why, my little daffy-down-dilly! my putty little pinky posie! yer come to see yer ole gran'daddy, didn't yer? Bless its soul! an' how are yer, my baby? And how's yer marm?"

"Mother's quite well, thank you. I guess Lottie has got a message for you from her—haven't you, dear?" said Ralph, looking kindly down at the little girl, who clung shyly to his hand. "Where is Master Harry, Grandsir?" he added; "I want to see him about his dog."

"Dunno, I 'clare!" said Pomp; "hain't seed him some time; guess he's in his own room, but I dunno!"

"Oh, well, I can find him, I dare say," said Ralph, who, being about the age of Harry Osborn, was his frequent companion, and had been, from their childhood, nearly as conversant of his whereabouts as if he had been his brother. "I'll leave Lottie here with you, Grandsir, and call for her when I go home;" and crossing the yard, he went in search of "Master Harry," as he always called him.

"Kim-a-he'ar, Lottie," said the old man, encouragingly. "An' what has my little gal got to say to her ole gran'sir, I wonder?—kim-a-he'ar—yer beauty bright, stars-be-night!—an' tell um, can't yer? What's dis yer marm's sint, hey?" he added, looking inquiringly at a small basket the little girl carried upon her arm.

Bashfully drawing near, the child silently raised the cover, and displayed half a dozen fresh-laid eggs.

"Eggs, I 'clare! Ain't dem beauties? An' don't yer marm know what de ole man loves? Now jes' look at dem eggs—ain't dem beauties?—mos' as han'sum as de gal wot bringed um, an' she's a reg'lar stunner! Oh! I hears on yer, Lottie dear, I hears on yer! dey tells me what a scholar yer be!—dey say, when my daffy-down-dilly gets up in de school to read she make all de white gals hang down'er head—hi, hi, hi!—dat's what dey tells me—ho, ho, ho!"

"An' now," continued the old man, returning to his seat, after unpacking and depositing the little girl's simple but acceptable present, "I wonder if my little beauty ain't a-goin' to dance for de old man—say?"

Lottie drew back bashfully, and shook her head.

"Oh! lars, yis yer be, now; I knows yer be. I hain't seed yer dance for a month o' Sundays. Kim, now, my pinkie posie; don't yer be a mite bashful; kim, dance now, right away."

Another silent shake of the head was Lottie's only answer.

"Oh! lars; massy-soul-sakes-alive! yer wants to be coaxed. What shall I gib yer? Lem me see—one ob dem days I's goin' up to de blue hills; an' dare's lots ob rabbits dare, I 'spec'; an' if I kin fine un, a rael beauty, wid a long white tail an' blue eyes, I'll cotch um for yer, Lottie dear, if yer'll dance for me. Dare, now."

But again Lottie shook her head, although her laughing eyes were dancing and sparkling with roguish mirth; for "the schoolmaster is abroad" throughout the length and breadth of our land, and even little Lottie's limited knowledge of Natural History was enough to make the promise of a long-tailed, blue-eyed rabbit appear too chimerical to be a temptation.

"Won't!" said the old man, sadly; "o-u-g-h! dat's too bad, now. I hain't got on'y one little gal in all de worl', and she won't dance for her poor ole daddy. Oh, dearie me! dearie me! What 'll I do? Oh, lars! lars! lars!"

A change passed over the intelligent face of the child. She had heard, again and again, from her mother and grandmother, the story of her and their redemption from slavery by the loving labor of her grandfather, and her tender heart smote her with a sense of her black ingratitude.

"I will, daddy," she said, suddenly—"I will, if you want me to;" and flinging down her basket and hat, she drew a pair of rude castanets from her bosom and began to dance, accompanying herself by the music of the castanets and her own voice.

Music and dancing seem to be natural and almost universal gifts to the colored race; and though Lottie's first movements were constrained and listless, the motion, her own music, and her grandfather's rapturous applause soon roused her excitable temperament. Her little figure was lithe and graceful; and with her simple, scanty dress, her round, dusky arms tossed above her head, her loose curls, gleaming white teeth, and laughing eyes, her rapid movements had much of the untutored grace of the nautch girls of India.

Suddenly, while Lottie's dance and the old man's delight both were at the highest, she stopped, with the look of a startled fawn; her arms dropped, as if paralyzed, and her whole figure seemed to collapse, as, shrinking away, she leaned against the bole of a tree and hid her face.

"Why, Lottie, gal, what's kim to yer?" said Pomp; and turning round, he saw Ralph standing by with folded arms, and an unmistakable look of grave displeasure on his gloomy brow.

It was this sudden apparition which had checked the child's merry dance; not a word had been uttered; but her quick eye had caught the look, and her quick apprehension defined his dissatisfaction.

"Sho, sho, sho! Ralph; yer go long," said the old man, vexed on his own account, and still more at the evident discomfiture of his little favorite. "What yer kim he'ar for, a spiling ebry ting? Yer go way; let dis chile dance, can't yer?"

"Lottie is too old now to be made a monkey and a show of, Grandsir," said the young man, coldly. "Take your hat and basket, Lottie; it is time to go home:" and turning, he walked out of the yard, followed by the dejected child; silently, side by side, but not now hand in hand, as before, they walked on. Bitter thoughts were in Ralph's heart, and gloom upon his brow, till Lottie's loving heart could bear it no longer. Bursting into a passion of tears, she caught her brother's hand, and sobbed out,

"Oh! Ralph, did I do wrong? I did not want to dance, indeed I did not; but Grandsir made me. I said 'No' ever and ever so many times, till he coaxed me so I was ashamed. I couldn't help it, indeed I couldn't. Was it very wrong, Ralph? Oh, I am so sorry!"

"No, no, Lottie," said Ralph, relenting at sight of the child's quick tears; "it was not wrong in you. I did not mean to blame you—only—" Ralph hesitated (he could not tell the innocent child what neither she nor her grandfather had been aware of—that several of the farm-laborers had come in to luncheon, and, unseen themselves, were watching and commenting upon the unconscious girl's performance)—"only, you know, you are getting to be a great girl now, Lottie, and I would not have you dance any where but at home. Dance and sing too, there, as much as you like, darling, for mother and I, and grandfather too, when he comes to the cottage; but nowhere else."

"And you are not very angry and displeased with me, Ralph?" said Lottie, with her bright eyes gleaming through tears.

"Not angry at all," said Ralph, kindly, as he opened the cottage gate for her. "And now run in, and tell mother what Grandsir said about the eggs."

Ralph waited until his sister had entered the house, and then closing the gate he turned away, and entering the wood-path, he followed it until he reached a small root-house, which he and Harry Osborn had built in their days of boyhood. Here, flinging himself down in melancholy musing, the thick-coming sighs grew to sobs, and at last, burying his face on his folded arms, he broke into passionate weeping.

A light hand touched his shoulder, and a kind voice was in his ear:

"Ralph! Ralph! my poor fellow; what is it? Ralph, my dear Ralph! stand up, and tell me what is the matter? do speak."

It was a moment before poor Ralph could restrain his sobs, and answer, "Nothing new, Master Harry, nothing new; only the old, old trouble; that's all."

"Why, Ralph," said Harry, kindly, "I thought you were wiser now; I thought you had outgrown all this."

"I can not, Master Harry! it is outgrowing me."

"How is this, Ralph? has any thing happened?"

"No, no, nothing to speak of; nothing at all, in fact, only every day and hour show me more and more fully my miserable and degraded position."

"Degraded? Ralph, you do yourself injustice; no one else would say of you the unkind things you say of yourself: you have had advantages, and you have made a good use of them; you have a good thorough education, and—"

"And what am I?" said Ralph, bitterly, "but a 'd—d nigger,' after all?"

"Ralph," said Harry, in tones of kind reproof, "you are wrong to talk so: my father says you are competent to navigate a ship to any part of the globe."

"He does me justice, as he always has," said the poor fellow; "but what if I am, who would trust me with ship and cargo? and even if a merchant would do it, what crew would sail under a negro captain? what nation trade with him?"

There was a short pause, for Harry could not deny the truth of what Ralph had asserted: then he spoke again, encouragingly.

"Well, Ralph, commerce is not all and every thing; your education has fitted you for other things."

"Name them," said Ralph; "name a situation for which I am fitted. No, Master Harry, do not think I am ungrateful for all you and your father have done for me—I realize it all; but do you not see that my education, while it has removed me at a distance from my own race, has brought me no nearer to yours? This accursed birthmark—this brand of Cain shuts me out from every thing, closes to me every door of hope."

"Oh, nonsense, nonsense, Ralph!" cried Harry, with friendly and impulsive warmth; "you think too much of it: what is the hue of the skin, if the heart and conscience and life are fair and spotless?"

"Master Harry," said Ralph, "will you answer me one question, truly and honestly?"

"Why, Ralph!" said Harry, "you are not over-civil, I think; of course, if I answer at all, I shall speak the truth."

"Master Harry, would you change skins with me, to be President of the United States?"

"What an absurd question, Ralph! No, I am no politician; I have no desire to be President of the United States."

"For all the wealth of the Indies, then?" said Ralph.

"I am not so grasping as to wish for them either," said Harry, turning away; but Ralph would not be so put off.

"For any thing, then?" he said, turning so as to look Harry full in the face; "for the best of all this world can offer, would you?"

"Ralph, this is child's play!" said Harry, evasively; "we can not change: it is folly to talk thus."

"Enough! I am answered," said the poor fellow, bitterly. "God bless you, Master Harry! you would spare me if you could; but I tell you now, if being boiled, till this hated skin came off, would leave me white, and it were just possible I could live through it, I would risk the trial! Master Harry, do not think me rash and sinful, for my heart is full. Just think what my condition is. Bring it home to yourself, if you can, even in thought; shut out from all which is useful, or noble, or lovely in life, as far above my own race as I am below yours, I belong to neither; love, home, and family ties are denied me—I must live and die unloved and lonely."

Poor Ralph, there was one sore spot in his heart which he had never yet revealed, even to his mother or his friend, his hopeless and unspoken love for Rhoda; who, little coquette as she was, never dreamed of his devotion, and though she always treated him and his family with kindness, would naturally have received a declaration of his attachment as an insult. He had seen her in the morning close the window and withdraw as he approached the house, and his sensitive jealousy had marked it as an intentional avoidance of him; and this, though he did not name it, was still rankling in his heart.

But of all this Harry Osborn suspected nothing; and in answer to Ralph's last remark, he only said, "I don't see that: you have your mother, Ralph, and your grandmother."

"Yes," said Ralph, with a bitter repetition of the words, "I have my mother and my grandmother, what more can a man want?"

"And your sister," pursued Harry, unconsciously; "your little Lottie."

"Yes, my sister, my poor little Lottie," said Ralph, his lip quivering as he spoke; "oh, Master Harry! that is the worst of all, my poor, poor, little Lottie; I can bear it far better for myself than for her. What is her life to be? she is happy now, poor child, for the knowledge of her misfortune has not yet broken upon her; but it will, Master Harry, it will! She is intelligent beyond her years; already she asks me questions I dare not answer. I try to keep her back; I shut up my books from her; I try to keep her in ignorance; try to prolong her days of unconscious happiness. But it can not last; I can not blind her much longer; her eyes will be opened, and then, think of it, Master Harry! She is pure, and truthful, and innocent as an angel, and has a warm, quick, loving heart; and she will find herself a despised and hated thing, that must walk through life alone, shut out from human love and sympathy; she can never love, or, loving, she will have her heart broken, and flung back to her in scorn. Poor, poor, little Lottie! And I must see all this, and can not shelter her. I am her only brother, and she has no father, and I—what can I do for her? Oh, Master Harry! dear as she is to me, I often wish she might die now; now, in her happy ignorance, and escape the life of trial, shame, and suffering which so surely awaits her here."

"Ralph!" said Harry, mildly, "I think you take an exaggerated view of the case. All this which you anticipate, may, indeed, befall little Lottie; no one can assure you that it may not. But is she the only one upon whom such a lot may come? If Lottie were peculiar in this—if she was the only woman living to whom such a fate might be meted out—if it were a single case, or wholly attributable to her race and color, it might justify your remarks. But is it so? look round the world; how many women, lovely, pure, and good, ay, fair and beautiful too, share such a fate? How many of the best and most warm-hearted of her sex either never find an object for their affections, or worse, lose the beloved one, or, worse still, love unloved again; or, worst of all, love one unworthy of them? It is no strange or uncommon lot: who can tell it may not be the fate of my own little sisters (as well as yours), with all their apparent advantages? nor, if it should, have we any right to say their lot would be less happy or less useful. You said just now, you were Lottie's only protector—her only brother, and that she had no father; you were wrong—think again. Lottie has an 'Elder Brother' than you, and an Almighty Father! Trust her to them, Ralph; do not burden yourself with responsibilities you are unequal to sustain. And it strikes me, Ralph," said the young man, placing his hand kindly on Ralph's shoulder, and speaking with gentle gravity, as he saw his companion's face softening—"it strikes me, Ralph, that we have both been regarding this subject from a wrong point of view. We have viewed it as men, not as Christians—as if this life were all. But viewed in the light of Christian faith, and how does it appear? Who was it that was 'despised and rejected of men, the Man of Sorrows, acquainted with grief?' And didn't He 'endure the cross, despising the shame, for the glory set before him?' The servant is not better than his Lord; can you not trust where He trusted? There are no sorrows so deep that Heaven can not recompense for them; and surely the believer may afford to wait, 'knowing in whom he has believed.' Trust little Lottie's fate to God. The most powerful of mortals are strong only when they do this. And for the rest, do not try to cramp her mind: let it grow, and bear fruit; give it full play; let her read, let her learn. All true knowledge is healthful; and it will make her stronger to meet the trials of life, and fitter to enter upon the joys of the life to come."

"Thank you, thank you; and God bless you, Master Harry!" said poor Ralph, while tears suffused his large mild eyes. "While I listen to you I feel as if I could suffer and endure to the end. Ah! Master Harry, it is well you are to be a preacher; you will make a true and noble one, wise to counsel and powerful to comfort."

"You think so, Ralph?" said Harry, smiling. "Well, then, let me see the first-fruits of my labors by following my counsel and accepting my comfort. Try to think less upon this subject: when an evil is irremediable, think of it only to remember that He who made it so must have known, in His infinite wisdom, that it was best for us. And now rouse yourself, my good fellow, and come with me, and I will show you that new mode of grafting I told you about."

Summer had passed into autumn, and "the melancholy days had come," when Harry, who had returned overnight from a week's absence, was passing down the garden in the early morning, and seeing old Pomp at a little distance engaged with his morning duties, he turned from his path to speak a kind word to the old man, who had petted him from his infancy.

"Well, Uncle Pomp!" he said, cheerily, "here I am home again, all safe and sound; did not get drowned nor blown up, you see. And how are you?"

"I's pretty well, I thank yer, Sir; and how der yer do? I hope I see yer well—how's yer health?" said Pomp, using the accustomed formula that he considered true politeness demanded; but though the words were familiar to Harry's ear, they wanted the old ring of hearty hilarity.

"Why, Pomp, what's the matter?" he said. "Something's amiss, I know: any body sick at home? How's Aunt Cloe?"

"Yer Aunt Cloe's putty well, tank yer, Sir; but lors! Masser Harry, hain't yer heard?"

"Heard? No! Heard what? I only came home last night, after the family had all gone to bed. What is it, Pomp—what is there to be heard?"

"Hain't yer heard 'bout my little gal?"

"What, little Lottie? No, not a word."

"Oh! Masser Harry, she's terrible sick; I dunno as she's 'live now."

"Why, Pomp! I have not heard one word of it. What's the matter?"

"Wa'al, I dunno justly; some kin' ob a faver I'd guess it was. Yer see, she an' two odder boys dey tuck sick at de school, an' dem odder boys is dead, both ob 'um!"

"You don't mean so! And how long has Lottie been sick?"

"On'y two, tree days, I 'speat; but de doctor he hab a berry poor 'pinion ob her."

"And when did you hear from her?"

"Oh! I hear las' night; but Ralph he hain't been ober to-day. Yer see, Rhoda she got leab from de missis to watch dare las' night, an' I 'spected she'd bring me word; but she ain't kim yit; an' so I's going ober dare jist as soon as I's done up my chores—on'y I's so kinder struck up like I can't get my work done; an' I'm shaky like on my legs, somehow, too. Oh! lors, lors, lors! my putty little gal! Oh! massy-soul-sakes-alive! Oh, Masser Harry! what 'll I do?"

"Sit down and rest yourself, Pomp," said the young man, kindly; "there is no hurry about the work. You sit and rest, and I will go over myself and bring you word how she is. It is too far for you to walk to-day; you are all in a tremble now;" and with a few words of hope and comfort Harry led the old man to his favorite seat by the window, and left him.

Harry had gone but half way to the cottage when he saw Ralph coming toward him, and one glance at his face convinced him that old Pomp had not magnified the danger. As the two young men met, Harry held out his hand, saying, kindly,

"I have just learned there was sickness at your house, Ralph; and I was on my way there now. How is your little sister?"

"Lottie died at sunrise, Master Harry," said Ralph, in quiet tones, but with the muscles of his face all working with strong emotion; "and I thank God for it! Yes!" he exclaimed, suddenly tossing up his arms in vehement action, "I thank God for it! Lottie! Lottie! my darling Lottie! if your pure spirit hears me you will understand now why I say it." Then his mood suddenly changing, he flung himself upon the ground in a paroxysm of passionate weeping.

"Ralph—my poor Ralph," said Harry, soothingly, "you are not fit to be out. You had better go home. You are worn out with grief and watching. Come, turn, and I will go with you."

"No, Master Harry, I must go and tell my grandfather."

"I will do that, Ralph. Had you not better go home?"

"No, Master Harry, I am better in the open air. See, I am calm now. But if you will be so kind, will you keep on and speak a comforting word to my poor mother? Of course she can not see this as I do, and her grief is very heavy."

"Certainly; I will, if you wish it. I will go at once."

And with another friendly grasp of hands the two parted.

As Harry entered the cottage he saw the trim little figure of Rhoda gliding about in the outer room, and he knew the kind-hearted girl had remained to perform the necessary household duties, and let the afflicted mother and grandmother take their appointed stations, one on either side of the bed where little Lottie lay.

Harry knew well the gorgeous taste of the African race, and he had anticipated during his walk that upon such an occasion the tropical luxuriance of fancy might, like the luxuriance of tropical vegetation, break out into rank excess; and he was consequently struck with the perfect good taste with which all the necessary arrangements had been made.

The covering of the bed, and the drapery of the little dusky figure reclining there, were spotlessly white. Lottie's hair and features were like her brother's, and the wanness of death, and the shaded light of the room, had subdued her complexion to a rich creamy hue, scarce darker than the glowing tint of some full brunette; her loose, curling hair was parted, and fell on either side; while across her brow was a wreath of white immortelle flowers. A small cross, of the same suggestive blossoms, rested upon her bosom; above it, the round, plump arms were crossed, and the small, dusky hands meekly folded; and just below the little quiet feet was a crown of thorns.

High up on the pillow, but not touching her head, was a showy wreath of bright-hued autumn flowers.

"Rhoda done dat yar," said the grandmother, Aunt Cloe, admiringly, as she saw Master Harry's eye fix for one moment on what she evidently considered the crowning glory of the whole. "Ain't it nice? Rhoda, she done dat for de poor chile, she did."

Harry had no need to ask who arranged the others—the cross clasped to the breast, the thorns beneath the feet, the unfading crown upon the brow—he felt instinctively that these were Ralph's offerings.

The poor mother sat on the right hand of her child, now singing Methodist hymns of joy and triumph, now quoting well-worn texts of Scripture (commonplace only because of their universal aptitude to the wants of human nature); and now, as the full sense of her bereavement broke upon her anew, giving way to a low wail of deep-felt sorrow; at which poor old Aunt Cloe, half-nodding in her chair, from loss of her accustomed sleep, would rouse up and offer an unavailing remonstrance of, "Oh! don't yer, now—don't yer, now. Elsie, honey, don't yer do dat, now!"

Approaching the bed, Harry took a seat near the poor mother, and addressed her with ready words of sympathy and religious consolation; and before he left her he had succeeded in quieting her outward demonstrations of grief.

The soft light of October was shining on the earth, and the swelling turf in the little hill-side burial-place was green as summer, though the fast-falling autumn leaves were drifting silently into a little, newly-opened grave, when a scanty train of mourners bore into its gate the remains of little Lottie.

First came Ralph, his outward bearing composed and firm almost to sternness, but supporting with affectionate assiduity the trembling and uncertain steps of his weeping mother.

Next came Pomp and Aunt Cloe, clinging together for mutual support; his tall form bowed more by sorrow than years; her dark face knotted, and seamed, and worn with the toil, and anxieties, and worriments of years. Following them walked the Judge and his son; and behind came Rhoda, and a few humble friends and neighbors.

Silently and reverently they stood around, till the few brief burial rites were over, and the turf replaced above the grave; then, when the other spectators, less interested, had retired, the little mourning band gathered more closely round the bed of the departed. On one side knelt Ralph, his face hidden in his hands; while by him, with his hand resting affectionately on his shoulder, stood Harry Osborn. On the other side were the poor mother and grandmother; while Rhoda stood at the head, and old Pomp sat at the foot of the little mound.

"Well, there!" said Rhoda, wiping away the honest and unbidden tears of sympathy from her cheeks. "Poor Lottie, she's gone! Well, it's what we've all got to come to, and we don't none of us know how soon. She died real sudden; she didn't expect to go so soon, no more'n nothing. Well, she was a good child, Lotty was; and I do hope she's happy. But there! we none of us knows. They say goodness ain't nothing—works don't count."

Harry felt the bowed frame of his poor friend quiver under his hand, and he said, with prompt readiness and solemn emphasis,

"Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

"Oh, my baby! my baby!" wailed out the poor, stricken mother. "My darling, darling Lottie! sha'n't I never see yer dear face agin?"

Again Harry's voice rose, in low, clear, sweet tones:

"And all wept and bewailed her; but Jesus said, Why make ye this ado and weep? The maiden is not dead, but sleepeth."

"Oh lora, yes—poor lamb! poor lamb!" said Aunt Cloe, with the feeble wail of weakness and age. "Poor lamb! poor lamb!"

And once more Harry answered,

"Yes, one of Christ's own lambs: such as he will carry in his arms, and bear tenderly in his bosom, and lead by the still waters and green pastures."

"Children!" said old Pomp, rising, and standing reverently with uncovered head, at the foot of the little grave; "Children, listen to me. I's got sumpen to tell yer. What Masser Harry sed made me tink on't now; but it's been a comfort to me; an' I'd like to tell yer he'ar. Two Sabba'-days ago, arter meetin', whin I kim home wid yer Aunt Clo', little Lottie she hab got home fust, an' dar she sot on de back steps a-larnin' her Sabba'-day lessing; leastways, I 'spect she was, coz she hab her Bible on 'ee knee. An' so I sez, 'Kim he'ar, little Lottie, an' read to me, can't yer?'—coz Lottie could read proper nicé, Lottie could," said he, his tearful eye running round the sympathizing circle till it met Harry's, who bowed a grave confirmation of the fact.

"Wa'al, so she did; she kim an' sot by me, an' she read how, whin de Blessed Lord was on de yerth, an' dem folks dey was a-sputing who should be de furthest and foremostest, de Lord 'he tuck a little chile, an' sot um in de midst ob um;' an' whin she read dat she stops, an' I see she was a-sidering; an' I sez to her,

"Go ahead, Lottie. What stops yer?"

"An' she sez,

"I was jest tinkin', Gran'sir. How do yer s'pose dat are little chile he felt whin de Lord sot um up dare, 'mongst all dem peoples?"

"Oh, lora-a-massy!" sez I, 'I's sure I dunno. Sartin,' sez I, 'yer ought ter know best, coz yer a little chile yerself,' sez I. 'How der yer tink yer would felt?'

"Oh!" sez she, 'I'd be awful scart, I guess. No, I wouldn't, nudder,' she sez. 'I wouldn't be feared if de Lord tuck me dare; I wouldn't be feared to go war de Lord 'ud take me, no-how!'

"Now, childun, de Lord isn't upon de yerth now. He's up in haben wid all de holy angels; an' he hab kim 'an' tuck our little chile an' sot her in de midst ob dem.' An', mind yer, she warn't a mite afeared to go, coz de Lord he tuck her dare; an' he said, 'Ob sich is der kingdom ob heaben.'"

Not a sound broke the impressive stillness which followed old Pomp's words. In reverent silence they stood a few moments, with bowed heads and tearful eyes; then moving gently away, with slow, lingering steps, and loving backward glances, they turned from the little hill-side burying-place.

IF I WERE ONLY IN HEAVEN!

"IF I were only in heaven!"

There are few mortal lips from which these words, or something equivalent to them, have not fallen in hours of pain, sorrow, or disappointment, when hope in the world grew faint, and the old foundations of happiness seemed crumbling into ruin.

"If I were only in heaven!"

The words came sighing through pale lips.

"And you expect to go there?"

The tone in which this was said expressed a doubt.

"We all expect to reach heaven at last. God is merciful."

"He is good to all, and kind even to the unthankful and evil. But what is heaven? Three times, within a few days, I have heard you wish yourself there."

"Heaven is a place of happiness. There are no tears there; no sorrow; no pain; no cruel disappointments, nor heart-rending separations. Heaven is heaven. The very word is full of signification."

"And you expect to go there?"

A second time was this uttered, and now the doubt it expressed quickened in the mind of the complainer a feeling that was rather more of earth than heaven.

"You seem to question my fitness," she said, with just a shadow of indignation in her voice.

"Far be it from me to judge the state of any one. God alone knoweth the hearts of his children."

"And still, you ask, in a doubting way, if I expect to go to heaven when I die."

"To a place of happiness, which lies in the far distance, and toward which we sail through life as mariners on a perilous voyage?"

"Yes; the haven of felicity."

"Where you trust to moor your time-worn bark, when the stormy ocean is crossed?"

"Yes; trusting in God's mercy."

"I'm afraid you will be disappointed," said she who had assumed the office of monitor.

The pale cheek of the complainer flushed, and her sad eyes threw out some rays of light that gleamed from an earth-enkindled fire.

"Heaven is not in the far distance," continued her friend. "We do not reach it at the end of our earthly journey. We must enter long, long before that time, or its sweet rest and peace can never be ours. And we are in heaven when our souls are filled with heavenly affections. This infilling of the soul alone takes place on earth; and thus we enter. We must have some of the joys of heaven here, or we can not receive its fuller delights when mortal puts on immortality. The life of heaven must be born in us in time, or it can not be developed in eternity. Your present state, my dear friend, is not one of preparation for that paradise toward which your eyes stretch so longingly, but one of self-affliction and vain repinings. You are closing your heart to heavenly influences instead of opening it to their reception. I speak plainly, for you have all at stake."

The flush faded from the complainer's cheeks; her eyes lost the sudden brightness which had gleamed out upon her friend; and she sat silently pondering this strange language—strange to her—while a shade of fear crept into her heart. Were her hopes of heaven resting, indeed, on so sandy a foundation? Was she vainly looking beyond the darkness in which she sat to a world of brightness and beauty? Would there be no heaven for her to enter when the weary burden of life was laid down? The questions crowded upon her.

"Come out from beneath the shadows with which you have surrounded yourself," said the friend, "and enjoy the cheerful sunlight. Instead of idly longing for a heaven that lies afar off, receive heaven into your heart in the delight that flows in with all good deeds. Be a worker in the vineyard of your Lord, not a weak repiner; a faithful servant, not a talent hider. They who are entering heaven grow more and more peaceful in spirit; more and more resigned to the Father's will; more and more willing to work and wait in patient hope. Instead of wishing themselves in heaven, as a place of rest afar off, they are daily tasting of its sweet felicities."

"You take away the foundations on which my feet have rested. You scatter my hopes to the wind. I have looked to you for consolation, but you have none to offer."

"If I have broken the foundations on which your feet rested, it is that you may plant them more surely on the Rock of Ages. If I have scattered vain hopes to the wind, it is in order that living hopes may spring up in your heart. If you have looked to me for consolation and found it not, then, I pray you, look higher; even unto Him who says 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'"

"But my heart is crushed. I have no strength; no hope in life: all that I held dear has departed. And I have only wished to die and be at peace."

"There are other crushed hearts; others without hope; others from whom all the dear ones have departed. Think of them, and of their loneliness and suffering instead of your own; and as pity comes into your heart, think whether it is in your power or not to ease a pain; to send a ray of comfort into a mind sitting in darkness; to speak a word that may reach the mourner with consolation. God is the great Comforter, but he acts through angels and men in his ministrations of good, thus making his blessings double. They who act with him are partakers in the peace, joy, and consolation that flow through them, and are thus received into heaven, while, as to the body, they are still in the world of nature."

For a while after this plain-talking friend had left the lady sat in her usual place in the dim, closely-curtained room where most of her time was spent. But the truths which had been uttered in her ears did not pass as the idle winds. She dwelt on them, pondering their scope and meaning, and seeing them in clearer and clearer light. But states of feeling soon turn our thoughts in their own direction. It was not long before she was musing on her unhappy condition, and in the weariness of life that came back upon her she murmured the oft-repeated words,

"Oh, if I were only in heaven! If I could only die and be at peace!"

Then came back the suggestions of her friend; and with such a force of conviction that she clasped her hands together, and, rising up, moved in some agitation of mind about the room. As she did so, the thought of a poor sick woman in the neighborhood came into her mind. She had heard of her serious illness on the day before, but let the intelligence pass with only a word of pity. It did not once occur that she ought to go or send to the woman's relief. Now the thought of her came with a suggestion of duty, and acting upon that suggestion she rung the bell.

"Mary," she said, as a domestic came, in answer to the bell, "have you heard from Mrs. Ellis to-day?"

"Yes, Ma'am," was replied.

"How is she?"

"Very sick, Ma'am, they say."

"What ails her?"

"Pleurisy, I think, Ma'am."

"Have you been over to see her?"

"No, Ma'am."

"I wish you would step in and see how she is, Mary. She may be suffering for want of proper attention. I would like to know."

The girl left the room with a look of surprise on her face that did not escape the lady's notice. Its meaning was partly understood.

"How did you find her, Mary?" was asked when the girl returned.

"I wish you could only see for yourself, Ma'am," said Mary. "It would make your heart ache. If somebody don't look after her she'll die, and then what will become of her poor little babies?"

There was a look of real distress in the girl's face.

"Is she in want of any thing?" inquired the lady.

"Oh, Ma'am, won't you just step over and see for yourself," was answered in an appealing way. "She is in want of every thing; I don't believe her poor little children have had any thing to eat this day."

"Mary!"

"Indeed, Ma'am, and I shouldn't wonder at all. To think of it in a Christian neighborhood!"

"Somebody should have looked after her," said the lady, in a tone meant to blame every other person in the neighborhood but herself.

"What's every body's business is no body's business," replied the girl.

The sight that met the lady's eyes when, under the force of a strong self-compulsion, she entered the room where this sick woman lay gave her, too, the heart-ache. Alone, exhausted with pain, without fire or food for her children, or medicine for herself, she was stretched on a hard straw bed which no hand had beaten up or smoothed for days. As the lady came in a gleam lit up her dull eyes, which turned with an appealing look to three little children who were sitting close together in silence on the floor. From the instant that weary complainer entered this room she forgot herself in an overpowering pity. A few questions were asked and answered—then prompt hands and a prompt will soon changed the whole aspect of things. There were food, medicine, warmth, and comfort in the rooms where, a little while before, all was cold, desolate, and exhausted. As the lady looked around and thought of the change a few words and deeds had wrought as if by magic—saw the look of peace, rest, and hope which had settled over the sick woman's pale face, and followed her almost smiling eyes as she looked after her cleanly dressed and now happy children—she felt a deeply penetrating glow of satisfaction, and a sense of tranquillity to which she had long been a stranger. She had forgotten herself in an earnest desire to help another, and the heavenly delight that always springs from good deeds done from right impulses was flowing into her soul.

"How is it with you to-day?" asked the friend who had spoken so plainly. It was a week after this first visit to the sick woman. She was holding the lady by the hand and looking earnestly into her countenance, which had more light and hope in it than she had seen there for a long time.

"As well as I could expect." A faint smile hovered around her sad lips, hiding the pain which lay there like a shadow from some mountain of sorrow.

"Ah! what little girl is this?"

A child had entered the room with a quiet, half-timid step, as if not feeling the confidence of a genuine home feeling.

"The child of a poor sick woman in the neighborhood," was answered. "The mother was very ill, and as there was no one to see after this little one I brought her home. She has been here for several days."

"You have been to see her mother, then?"

"Oh yes; I've called over every day to see after her. She would have died, I believe, if I had not met her case promptly. It is shameful to think how, in the very midst of a rich neighborhood of people calling themselves Christians, a sick woman may be left to suffer and die without a hand being raised to help her. I wouldn't have believed it, if this case had not come under my immediate notice."

"I see," said the friend, still holding the lady's hand and smiling into her face, "why that old sad, life-weary look has departed."

An answering smile lit up, suddenly, the lady's countenance.

"Has it departed?" she asked, half wondering at her friend's remark.

"Yes, and may it never return to tell of brooding self-torture, and idle longings after that heavenly peace in the far-off future which never comes except as the fullness of a heavenly peace that flows into the soul while patiently doing its work in the harvest-fields of time. You have opened the gate of heaven, my dear friend, and your feet are upon the threshold. The first draught of its pure, crystalline air has swelled your lungs with a new sense of pleasure, and given to your heart new pulsations of delight. Do not linger in the outer courts, but enter in, daily, by good deeds done in the name of our common humanity. Sit no longer idle. A stagnant mind, like stagnant waters, breeds noxious vapors and hideous monsters. Health and happiness come only in active duty. If, at home, you find not work enough to keep your thoughts and hands busy go abroad, and by good deed and good example become a co-worker with the angels into whose blessed company you have so many times desired to enter through the gate of death. We must become associated with them here, my friend, or we can not enter into their society above. Heaven is a state of mutual love; but if we are mere lovers of self here—idle repiners instead of active servants in the Lord's work of doing good—how can we pass by death into heaven? Death only separates the soul from its mortal body: it makes no change in its quality. What we are when we depart hence will we remain to eternity. And so, my friend, if you wish to come fully into heaven when you die, press forward through the gate by which you have now entered, and the further you progress here the higher will be your position when, at the close of this earthly life, it shall be said unto you: 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world!'"

"UNTO THIS LAST."

BY JOHN RUSKIN.

IV.—AD VALOREM.

IN the last paper we saw that just payment of labor consisted in a sum of money which would approximately obtain equivalent labor at a future time: we have now to examine the means of obtaining such equivalence. Which question involves the definition of Value, Wealth, Price, and Produce.

None of these terms are yet defined so as to be understood by the public. But the last, Produce, which one might have thought the clearest of all, is, in use, the most ambiguous; and the examination of the kind of ambiguity attendant on its present employment will best open the way to our work.

In his chapter on Capital,* Mr. J. S. Mill instances, as a capitalist, a hardware manufacturer, who, having intended to spend a certain portion of the proceeds of his business in buying plate and jewels, changes his mind, and "pays it as wages to additional work-people." The effect is stated by Mr. Mill to be, that "more food is appropriated to the consumption of productive laborers."

Now I do not ask, though, had I written this paragraph, it would surely have been asked of me, What is to become of the silversmiths? If they are truly unproductive persons, we will acquiesce in their extinction. And though in another part of the same passage, the hardware merchant is supposed also to dispense with a number of servants, whose "food is thus set free for productive purposes," I do not inquire what will be the effect, painful or otherwise, upon the servants, of this emancipation of their food. But I very seriously inquire why ironware is produce, and silverware is not? That the merchant consumes the one, and sells the other, certainly does not constitute the difference, unless it can be shown (which, indeed, I perceive it to be becoming daily more and more the aim of tradesmen to show) that commodities are made to be sold, and not to be consumed. The merchant is an agent of conveyance to the consumer in one case, and is himself the consumer in the other:† but the laborers are in either case equally productive, since they have produced goods to the same value, if the hardware and the plate are both goods.

And what distinction separates them? It is indeed possible that in the "comparative estimate of the moralist," with which Mr. Mill says political economy has nothing to do (III. i. 2), a steel fork might appear a more substantial production than a silver one: we may grant also that knives, no less than forks, are good produce; and scythes and plowshares serviceable articles. But how of bayonets? Supposing the hardware merchant to effect large sales of these, by help of the "setting free" of the food of his servants and his silversmith—is he still employing productive laborers, or, in Mr. Mill's words, laborers who increase "the stock of permanent means of enjoyment" (I. iii. 4). Or if, instead of bayonets, he supply bombs, will not the absolute and final "enjoyment" of even these energetically productive articles (each of which costs ten pounds*) be dependent on a proper choice of time and place for their enfusement; choice, that is to say, depending on those philosophical considerations with which political economy has nothing to do?†

I should have regretted the need of pointing out inconsistency in any portion of Mr. Mill's work, had not the value of his work proceeded from its inconsistencies. He deserves honor among economists by inadvertently disclaiming the principles which he states, and tacitly introducing the moral considerations with which he declares his science has no connection. Many of his chapters are, therefore, true and valuable; and the only conclusions of his which I have to dispute are those which follow from his premises.

Thus, the idea which lies at the root of the passage we have just been examining, namely, that labor applied to produce luxuries will not support so many persons as labor applied to produce useful articles, is entirely true; but the instance given fails—and in four directions of failure at once—because Mr. Mill has not defined the real meaning of usefulness. The definition * Book I. chap. iv. ss. 1. To save space, my future references to Mr. Mill's work will be by numerals only, as in this instance, I. iv. 1. Ed. in 2 vols. 8vo. Parker, 1848.

† If Mr. Mill had wished to show the difference in result between consumption and sale, he should have represented the hardware merchant as consuming his own goods instead of selling them; similarly, the silver merchant as consuming his own goods instead of selling them. Had he done this, he would have made his position clearer, though less tenable; and perhaps this was the position he really intended to take, tacitly involving his theory, elsewhere stated, and shown in the sequel of this paper to be false, that demand for commodities is not demand for labor. But by the most diligent scrutiny of the paragraph now under examination, I can not determine whether it is a fallacy pure and simple, or the half of one fallacy supported by the whole of a greater one; so that I treat it here on the kinder assumption that it is one fallacy only.

* I take Mr. Helps's estimate in his essay on War.

† Also when the wrought silver vases of Spain were dashed to fragments by our custom-house officers, because bullion might be imported free of duty, but not brains, was the axe that broke them productive?—the artist who wrought them unproductive? Or again. If the woodman's axe is productive, is the executioner's? as also, if the hemp of a cable be productive, does not the productiveness of hemp in a halter depend on its moral more than on its material application?

which he has given—"capacity to satisfy a desire, or serve a purpose" (III. i. 2)—applies equally to the iron and silver; while the true definition—which he has not given, but which nevertheless underlies the false verbal definition in his mind, and comes out once or twice by accident (as in the words "any support to life or strength" in I. i. 5)—applies to some articles of iron, but not to others, and to some articles of silver, but not to others. It applies to plows, but not to bayonets; and to forks, but not to filigree.*

The eliciting of the true definition will give us the reply to our first question, "What is value?" respecting which, however, we must first hear the popular statements.

"The word 'value,' when used without adjunct, always means, in political economy, value in exchange" (Mill, III. i. 8). So that, if two ships can not exchange their rudders, their rudders are, in politico-economic language, of no value to either.

But "the subject of political economy is wealth."—(Preliminary remarks, page 1.)

And wealth "consists of all useful and agreeable objects which possess exchangeable value."—(Preliminary remarks, page 10.)

It appears, then, according to Mr. Mill, that usefulness and agreeableness underlie the exchange value, and must be ascertained to exist in the thing, before we can esteem it an object of wealth.

Now, the economical usefulness of a thing depends not merely on its own nature, but on the number of people who can and will use it. A horse is useless, and therefore unsalable, if no one can ride; a sword, if no one can strike; and meat, if no one can eat. Thus every material utility depends on its relative human capacity.

Similarly: The agreeableness of a thing depends not merely on its own likeableness, but on the number of people who can be got to like it. The relative agreeableness, and therefore salableness, of "a pot of the smallest ale," and of "Adonis painted by a running brook," depends virtually on the opinion of Demos, in the shape of Christopher Sly. That is to say, the agreeableness of a thing depends on its relative human disposition.† Therefore, political economy, being a science of wealth, must be a science re-* Filigree: that is to say, generally, ornament dependent on complexity, not on art.

† These statements sound crude in their brevity; but will be found of the utmost importance when they are developed. Thus, in the above instance, economists have never perceived that disposition to buy is a wholly moral element in demand: that is to say, when you give a man half a crown, it depends on his disposition whether he is rich or poor with it—whether he will buy disease, ruin, and hatred, or buy health, advancement, and domestic love. And thus the agreeableness or exchange value of every offered commodity depends on production, not merely of the commodity, but of buyers of it; therefore on the education of buyers, and on all the moral elements by which their disposition to buy this, or that, is formed. I will illustrate and expand into final consequences every one of these definitions in its place: at present they can only be given with extreme brevity; for in order to put the subject at once in a connected form before the reader, specting human capacities and dispositions. But moral considerations have nothing to do with political economy (III. i. 2). Therefore, moral considerations have nothing to do with human capacities and dispositions.

I do not wholly like the look of this conclusion from Mr. Mill's statements: let us try Mr. Ricardo's.

"Utility is not the measure of exchangeable value, though it is absolutely essential to it."—(Chap. I. sect. i.) Essential in what degree, Mr. Ricardo? There may be greater and less degrees of utility. Meat, for instance, may be so good as to be fit for any one to eat, or so bad as to be fit for no one to eat. What is the exact degree of goodness which is "essential" to its exchangeable value, but not "the measure" of it? How good must the meat be, in order to possess any exchangeable value? and how bad must it be—(I wish this were a settled question in London markets)—in order to possess none?

There appears to be some hitch, I think, in the working even of Mr. Ricardo's principles; but let him take his own example. "Suppose that in the early stages of society the bows and arrows of the hunter were of equal value with the implements of the fisherman. Under such circumstances the value of the deer, the produce of the hunter's day's labor, would be exactly" (italics mine) "equal to the value of the fish, the product of the fisherman's day's labor. The comparative value of the fish and game would be entirely regulated by the quantity of labor realized in each."—(Ricardo, chap. iii. On Value.)

Indeed! Therefore, if the fisherman catches one sprat, and the huntsman one deer, one sprat will be equal in value to one deer; but if the fisherman catches no sprat, and the huntsman two deer, no sprat will be equal in value to two deer?

Nay; but—Mr. Ricardo's supporters may say—he means, on an average; if the average product of a day's work of fisher and hunter be one fish and one deer, the one fish will always be equal in value to the one deer.

Might I inquire the species of fish. Whale? or whitebait?*

I have thrown into one the opening definitions of four chapters; namely, of that on Value ("Ad Valorem"); on Price ("Thirty Pieces"); on Production ("Demeter"); and on Economy ("The Law of the House").

* Perhaps it may be said, in farther support of Mr. Ricardo, that he meant, "when the utility is constant or given, the price varies as the quantity of labor." If he meant this, he should have said it; but, had he meant it, he could have hardly missed the necessary result, that utility would be one measure of price (which he expressly denies it to be); and that, to prove salableness, he had to prove a given quantity of utility, as well as a given quantity of labor: to wit, in his own instance, that the deer and fish would each feed the same number of men, for the same number of days, with equal pleasure to their palates. The fact is, he did not know what he meant himself. The general idea which he had derived from commercial experience, without being able to analyze it, was, that when the demand is constant, the price varies as the quantity of labor required for production; or—using the formula I gave in last paper—when  $y$  is constant,  $xy$  varies as  $x$ . But demand never is, nor can be, ultimately

It would be waste of time to pursue these fallacies farther; we will seek for a true definition.

Much store has been set for centuries upon the use of our English classical education. It were to be wished that our well-educated merchants recalled to mind always this much of their Latin schooling—that the nominative of valorem (a word already sufficiently familiar to them) is valor; a word which, therefore, ought to be familiar to them. Valor, from valere, to be well, or strong (ὕψαινω); strong, in life (if a man), or valiant; strong, for life (if a thing), or valuable. To be "valuable," therefore, is to "avail toward life." A truly valuable or availing thing is that which leads to life with its whole strength. In proportion as it does not lead to life, or as its strength is broken, it is less valuable; in proportion as it leads away from life it is unvaluable or malignant.

The value of a thing, therefore, is independent of opinion and of quantity. Think what you will of it, gain how much you may of it, the value of the thing itself is neither greater nor less. Forever it avails, or avails not; no estimate can raise, no disdain depress, the power which it holds from the Maker of things and of men.

The real science of political economy, which has yet to be distinguished from the bastard science, as medicine from witchcraft, and astronomy from astrology, is that which teaches nations to desire and labor for the things that lead to life; and which teaches them to scorn and destroy the things that lead to destruction. And if, in a state of infancy, they suppose indifferent things, such as excrescences of shell-fish, and pieces of blue and red stone, to be valuable, and spend large measure of the labor which ought to be employed for the extension and ennobling of life in diving or digging for them, and cutting them into various shapes—or if, in the same state of infancy, they imagine constant, if  $x$  varies distinctly; for, as price rises, consumers fall away; and as soon as there is monopoly (and all scarcity is a form of monopoly: so that every commodity is affected occasionally by some color of monopoly),  $y$  becomes the most influential condition of the price. Thus the price of a painting depends less on its merit than on the interest taken in it by the public; the price of singing less on the labor of the singer than the number of persons who desire to hear him; and the price of gold less on the scarcity which affects it in common with cerium or iridium, than on the sun-like color and unalterable purity by which it attracts the admiration and answers the trust of mankind.

It must be kept in mind, however, that I use the word "demand" in a somewhat different sense from economists usually. They mean by it "the quantity of a thing sold." I mean by it "the force of the buyer's capable intention to buy." In good English, a person's "demand" signifies, not what he gets, but what he asks for.

Economists also do not notice that objects are not valued by absolute bulk or weight, but by such bulk and weight as is necessary to bring them into use. They say, for instance, that water bears no price in the market. It is true that a cupful does not, but a lake does; just as a handful of dust does not, but an acre does. And were it possible to make even the possession of the cupful or handful permanent (i. e. to find a place for them), the earth and sea would be bought up by handfuls and cupfuls.

precious and beneficent things, such as air, light, and cleanliness, to be valueless—or if, finally, they imagine the conditions of their own existence, by which alone they can truly possess or use any thing, such, for instance, as peace, trust, and love, to be prudently exchangeable, when the market offers, for gold, iron, or excrescences of shells—the great and only science of Political Economy teaches them, in all these cases, what is vanity and what substance; and how the service of Death, the Lord of Waste, and of eternal emptiness, differs from the service of Wisdom, the Lady of Saving, and of eternal fullness; she who has said, "I will cause those that love me to inherit SUBSTANCE, and I will FILL their treasures."

The "Lady of Saving," in a profounder sense than that of the savings' bank, though that is a good one: Madonna della Salute—Lady of Health—which, though commonly spoken of as if separate from wealth, is indeed a part of wealth. This word, "wealth," it will be remembered, is the next we have to define.

"To be wealthy," says Mr. Mill, "is to have a large stock of useful articles."

I accept this definition. Only let us perfectly understand it. My opponents often lament my not giving them enough logic: I fear I must at present use a little more than they will like; but this business of Political Economy is no light one, and we must allow no loose terms in it.

We have, therefore, to ascertain the above definition, first, what is the meaning of "having," or the nature of Possession. Then, what is the meaning of "useful," or the nature of Utility.

And first of possession. At the crossing of the transepts of Milan Cathedral has lain, for three hundred years, the embalmed body of St. Carlo Borromeo. It holds a golden crozier, and has a cross of emeralds on its breast. Admitting the crozier and emeralds to be useful articles, is the body to be considered as "having" them? Do they, in the politico-economical sense of property, belong to it? If not, and if we may, therefore, conclude generally that a dead body can not possess property, what degree and period of animation in the body will render possession possible?

As thus: lately in a wreck of a Californian ship, one of the passengers fastened a belt about him with two hundred pounds of gold in it, with which he was found afterward at the bottom. Now as he was sinking—had he the gold? or had the gold him?*

And if, instead of sinking him in the sea by its weight, the gold had struck him on the forehead, and thereby caused incurable disease—suppose palsy or insanity—would the gold in that case have been more a "possession" than in the first? Without pressing the inquiry up through instances of gradually increasing vital power over the gold (which I will, however, give, if they are asked for), I presume the reader will see that possession, or "having," is not an absolute, but a gradated, power; and consists not only in the quantity or nature of the thing possessed, but also (and in a greater degree) in its suitability to the person possessing it, and in his vital power to use it.

And our definition of Wealth, expanded, becomes: "The possession of useful articles which we can use." This is a very serious change. For wealth, instead of depending merely on a "have," is thus seen to depend on a "can." Gladiator's death, on a "habet;" but soldier's victory, and state's salvation, on a "quo plurimum posset." (Liv., VII. 6.) And what we reasoned of only as accumulation of material, is seen to demand also accumulation of capacity.

So much for our verb. Next for our adjective. What is the meaning of "useful?"

The inquiry is closely connected with the last. For what is capable of use in the hands of some persons, is capable, in the hands of others, of the opposite of use, called commonly, "from-use," or "ab-use." And it depends on the person, much more than on the article, whether its usefulness or ab-usefulness will be the quality developed in it. Thus, wine, which the Greeks, in their Bacchus, made, rightly, the type of all passion, and which, when used, "cheereth god and man" (that is to say, strengthens both the divine life, or reasoning power, and the earthly, or carnal power, of man); yet, when abused, becomes "Dionusos," hurtful especially to the divine part of man, or reason. And again, the body itself, being equally liable to use and to abuse, and, when rightly disciplined, serviceable to the State, both for war and labor; but when not disciplined, or abused, valueless to the State, and capable only of continuing the private or single existence of the individual (and that but feebly)—the Greeks called such a body an "idiotic" or "private" body, from their word signifying a person employed in no way directly useful to the State; whence, finally, our "idiot," meaning a person entirely occupied with his own concerns.

Hence, it follows, that if a thing is to be useful, it must be not only of an availing nature, but in availing hands. Or, in accurate terms, usefulness is value in the hands of the valiant; so that this science of wealth being, as we have just seen, when regarded as the science of Accumulation, accumulative of capacity as well as of material, when regarded as the Science of Distribution, is distribution not absolute, but discriminate; not of every thing to every man, but of the right thing to the right man. A difficult science, dependent on more than arithmetic.

Wealth, therefore, is "THE POSSESSION OF THE VALUABLE BY THE VALIANT;" and in considering it as a power existing in a nation, the two elements, the value of the thing, and the valor of its possessor, must be estimated together. Whence it appears that many of the persons commonly considered wealthy, are in reality no more wealthy than the locks of their own strong boxes are; they being inherently and eternally incapable of wealth; and operating for the nation, in an economical point of view, either as pools of dead water, and eddies in a stream (which, so long as the stream flows, are useless, or serve only to drown people, but may become of importance in a state of stagnation, should the stream dry); or else, as dams in a river, of which the ultimate service depends not on the dam, but the miller; or else, as mere accidental stays and impediments, acting, not as wealth, but (for we ought to have a correspondent term) as "illth," causing various devastation and trouble around them in all directions; or lastly, act not at all, but are merely animated conditions of delay (no use being possible of any thing they have until they are dead), in which last condition they are nevertheless often useful as delays, and "impedimenta," if a nation is apt to move too fast.

This being so, the difficulty of the true science of Political Economy lies not merely in the need of developing manly character to deal with material value, but in the fact, that while the manly character and material value only form wealth by their conjunction, they have nevertheless a mutually destructive operation on each other. For the manly character is apt to ignore, or even cast away, the material value: whence that of Pope:

"Sure, of qualities demanding praise,
More go to ruin fortunes, than to raise."

And on the other hand, the material value is apt to undermine the manly character; so that it must be our work, in the issue, to examine what evidence there is of the effect of wealth on the minds of its possessors: also, what kind of person it is who usually sets himself to obtain wealth, and succeeds in doing so; and whether the world owes more gratitude to rich or to poor men, either for their moral influence upon it, or for chief goods, discoveries, and practical advancements. I may, however, anticipate future conclusions so far as to state that in a community regulated only by laws of demand and supply, but protected from open violence, the persons who become rich are, generally speaking, industrious, resolute, proud, covetous, prompt, methodical, sensible, unimaginative, insensitive, and ignorant. The persons who remain poor are the entirely foolish, the entirely wise,* the idle, the reckless, the humble, the thoughtful, the dull, the imaginative, the sensitive, the well-informed, the improvident, the irregularly and impulsively wicked, the clumsy knave, the open thief, and the entirely merciful, just, and godly person.

Thus far then of wealth. Next, we have to ascertain the nature of PRICE; that is to say, of exchange value, and its expression by currencies.

Note first, of exchange, there can be no profit in it. It is only in labor there can be profit—that is to say, a "making in advance," or "making in favor of" (from proficio). In exchange, there is only advantage, i.e. a bringing of van- tage or power to the exchanging persons. Thus, one man, by sowing and reaping, turns one measure of corn into two measures. That is Profit. Another by digging and forging, turns one spade into two spades. That is Profit. But the man who has two measures of corn wants sometimes to dig; and the man who has two spades wants sometimes to eat:—They exchange the gained grain for the gained tool; and both are the better for the exchange; but though there is much advantage in the transaction, there is no profit. Nothing is constructed or produced. Only that which had been before constructed is given to the person by whom it can be used. If labor is necessary to effect the exchange, that labor is in reality involved in the production, and, like all other labor, bears profit. Whatever number of men are concerned in the manufacture, or in the conveyance, have share in the profit; but neither the manufacture nor the conveyance are the exchange, and in the exchange itself there is no profit.

There may, however, be acquisition, which is a very different thing. If, in the exchange, one man is able to give what cost him little labor for what has cost the other much, he "acquires" a certain quantity of the produce of the other's labor. And precisely what he acquires the other loses. In mercantile language, the person who thus acquires is commonly said to have "made a profit;" and I believe that many of our merchants are seriously under the impression that it is possible for every body, somehow, to make a profit in this manner. Whereas, by the unfortunate constitution of the world we live in, the laws both of matter and motion have quite rigorously forbidden universal acquisition of this kind. Profit, or material gain, is attainable only by construction or by discovery; not by exchange. Whenever material gain follows exchange, for every plus there is a precisely equal minus.

Unhappily for the progress of the science of Political Economy, the plus quantities, or—if I may be allowed to coin an awkward plural—the pluses make a very positive and venerable appearance in the world, so that every one is eager to learn the science which produces results so magnificent; whereas, the minuses have, on the other hand, a tendency to retire into back streets, and other places of shade—or even to get themselves wholly and finally put out of sight in graves: which renders the algebra of this science peculiar, and difficultly legible; a large number of its negative signs being written by the account-keeper in a kind of red ink, which starvation thins, and makes strangely pale, or even quite invisible ink, for the present.

The Science of Exchange, or, as I hear it has been proposed to call it, of "Catallactics," considered as one of gain, is, therefore, simply nugatory; but considered as one of acquisition, it is a very curious science, differing in its data and basis from every other science known. Thus: If I can exchange a needle with a savage for a diamond, my power of doing so depends either on the savage's ignorance of social arrangements in Europe, or on his want of power to take advantage of them, by selling the diamond to any one else for more needles. If, farther, I make the bargain as completely advantageous to myself as possible, by giving to the savage a needle with no eye in it (reaching, thus, a sufficiently satisfactory type of the perfect operation of catallactic science), the advantage to me in the entire transaction depends wholly upon the ignorance, powerlessness, or heedlessness of the person dealt with. Do away with these, and catallactic advantage becomes impossible. So far, therefore, as the science of exchange relates to the advantage of one of the exchanging persons only, it is founded on the ignorance or incapacity of the opposite person. Where these vanish, it also vanishes. It is therefore a science founded on nescience, and an art founded on artlessness. But all other sciences and arts, except this, have for their object the doing away with their opposite nescience and artlessness. This science, alone of sciences, must, by all available means, promulgate and prolong its opposite nescience; otherwise the science itself is impossible. It is, therefore, peculiarly and alone, the science of darkness; probably a bastard science—not by any means a divina scientia, but one begotten of another father, that father who, advising his children to turn stones into bread, is himself employed in turning bread into stones, and who, if you ask a fish of him (fish not being producible on his estate), can but give you a serpent.

The general law, then, respecting just or economical exchange, is simply this: There must be advantage on both sides (or if only advantage on one, at least no disadvantage on the other) to the persons exchanging; and just payment for his time, intelligence, and labor, to any intermediate person effecting the transaction (commonly called a merchant): and whatever advantage there is on either side, and whatever pay is given to the intermediate person, should be thoroughly known to all concerned. All attempt at concealment implies some practice of the opposite, or undivine science, founded on nescience. Whence another saying of the Jew merchant's—"As a nail between the stone joints, so doth sin stick fast between buying and selling." Which peculiar riveting of stone and timber, in men's dealings with each other, is again set forth in the house which was to be destroyed—timber and stones together—when Zechariah's roll (more probably "curved sword") flew over it: "the curse that goeth forth over all the earth upon every one that stealeth and holdeth himself guiltless," instantly followed by the vision of the Great Measure—the measure "of the injustice of them in all the earth" (ἀντὴ ἡ ἀδικία αὐτῶν ἐν πάσῃ τῇ γῇ), with the weight of lead for its lid, and the woman, the spirit of wickedness, within it; that is to say, Wickedness hidden by Dullness, and formalized, outwardly, into ponderously established cruelty. "It shall be set upon its own base in the land of Babel."*

I have hitherto carefully restricted myself, in speaking of exchange, to the use of the term "advantage;" but that term includes two ideas; the advantage, namely, of getting what we need, and that of getting what we wish for. Three-fourths of the demands existing in the world are romantic; founded on visions, idealisms, hopes, and affections; and the regulation of the purse is, in its essence, regulation of the imagination and the heart. Hence, the right discussion of the nature of price is a very high metaphysical and psychical problem; sometimes to be solved only in a passionate manner, as by David in his counting the price of the water of the well by the gate of Bethlehem; but its first conditions are the following: The price of any thing is the quantity of labor given by the person desiring it, in order to obtain possession of it. This price depends on four variable quantities. A. The quantity of wish the purchaser has for the thing; opposed to  $\alpha$ , the quantity of wish the seller has to keep it. B. The quantity of labor the purchaser can afford to obtain the thing; opposed to  $\beta$ , the quantity of labor the seller can afford, to keep it. These quantities are operative only in excess; i.e. the quantity of wish (A) means the quantity of wish for this thing, above wish for other things; and the quantity of work (B) means the quantity which can be spared to get this thing from the quantity needed to get other things.

Phenomena of price, therefore, are intensely complex, curious, and interesting—too complex, however, to be examined yet; every one of them, when traced far enough, showing itself at last as a part of the bargain of the Poor of the Flock (or "flock of slaughter"), "If ye think good, give me my price; and if not, forbear"—Zech. xi. 12; but as the price of every thing is to be calculated finally in labor, it is necessary to define the nature of that standard.

Labor is the contest of the life of man with an opposite; the term "life" including his intellect, soul, and physical power, contending with question, difficulty, trial, or material force.

Labor is of a higher or lower order, as it includes more or fewer of the elements of life: and labor of good quality, in any kind, includes always as much intellect and feeling as will fully and harmoniously regulate the physical force.

In speaking of the value and price of labor, it is necessary always to understand labor of a given rank and quality, as we should speak of gold or silver of a given standard. Bad (that is, heartless, inexperienced, or senseless) labor can not be valued; it is like gold of uncertain alloy, or flawed iron.*

\* Labor which is entirely good of its kind, that is to say effective, or efficient, the Greeks called "weighable," or  $\alpha\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$ , translated usually "worthy," and because thus substantial and true, they called its price  $\tau\iota\mu\eta$ , the "honorable estimate" of it (honorarium): this word being founded on their conception of true labor as a divine thing, to be honored with the kind of honor given to the gods; whereas the price of false labor, or of that which led away from life, was to be, not honor, but vengeance; for which they reserved another word, attributing the exaction of such price

The quality and kind of labor being given, its value, like that of all other valuable things, is invariable. But the quantity of it which must be given for other things is variable: and in estimating this variation, the price of other things must always be counted by the quantity of labor; not the price of labor by the quantity of other things.

Thus, if we want to plant an apple sapling in rocky ground, it may take two hours' work; in soft ground, perhaps only half an hour. Grant the soil equally good for the tree in each case. Then the value of the sapling planted by two hours' work is nowise greater than that of the sapling planted in half an hour. One will bear no more fruit than the other. Also, one half hour of work is as valuable as another half hour; nevertheless the one sapling has cost four such pieces of work, the other only one. Now the proper statement of this fact is, not that the labor on the hard ground is cheaper than on the soft, but that the tree is dearer. The exchange value may, or may not, afterward depend on this fact. If other people have plenty of soft ground to plant in, they will take no cognizance of our two hours' labor in the price they will offer for the plant on the rock. And if, through want of sufficient botanical science, we have planted a upas-tree instead of an apple, the exchange-value will be a negative quantity; still less proportionate to the labor expended.

What is commonly called cheapness of labor, signifies, therefore, in reality, that many obstacles have to be overcome by it; so that much labor is required to produce a small result. But this should never be spoken of as cheapness of labor, but as dearness of the object wrought for. It would be just as rational to say that walking was cheap, because we had ten miles to walk home to our dinner, as that labor was cheap, because we had to work ten hours to earn it.

The last word which we have to define is "Production."

I have hitherto spoken of all labor as profitable; because it is impossible to consider under one head the quality or value of labor, and its aim. But labor of the best quality may be various in aim. It may be either constructive ("gathering," from con and struo), as agriculture; nugatory, as jewel-cutting; or destructive ("scattering," from de and struo), as war. It is not, however, always easy to prove labor, apparently nugatory, to be actually so;* generally, to a peculiar goddess, called Tisiphone, the "requiter (or quittance-taker) of death;" a person versed in the highest branches of arithmetic, and punctual in her habits; with whom accounts current have been opened also in modern days.

* The most accurately nugatory labor is, perhaps, that of which not enough is given to answer a purpose effectually, and which, therefore, has all to be done over again. Also, labor which falls of effect through non-co-operation. The curé of a little village near Bellinzona, to whom I had expressed wonder that the peasants allowed the Ticino to flood their fields, told me that they would not join to build an effectual embankment high up the valley, because every body said "that would help his neighbors as much as himself." So every proprietor built a bit of low embankment the formula holds good: "he that gathereth not, scattereth;" thus, the jeweler's art is probably very harmful in its ministering to a clumsy and inelegant pride. So that, finally, I believe nearly all labor may be shortly divided into positive and negative labor: positive, that which produces life; negative, that which produces death; the most directly negative labor being murder, and the most directly positive, the bearing and rearing of children: so that in the precise degree in which murder is hateful, on the negative side of idleness, in that exact degree child-rearing is admirable, on the positive side of idleness. For which reason, and because of the honor that there is in rearing* children, while the wife is said to be as the vine (for cheering), the children are as the olive-branch, for praise; nor for praise only, but for peace (because large families can only be reared in times of peace): though since, in their spreading and voyaging in various directions, they distribute strength, they are, to the home strength, as arrows in the hand of the giant—striking here and there, far away.

Labor being thus various in its result, the prosperity of any nation is in exact proportion to the quantity of labor which it spends in obtaining and employing means of life. Observe—I say, obtaining and employing; that is to say, not merely wisely producing, but wisely distributing and consuming. Economists usually speak as if there were no good in consumption absolute.† So far from this being so, consumption absolute is the end, crown, and perfection of production; and wise consumption is a far more difficult art than wise production. Twenty people can gain money for one who can use it; and the vital question, for individual and for nation, is, never "how much do they make?" but "to what purpose do they spend?"

The reader may, perhaps, have been surprised at the slight reference I have hitherto made to "capital," and its functions. It is here the place to define them.

Capital signifies "head, or source, or root material"—it is material by which some derivative or secondary good is produced. It is only capital proper (caput vivum, not caput mortuum) when it is thus producing something different from itself. It is a root, which does not enter into vital function till it produces something else than a root; namely, fruit. That fruit will in time again produce roots; and so all living capital issues in reproduction of capital; but capital about his own field; and the Ticino, as soon as it had a mind, swept away and swallowed all up together.

* Observe, I say, "rearing," not "begetting." The praise is in the seventh season, not in σπορητός, nor in φωταλὰ, but in ὄσπερα. It is strange that men always praise enthusiastically any person who, by a momentary exertion, saves a life; but praise very hesitatingly a person who, by exertion and self-denial prolonged through years, creates one. We give the crown "ob civem servatum;" why not "ob civem natum?" Born, I mean, to the full, in soul as well as body. England has oak enough, I think, for both chaplets.

† When Mr. Mill speaks of productive consumption, he only means consumption which results in increase of capital, or material wealth. See I. iii. 4, and I. iii. 5.

which produces nothing but capital is only root producing root; bulb issuing in bulb, never in tulip; seed issuing in seed, never in bread. The Political Economy of Europe has hitherto devoted itself wholly to the multiplication, or (less even) the aggregation, of bulbs. It never saw, nor conceived such a thing as a tulip. Nay, boiled bulbs they might have been—glass bulbs—Prince Rupert's drops, consummated in powder (well, if it were glass-powder and not gunpowder), for any end or meaning the economists had in defining the laws of aggregation. We will try and get a clearer notion of them.

The best and simplest general type of capital is a well-made plow-share. Now, if that plow-share did nothing but beget other plow-shares, in a polypous manner—however the great cluster of polypous plow might glitter in the sun, it would have lost its function of capital. It becomes true capital only by another kind of splendor—when it is seen "splendescere sulco," to grow bright in the furrow; rather with diminution of its substance, than addition, by the noble friction. And the true home question, to every capitalist and to every nation, is not, "how many plows have you?" but, "where are your furrows?" not—"how quickly will this capital reproduce itself?"—but, "what will it do during reproduction?" What substance will it furnish, good for life? what work construct, protective of life? if none, its own reproduction is useless—if worse than none—for capital may destroy life as well as support it, its own reproduction is worse than useless; it is merely an advance from Tisiphone, on mortgage, not a profit by any means.

Not a profit, as the ancients truly saw, and showed in the type of Ixion;—for capital is the head, or fountain-head of wealth—the "well-head" of wealth, as the clouds are the well-heads of rain: but when clouds are without water, and only beget clouds, they issue in wrath at last, instead of rain, and in lightning instead of harvest; whence Ixion is said first to have invited his guests to a banquet, and then made them fall into a pit filled with fire; which is the type of the temptation of riches issuing in imprisoned torment—torment in a pit (as also Demas's silver mine), after which, to show the rage of riches passing from lust of pleasure to lust of power, yet power not truly understood, Ixion is said to have desired Juno, and instead, embracing a cloud (or phantasm), to have begotten the Centaurs; the power of mere wealth being, in itself, as the embrace of a shadow—comfortless (so also "Ephraim feedeth on wind and followeth after the east wind;" or "that which is not"—Prov. xxiii. 5; and again Dante's Geryon, the type of avaricious fraud, as he flies, gathers the "air up with retractile claws"—*l' aer a so raccoglie**), but in its offspring, a mingling of the brutal with the human nature: human in sagacity—using both intellect and arrow; but brutal in its body and hoof, for consuming and trampling down. For which sin Ixion is at last bound upon a wheel—fiery and toothed, and rolling perpetually in the air;—the type of human labor when selfish and fruitless (kept far into the Middle Ages in their wheel of fortune); the wheel which has in it no breath or spirit, but is whirled by chance only; whereas of all true work the Ezekiel vision is true, that the Spirit of the living creature is in the wheels, and where the angels go, the wheels go by them; but move no otherwise.

* So also in the vision of the women bearing the ephah, before quoted, "the wind was in their wings," not wings "of a stork," as in our version; but "mliloi," of a kite, in the Vulgate; or perhaps more accurately still in the Septuagint, "hoopoe," a bird connected typically with

This being the real nature of capital, it follows that there are two kinds of true production always going on in an active State; one of seed, and one of food; or production for the Ground, and for the Mouth; both of which are by covetous persons thought to be production only for the granary; whereas the function of the granary is but intermediate and conservative, fulfilled in distribution; else it ends in nothing but mildew, and nourishment of rats and worms. And since production for the ground is only useful with future hope of harvest, all essential production is for the Mouth, and is finally measured by the mouth; hence, as I said above, consumption is the crown of production; and the wealth of a nation is only to be estimated by what it consumes.

The want of any clear sight of this fact is the capital error, issuing in rich interest and revenue of error among the political economists. Their minds are continually set on money-gain, not on mouth-gain; and they fall into every sort of net and snare, dazzled by the coin-glitter as birds by the fowler's glass; or rather (for there is not much else like birds in them), they are like children trying to jump on the heads of their own shadows; the money-gain being only the shadow of the true gain, which is humanity.

The final object of political economy, therefore, is to get good method of consumption, and great quantity of consumption: in other words, to use every thing, and to use it nobly; whether it be substance, service, or service perfecting substance. The most curious error in Mr. Mill's entire work (provided for him originally by Ricardo), is his endeavor to distinguish between direct and indirect service, and consequent assertion that a demand for commodities is not demand for labor (I. v. 9, et seq.). He distinguishes between laborers employed to lay out pleasure grounds, and to manufacture velvet; declaring that it makes material difference to the laboring classes in which of these two ways a capitalist spends his money; because the employment of the gardeners is a demand for labor, but the purchase of velvet is not.* Error colossal as well as strange. It will, indeed, make a difference to the laborer whether we bid him swing his scythe in the spring winds, or drive the loom in pestilential air; but, so far as his pocket is concerned, it makes to him absolutely no difference whether we order him to make green velvet, with seed and a scythe, or red velvet, with silk and scissors. Neither does it any wise concern him whether, when the velvet is made, we consume it by walking on it, or wearing it, so long as our consumption of it is wholly selfish. But if our consumption is to be in any wise unselfish, not only our mode of consuming the articles we require interests him, but also the kind of article we require with a view to consumption. As thus (returning for a moment to Mr. Mill's great hardware theory†): it matters, so far as the laborer's immediate profit is concerned, not an iron filing whether I employ him in growing a peach or forging a bombshell; but my probable mode of consumption of those articles matters seriously. Admit that it is to be in both cases "unselfish," and the difference, to him, is final, whether, when his child is ill, I walk into his cottage and give it the peach, or drop the shell down his chimney and blow his roof off.

The worst of it, for the peasant, is, that the capitalist's consumption of the peach is apt to be selfish, and of the shell, distributive;‡ but, in all

* The value of raw material, which has, indeed, to be deducted from the price of the labor, is not contemplated in the passages referred to, Mr. Mill having fallen into the mistake solely by pursuing the collateral results of the payment of wages to middlemen. He says—"The consumer does not, with his own funds, pay the weaver for his day's work." Pardon me; the consumer of the velvet pays the weaver with his own funds as much as he pays the gardener. He pays, probably, an intermediate ship-owner, velvet merchant, and shopman; pays carriage money, shop rent, damage money, time money, and care money: all these are above and beside the velvet price (just as the wages of a head gardener would be above the grass price); but the velvet is as much produced by the consumer's capital, though he does not pay for it till six months after production, as the grass is produced by his capital, though he does not pay the man who mowed and rolled it on Monday, till Saturday afternoon. I do not know if Mr. Mill's conclusion—"the capital can not be dispensed with, the purchasers can" (p. 98)—has yet been reduced to practice in the City on any large scale.

† Which, observe, is the precise opposite of the one under examination. The hardware theory required us to discharge our gardeners and engage manufacturers; the velvet theory requires us to discharge our manufacturers and engage gardeners.

‡ It is one very awful form of the operation of wealth in Europe that it is entirely capitalists' wealth which supports unjust wars. Just wars do not need so much money to support them: for most of the men who wage such, wage them gratis; but for an unjust war, men's bodies and souls have both to be bought; and the best tools of war for them besides; which makes such war costly to the maximum; not to speak of the cost of base fear, and angry suspicion, between nations which have not grace nor honesty enough in all their multitudes to buy an the power of riches by many traditions, of which that of its petition for a crest of gold is perhaps the most interesting. The "Birds" of Aristophanes, in which its part is principal, are full of them; note especially the "fortification of the air with baked bricks, like Babylon," l. 550; and, again, compare the Plutus of Dante, who (to show the influence of riches in destroying the reason) is the only one of the powers of the Inferno who can not speak intelligibly; and also the cowardliest; he is not merely quelled or restrained, but literally "collapses" at a word; the sudden and helpless operation of mercantile panic being all told in the brief metaphor, "as the sails, swollen with the wind, fall, when the mast breaks."

cases, this is the broad and general fact, that on due catallactic commercial principles, somebody's roof must go off in fulfillment of the bomb's destiny. You may grow for your neighbor, at your liking, grapes or grape-shot; he will also, catallactically, grow grapes or grape-shot for you, and you will each reap what you have sown.

It is, therefore, the manner and issue of consumption which are the real tests of production. Production does not consist in things laboriously made, but in things serviceably consumable; and the question for the nation is not how much labor it employs, but how much life it produces. For as consumption is the end and aim of production, so life is the end and aim of consumption.

I left this question to the reader's thought two months ago, choosing rather that he should work it out for himself than have it sharply stated to him. But now, the ground being sufficiently broken (and the details into which the several questions here opened must lead us being too complex for discussion in the pages of a periodical, so that I must pursue them elsewhere), I desire, in closing the series of introductory papers, to leave this one great fact clearly stated. THERE IS NO WEALTH BUT LIFE. Life, including all its powers of love, of joy, and of admiration. That country is the richest which nourishes the greatest number of noble and happy human beings; that man is richest who, having perfected the functions of his own life to the utmost, has also the widest helpful influence, both personal and, by means of his possessions, over the lives of others.

A strange political economy; the only one, nevertheless, that ever was or can be: all political economy founded on self-interest* being but the fulfillment of that which once brought schism into the policy of angels, and ruin into the economy of heaven.

"The greatest number of human beings noble and happy." But is the nobleness consistent with the number? Yes, not only consistent with it, but essential to it. The maximum of life can only be reached by the maximum of virtue. In this respect the law of human population differs wholly from that of animal life. The multiplication of animals is checked only by want of food, and by the hostility of races; the population of the gnat is restrained by the hour's peace of mind with: as, at present, France and England, purchasing of each other ten millions sterling worth of consternation annually (a remarkably light crop, half thorns and half aspen-leaves—sown, reaped, and granaried by the "science" of the modern political economist, teaching covetousness instead of truth). And all unjust war being supportable, if not by pillage of the enemy, only by loans from capitalists, these loans are repaid by subsequent taxation of the people, who appear to have no will in the matter, the capitalists' will being the primary root of the war; but its real root is the covetousness of the whole nation, rendering it incapable of faith, frankness, or justice, and bringing about, therefore, in due time, his own separate loss and punishment to each person.

hunger of the swallow, and that of the swallow by the scarcity of gnats. Man, considered as an animal, is indeed limited by the same laws: hunger, or plague, or war are the necessary and only restraints upon his increase—effectual restraints hitherto—his principal study having been how most swiftly to destroy himself, or ravage his dwelling-places, and his highest skill directed to give range to the famine, seed to the plague, and sway to the sword. But, considered as other than an animal, his increase is not limited by these laws. It is limited only by the limits of his courage and his love. Both of these have their bounds, and ought to have: his race has its bounds also; but these have not yet been reached, nor will be reached for ages.

In all the ranges of human thought I know none so melancholy as the speculations of political economists on the population question. It is proposed to better the condition of the laborer by giving him higher wages. "Nay," says the economist, "if you raise his wages, he will either people down to the same point of misery at which you found him, or drink your wages away." He will. I know it. Who gave him this will? Suppose it were your own son of whom you spoke, declaring to me that you dared not take him into your firm, nor even give him his just laborer's wages, because if you did he would die of drunkenness, and leave half a score of children to the parish. "Who gave your son these dispositions?" I should inquire. Has he them by inheritance or by education? By one or other they must come; and as in him, so also in the poor. Either these poor are of a race essentially different from ours, and unredeemable (which, however often implied, I have heard none yet openly say), or else by such care as we have ourselves received, we may make them continent and sober as ourselves—wise and dispassionate as we are—models arduous of imitation. But, it is answered, they can not receive education. Why not? That is precisely the point at issue. Charitable persons suppose the worst fault of the rich is to refuse the people meat: and the people cry for their meat, kept back by fraud, to the Lord of Multitudes.*

* James, v. 4. Observe, in these statements I am not taking up, nor countenancing one whit, the common socialist idea of division of property; division of property is its destruction; and with it the destruction of all hope, all industry, and all justice: it is simply chaos—a chaos toward which the believers in modern political economy are fast tending, and from which I am striving to save them. The rich man does not keep back meat from the poor by retaining his riches; but by basely using them. Riches are a form of strength; and a strong man does not injure others by keeping his strength, but by using it injuriously. The socialist, seeing a strong man oppress a weak one, cries out, "Break the strong man's arms;" but I say, "Teach him to use them to better purpose." The fortitude and intelligence which acquire riches are intended, by the Giver of both, not to scatter, nor to give away, but to employ those riches in the service of mankind; in other words, in the redemption of the erring and all of the weak—that is to say, there is first to be the work to gain money; then the Sabbath of use for it—the Sabbath, whose law is, not to lose life, but to save. It is continually the fault or the folly of the poor that they are poor, as

Alas! it is not meat of which the refusal is cruelest, or to which the claim is validest. The life is more than the meat. The rich not only refuse food to the poor; they refuse wisdom; they refuse virtue; they refuse salvation. Ye sheep without shepherd, it is not the pasture that has been shut from you, but the presence. Meat! perhaps your right to that may be pleadable; but other rights have to be pleaded first. Claim your crumbs from the table, if you will; but claim them as children, not as dogs; claim your right to be fed, but claim more loudly your right to be holy, perfect, and pure.

Strange words to be used of working people: "What! holy; without any long robes nor anointing oils; these rough-jacketed, rough-worded persons; set to nameless and dishonored service? Perfect!—these, with dim eyes and cramped limbs, and slowly wakening minds? Pure!—these, with sensual desire and groveling thought; foul of body, and coarse of soul?" It may be so; nevertheless, such as they are, they are the holiest, perfectest, purest persons the earth can at present show. They may be what you have said; but if so, they yet are holier than we, who have left them thus.

But what can be done for them? Who can clothe—who teach—who restrain their multitudes? What end can there be for them at last but to consume one another?

I hope for another end, though not, indeed, from any of the three remedies for over-population commonly suggested by economists.

These three are, in brief—Colonization; Bringing in of waste lands; or Discouragement of Marriage.

The first and second of these expedients merely evade or delay the question. It will, indeed, be long before the world has been all colonized, and its deserts all brought under cultivation. But the radical question is not how much habitable land is in the world, but how many human beings ought to be maintained on a given space of habitable land.

Observe, I say, ought to be, not how many can be. Ricardo, with his usual inaccuracy, defines what he calls the "natural rate of wages" as "that which will maintain the laborer." Maintain him! yes; but how?—the question was instantly thus asked of me by a working girl, to whom I read the passage. I will amplify her question for her. "Maintain him, how?" As, first, to what length of life? Out of a given number of fed persons how many are to be old—how many young; that is to say, will you arrange their maintenance so as to kill them early—say at thirty or thirty-five on the average, it is usually a child's fault if it falls into a pond, and a cripple's weakness that slips at a crossing; nevertheless, most passers-by would pull the child out, or help up the cripple. Put it at the worst, that all the poor of the world are but disobedient children, or careless cripples, and that all rich people are wise and strong, and you will see at once that neither is the socialist right in desiring to make every body poor, powerless, and foolish as he is himself, nor the rich man right in leaving the children in the mire.

including deaths of weakly or ill-fed children?—or so as to enable them to live out a natural life? You will feed a greater number, in the first case,* by rapidity of succession; probably a happier number in the second: which does Mr. Ricardo mean to be their natural state, and to which state belongs the natural rate of wages?

Again: A piece of land which will only support ten idle, ignorant, and improvident persons will support thirty or forty intelligent and industrious ones. Which of these is their natural state, and to which of them belongs the natural rate of wages?

Again: If a piece of land support forty persons in industrious ignorance; and if, tired of this ignorance, they set apart ten of their number to study the properties of cones, and the sizes of stars; the labor of these ten, being withdrawn from the ground, must either tend to the increase of food in some transitional manner, or the persons set apart for sidereal and conic purposes must starve, or some one else starve instead of them. What is, therefore, the natural rate of wages of the scientific persons, and how does this rate relate to, or measure, their reverted or transitional productiveness?

Again: If the ground maintains, at first, forty laborers in a peaceable and pious state of mind, but they become in a few years so quarrelsome and impious that they have to set apart five to meditate upon and settle their disputes—ten, armed to the teeth with costly instruments, to enforce the decisions; and five to remind every body in an eloquent manner of the existence of a God—what will be the result upon the general power of production, and what is the "natural rate of wages" of the meditative, muscular, and oracular laborers?

Leaving these questions to be discussed, or waived, at their pleasure, by Mr. Ricardo's followers, I proceed to state the main facts bearing on that probable future of the laboring classes which has been partially glanced at by Mr. Mill. That chapter and the preceding one differ from the common writing of political economists in admitting some value in the aspect of nature, and expressing regret at the probability of the destruction of natural scenery. But we may spare our anxieties on this head. Men can neither drink steam nor eat stone. The maximum of population on a given space of land implies also the relative maximum of edible vegetable, whether for men or cattle; it implies a maximum of pure air and of pure water. Therefore: a maximum of wood, to transmute the air, and of sloping ground, protected by herbage from the extreme heat of the sun, to feed the streams. All England may, if it so chooses, become one manufacturing town; and Englishmen, sacrificing themselves to the good of general humanity, may live diminished lives in the midst of noise, of darkness, and of deadly exhalation. But the world can not become a factory, nor a mine. No amount of ingenuity will ever make iron digestible by the million, nor substitute hydrogen for wine. Neither the avarice nor the rage of men will ever feed them, and however the apple of Sodom and the grape of Gomorrah may spread their table for a time with dainties of ashes, and nectar of asps—so long as men live by bread, the far away valleys must laugh as they are covered with the gold of God, and the shouts of His happy multitudes ring round the wine-press and the well.

Nor need our more sentimental economists fear the too wide spread of the formalities of a mechanical agriculture. The presence of a wise population implies the search for felicity as well as for food; nor can any population reach its maximum but through that wisdom which "rejoices" in the habitable parts of the earth. The desert has its appointed place and work; the eternal engine, whose beam is the earth's axle, whose beat is its year, and whose breath is its ocean, will still divide imperiously to their desert kingdoms, bound with unfurrowable rock, and swept by unarrested sand, their powers of frost and fire: but the zones and lands between, habitable, will be loveliest in habitation. The desire of the heart is also the light of the eyes. No scene is continually and untiringly loved, but one rich by joyful human labor; smooth in field; fair in garden; full in orchard; trim, sweet, and frequent in homestead; ringing with voices of vivid existence. No air is sweet that is silent; it is only sweet when full of low currents of under sound—triplets of birds, and murmur and chirp of insects, and deep-toned words of men, and wayward trebles of childhood. As the art of life is learned, it will be found at last that all lovely things are also necessary: the wild flower by the wayside, as well as the tended corn; and the wild birds and creatures of the forest, as well as the tended cattle; because man doth not live by bread only, but also by the desert manna; by every wondrous word and unknowable work of God. Happy, in that he knew them not, nor did his fathers know; and that round about him reaches yet into the infinite, the amazement of his existence.

Note, finally, that all effectual advancement toward this true felicity of the human race must be by individual, not public effort. Certain general measures may aid, certain revised laws guide, such advancement; but the measure and law which have first to be determined are those of each man's home. We continually hear it recommended by sagacious people to complaining neighbors (usually less well placed in the world than themselves), that they should "remain content in the station in which Providence has placed them." There are perhaps some circumstances of life in which Providence has no intention that people should be content. Nevertheless, the maxim is on the whole a good one; but it is peculiarly for home use. That your neighbor should, or should not, remain content with his position, is not your business; but it is very much your business to remain content with your own. What is chiefly needed in England at the present day is to show the quantity of pleasure that may be obtained by a consistent, well-administered competence, modest, confessed, and laborious. We need examples of people who, leaving Heaven to decide whether they are to rise in the world, decide for themselves that they will be happy in it, and have resolved to seek—not greater wealth, but simpler pleasure; not higher fortune, but deeper felicity; making the first of possessions, self-possession; and honoring themselves in the harmless pride and calm pursuits of peace.

Of which lowly peace it is written that "justice and peace have kissed each other;" and that the fruit of justice is "sown in peace of them that make peace;" not "peace-makers" in the common understanding—reconcilers of quarrels (though that function also follows on the greater one); but peace-Creators; Givers of Calm. Which you can not give, unless you first gain; nor is this gain one which will follow assuredly on any course of business, commonly so called. No form of gain is less probable, business being (as is shown in the language of all nations—πωλεῖν from πέλω, πρῶσις from περάω, venire, vendre, and venal, from venio, etc.) essentially restless—and probably contentious;—having a raven-like mind to the motion to and fro, as to the carrion food; whereas the olive-feeding and bearing birds look for rest for their feet: thus it is said of Wisdom that she "hath builded her house, and hewn out her seven pillars;" and even when, though apt to wait long at the door-posts, she has to leave her house and go abroad, her paths are peace also.

For us, at all events, her work must begin at the entry of the doors: all true economy is "Law of the house." Strive to make that law strict, simple, generous: waste nothing, and grudge nothing. Care in nowise to make more of money, but care to make much of it; remembering always the great, palpable, inevitable fact—the rule and root of all economy—that what one person has, another can not have; and that every atom of substance, of whatever kind, used or consumed, is so much human life spent; which, if it issue in the saving present life, or gaining more, is well spent, but if not, is either so much life prevented, or so much slain. In all buying, consider, first, what condition of existence you cause in the producers of what you buy; secondly, whether the sum you have paid is just to the producer, and in due proportion, lodged in his hands;* thirdly, to how much clear use, for food, knowledge, or joy, this that you have bought can be put; and fourthly, to whom and in what way it can be most speedily and serviceably distributed: in all dealings whatsoever insisting on entire openness and stern fulfillment; and in all doings, on perfection and loveliness of accomplishment; especially on fineness and purity of all marketable commodity; watching at the same time for all ways of gaining, or teaching, powers of simple pleasure; and of showing "ὅσον ἐν ἀσφοδίλῳ γίγ' ὄνειαρ"—the sum of enjoyment depending not on the quantity of things tasted, but on the vivacity and patience of taste.

And if, on due and honest thought over these things, it seems that the kind of existence to which men are now summoned by every plea of pity and claim of right, may, for some time at least, not be a luxurious one;—consider whether, even supposing it guiltless, luxury would be desired by any of us, if we saw clearly at our sides the suffering which accompanies it in the world. Luxury is indeed possible in the future—innocent and exquisite; luxury for all, and by the help of all; but luxury at present can only be enjoyed by the ignorant; the cruellest man living could not sit at his feast, unless he sat blindfold. Raise the veil boldly; face the light; and if, as yet, the light of the eye can only be through tears, and the light of the body through sackcloth, go thou forth weeping, bearing precious seed, until the time come, and the kingdom, when Christ's gift of bread, and bequest of peace shall be Unto this last as unto thee; and when, for earth's severed multitudes of the wicked and the weary, there shall be holier reconciliation than that of the narrow home, and calm economy, where the Wicked cease—not from trouble, but from troubling—and the Weary are at rest.

A MAN'S REPENTANCE.

HOW still the noon was! Scarcely a shiver thrilled along the maple boughs. There were no clouds in the blue sky. The flowers held up their heads, and gave out their perfume steadily. The birds had hushed their songs. Was all nature waiting for Margaret Vane to die? She had loved tree, and breeze, and flower as a passionate heart, having no true home or kindred, and turning for comfort to the gentle mother earth learns to love them. And they had loved her. The violet had given its blue to her eyes; the rose its flush to her cheeks; the music of the winds whispered in her voice.

It was not strange that Owen Wyndham loved her, too. Nor was it strange that she loved him. She had been all alone till he came. I think he cared for her as well as he knew how, or could. It was not his fault that his nature was not deep and earnest like hers; or that sometimes the very strength and devotion of her affection wearied him. It was her blame, more likely, that she fancied her clay deity marble without flaw, and expected of him more than he could possibly be.

He had been on his good behavior all summer, and, though he honestly loved Margaret and meant to marry her, it was a relief to him to get back to town, in the late autumn, and meet Claire Weston. He only flirted with Claire, but she was a beguiling little sinner, and it came to pass by spring that, without realizing his neglect, he had not written to Margaret for two months. It was an utter surprise to him when her friend, the only friend she had, wrote to him that his betrothed had heard rumors of his approaching marriage to Miss Weston, and that she was dying. Margaret had one of those temperaments which die easily. They have a stronger hold on heaven than on earth. An iron vessel will bear a great deal, but a slight blow shatters a porcelain vase.

Owen Wyndham was as impulsive in good as in evil. He did not think, even, of bidding Claire Weston good-by. He took the first train from New York to Woodstock. He reached there that night. He walked along the common where the tall trees are, and he thought of Margaret until all his love surged back into his heart, fresh and strong and powerful. He had seen her there, under those trees, first. It was a year ago, for now it was June again. He remembered her, with her dark braided hair, her blue dreamy eyes, and the full lips underneath whence the music came. He heard her rich, low voice singing, as she sang then:

"The world buds every year:
But the heart just once, and when
The blossom falls off ere
No new blossom comes again.
Ah, the rose goes with the wind:
But the thorns remain behind."

He loved her again, as he had loved her then, and he hurried on toward the cottage where she lived. He forgot that the letter had said she was dying. He remembered only her beauty and her youth, and that she was his promised wife. He almost wondered that she did not meet him on his way.

He went in, and the sound of her voice guided him to where she lay. Her friend was by her side, but she rose and went out when he came in, and he stood alone before Margaret. Now, indeed, where were the cheeks' rose and the mouth's crimson? Did Margaret's well-remembered voice come from those thin, white lips? But for that voice I think he would not have known her. She was not expecting him. She did not know that her friend had written him, but she manifested no surprise at his appearance. One so near heaven can take what is left of earth calmly. She put out her thin hand to welcome him, but it was so white and transparent it moved him to tears, and he could not speak.

"Do not weep, Owen. It has all been for the best. I think you love me still, or you would not have come to be with me when I die."

"Love you, oh Margaret!"

He sank on his knees beside her. He burst into passionate protestations that he never had and never could love any other. He cried out wildly that she must not talk of death, she should not die, she would live, to be his own, his blessing, his wife.

She put out her hand and stopped him, with a motion in which was no impatience, only an authority which he could not resist.

"I shall not live. Do not deceive yourself. My longings for life are all past. I should never have made you or myself happy. Life with me was too real and solemn. You are different, and I do not blame you. Your temperament is the happier. Even if you had ceased to love me I should never have complained. We can not command our impulses, and duty is but an iron fetter where love is wanting. I am glad you have come. You were the magician who awakened my heart from its sleep. I shall like to hold your hand while I am dying, to know that for a time you will mourn for me deeply and truly."

"Forever, Margaret! Would that I might die too. But while I live I shall mourn for you. It will not be long. My heart is breaking."

Margaret smiled. It was a sad smile with no mirth in it. She looked at him with a calm superiority in her eyes.

"For a time you will mourn me, Owen. Then you will be consoled, and I would have it so. Only, whenever you think of me, always remember that my love was no fiction. I would have died to shield you from one agony."

He sat beside her all that night. He could not sleep, remorse was too busy. Margaret slept tranquilly for several hours, and awoke only when the dawn-rays came in at the eastern window.

"I must see the sun rise," she said, calmly; "the sun of my last day on earth."

As the full light streamed over the ghastliness of her wan face Owen saw, as he had not seen before, that there was no hope—not even for a few weeks or days. They were not alone—Death made a third beside them. He sank on his knees, and cried out, shudderingly,

"I have killed you—I know it, Margaret. You will never forgive me on earth or in heaven."

She drew herself along toward him. Her thin, weak arm dropped around his neck, and she kissed him. It was the first time since he had come back.

"I do forgive you, Owen, if you think you have any need to be forgiven. I have never loved any one else. I shall die loving you."

They were together all the long hours of that forenoon. Sometimes Margaret's friend was with them, sometimes they were alone. I think that in those hours Owen Wyndham learned more of Margaret Vane than he had ever known before. He felt then that he could never have satisfied her heart. The thick veil of his self-conceit was parted for the time, and he knew that his nature was too shallow to mate with the strength of hers. Perhaps she felt this too, and this was why she was so glad to die.

Time went on. Death waited. The noon was still. Did Margaret hear some voice inaudible to the ears that listened beside her? She only said,

"It is time. I am going now."

Her friend—the one friend who had never failed or forsaken her—knelt silently by her bed; but holding her hands and covering them with frantic kisses, Owen Wyndham cried passionately, trying to snatch her back from death,

"Do not go! Live, live for me, or take me with you, my Margaret! Would I could die for you!"

Die for her! But for him she might have counted, perhaps, her three-score years. She was an angel. There was no scorn in the smile which answered him, no reproach in the clear voice, clear and musical still.

"It is best, dearest. God knows all, and I can trust."

She turned her face toward him. Her last breath passed with her parting kiss.

Owen Wyndham mourned her truly, but his was not a nature to mourn forever. He deceived himself. Claire Weston is his wife to-day, and the mother of his children, but he has never forgotten Margaret.

It is a day in June—he remembers the date but too well. He does not hear his wife's words or his children's laughter. He sees Woodstock Common, and the green trees waving their boughs between him and the blue sky—he hears a young girl, with dark, braided hair and eyes of dreamy blue, sing to a pensive tune,

"The world buds every year;
But the heart just once, and when
The blossom falls off ere
No new blossom comes again."

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

THE Presidential election took place on Tuesday, November 6. The polls closed at sunset; by midnight the electoral votes had been counted, and telegraphic dispatches received from almost every section of the Union except the Pacific States, which placed the general result beyond question. All the Free States, with the exception of New Jersey, and probably California and Oregon, cast their votes for Lincoln and Hamlin. These States cast 169 electoral votes; and the whole number being 303, of which 152 are required for a majority, the Republican candidates have 17 more than a majority, leaving 134 votes to be divided among all their competitors. The vote in some of the remaining States is yet doubtful; but it will be interesting to compare the indications furnished in less than seven hours, from points more than 3000 miles apart, with the actual result, as shown by the official count.—Missouri, and probably California and Oregon, having 16 electors, vote for Mr. Douglas; New Jersey, Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Tennessee, and Virginia, having 57 electors, probably vote for Mr. Bell; the remaining States, nine in number, having 61 electors, undoubtedly vote for Mr. Breckinridge, who, it is possible, has also received the votes of a part of the States given above to Mr. Bell.

This result was clearly foreshadowed by the October elections in the North. Thus, in Pennsylvania, Mr. Curtin, the Republican candidate for Governor, received a majority of 32,000; in Indiana Mr. Lane's majority was 15,000; and in Ohio at least 13,000. These votes indicated the almost inevitable result in New York, which would decide the question, the vote in New England and the Northwestern States being beyond doubt. The Republican majorities obtained at the State elections have been nearly doubled at the Presidential elections; while in the extreme South the majorities for Mr. Breckinridge are equally decided. The States which vote for Mr. Bell give comparatively slight majorities.

The probability of the election of a Republican President occasioned great excitement at the South. The press, with few exceptions, and many prominent statesmen and politicians advocate immediate and unconditional secession, in such an event. As a specimen of what has appeared to be the prevailing sentiment on this subject, we condense the following from speeches and letters of prominent men: Hon. J. W. Orr would counsel no hasty action on the part of the State of South Carolina. He thought that it would not be prudent for the Legislature to call a Convention of the people, as soon as the election of Mr. Lincoln was ascertained. He thought the wiser course would be to appoint Commissioners to consult with the other Southern States. These States should meet in Conference to ascertain the course they intended to pursue, and secure harmony of action.—Governor Moore, of Louisiana, in reply to a note asking his opinion as to the proper course to be pursued, would not commit himself to any extreme measure, but considered that the success of Mr. Lincoln would justify the Southern States in withdrawing from the Union. He was in favor of a Conference of the Southern States.—Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, says that should Breckinridge get the entire South, and Lincoln the entire North, he fears that no earthly power can prevent civil war; but if those whose folly or wickedness have brought it about should not be sustained at the South, in favor of their secession movements, they may pause before pushing their secession movements to extremes.—The foregoing may be considered as types of the views of the more conservative portion of Southern leaders. Plans for immediate and unconditional secession and the seizure of the public establishments, immediately upon the receipt of intelligence of the election of Mr. Lincoln, have been formally announced, though they have not received the sanction of men of decided position and influence. Thus far, the only definite action, having any official importance, is a resolution of the Legislature of Alabama instructing the Governor of that State to call a Convention immediately upon the election of a Republican President, and the course of the Legislature of South Carolina. This body having been convened by the Governor to choose Presidential electors, and to take such other measures as might be required, was in session when it became evident that electors had been chosen who would choose Mr. Lincoln by a clear majority. Governor Gist presented a Message recommending that the Legislature should remain in permanent session, and take action to prepare the State for the crisis. Personally he considered secession the only remedy, and thought that such a step on the part of South Carolina would be followed by the entire South. He recommended military reorganization, every able-bodied citizen to be furnished with the most approved fire-arms, and ten thousand volunteers to be in readiness at the shortest notice. The Legislature adopted resolutions indorsing the views of the Governor.—Governor Brown, of Georgia, sent a special Message to the Legislature, opposing secession, and advising that delegates should not be appointed to the proposed Southern Convention. He recommends that reprisals be made upon those States which have passed laws infringing upon the rights of the South, by seizing the property of their citizens to indemnify those of Georgia for any losses which they have sustained. He advises the enactment of a law imposing a tax of 25 per cent. upon goods manufactured in or brought from certain specified States, to be remitted when their unfriendly legislation is repealed; such action, he says, will destroy sectional controversy, by narrowing the issue to a contest between individual States. He also recommends the immediate appropriation of a million of dollars for the purpose of putting the State in a defensive position.

The steamer Connaught, of the line from Galway to Boston, was lost on the 7th of October. She had left Newfoundland on the 5th, and when within 140 miles of Boston was found to have sprung a leak in the engine-room. In a few hours the leak had gained so far as to extinguish the fires in the furnaces, and at half-past nine in the morning it was found that the ship was on fire. The boats were got ready to save the passengers, the sea running so heavily that the first was stove in. At noon the little brig Minnie Schaffler, of New Orleans, Captain Wilson, came in sight, and bore down upon the burning steamer. It was seven o'clock before the task of embarking the passengers was begun; at this time the starboard side of the steamer was hot from the flames. At dark only two hundred, out of more than three hundred on board the steamer, had been placed on board the brig, and several of the boats' crews refused to return for more. Captain Wilson persevered, took a hawser from the brig to the steamer, and succeeded in saving the whole number of passengers, who were placed on board his vessel by eleven o'clock at night. The steamer was lost. But to reward Captain Wilson for his gallant service in saving some hundreds of lives, a public subscription was opened, and some thousands of dollars were inscribed upon the lists.

The American tour of the Prince of Wales has closed. He reached New York on the 11th of October; he was welcomed by a grand military and civic display. On the following evening he attended a grand ball given in his honor by a Committee of 400 prominent citizens, each of whom contributed $100 to defray the expense. On the evening of the 13th a torch-light procession of firemen paraded in his honor. On Monday, the 15th, he visited the Military Academy at West Point, thence proceeded to Albany, where he was entertained by the Governor of the State. From Albany he went to Boston, where he was welcomed by a procession and a ball. He then traveled to Portland, where he arrived on Saturday, October 20. After a brief interview with the city officials he proceeded on board the vessel which was awaiting him, and set out on his homeward voyage.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

From Mexico we learn that after various alternations of defeat and success, the balance appears to incline decisively in favor of the Liberals, who have captured Guadalajara, one of the three strong places hitherto held by the Church party, of which Miramon is the leader.—The revolutionary movements in New Granada, which have been in progress for some months, appear to be checked. At the latest dates the regular government seems to be regaining its ascendancy.—In Costa Rica President Mora, who was displaced and banished nearly two years ago, made a descent upon the country. He was defeated, made prisoner, and shot, in company with some of his prominent adherents.

EUROPE.

We have space, in this Record, to furnish only a brief outline of the affairs of Italy, in which at present is centred the chief interest of European intelligence.—The difference of views between Garibaldi and Cavour appears to have been adjusted, and both are willing to labor together for the formation of a united Kingdom of Italy. Several important engagements have taken place between the Piedmontese and Neapolitan troops, in which success was in favor of the former. The most important of these took place on the 1st of October, at Volturno. The Neapolitans, 30,000 strong, attacked the Piedmontese, under the cover of a thick mist, and succeeded in driving them back. Garibaldi pressed on in person, and after a fight which lasted eight hours, the Neapolitans were routed with severe loss. The King of Naples and his brothers were present at this battle. Capua, where the Neapolitans have intrenched themselves, is expected to be soon abandoned by them. The question of the annexation of the Two Sicilies to Piedmont has been submitted to a popular vote, and the result has been almost unanimously in favor of annexation. The question with respect to the Papal States seems to be in abeyance, depending upon the action of the European Powers. The Russian, Spanish, and Portuguese Ministers have been withdrawn from Turin, indicating the disapproval of these Governments of the course of King Victor Emanuel. The withdrawal of the Russian Minister was accompanied by a sharp note censuring the policy of Piedmont. The Prussian Government, in consequence of a communication from Count Cavour, apparently inviting an expression of opinion, addressed to him a note complaining of the whole policy of his Government in relation to Italian affairs.—A meeting has been held at Warsaw between the Emperors of Russia and Austria and the Prince Regent of Prussia. It is presumed that the main object of this conference was to decide upon the affairs of Europe. The conference was adjourned, ostensibly on account of the illness of the Empress Dowager of Russia. If any political action was taken it has not been made public.—The views of the French Emperor, which are of more consequence than all others, are still unexplained. He has strongly reinforced the French garrison at Rome, as if with the design of protecting the Pope from the attack of Piedmont; and yet he fails to discountenance the invasion of the States of the Church. A semi-official article in the Paris Constitutionnel indicates what appears to be the Imperial sentiment. It says that "an organized and powerful Italy is henceforth for the interest of Europe." Yet in an official document the Emperor says that no one deplored more than himself the course taken by Sardinia; but, under actual circumstances, the use of force, instead of diminishing the evil, would aggravate it, by plunging Italy into a struggle from which a general war might arise. Among the reports with which we are furnished by our European files we note the following, the correctness of which will be tested by the intelligence of the ensuing weeks: That the Emperor Napoleon had received an autograph letter from the Czar of Russia explaining the intent of the meeting at Warsaw, and declaring that it had no design hostile to France; and that Russia would enter into no alliance with Austria which might lead to war; that Austria had declared that she would not have recourse to arms unless an attack was made upon Rome, and had proposed an understanding with France for the definite arrangement of the Italian question; and that the British fleet were about to proceed to Gaeta to protect the King of Naples in his meditated flight from that place.—Austria is said to be largely increasing her military forces in Italy, apprehending that the next movement of the united Italians will be directed against her province of Venetia.

THE EAST.

From Syria it is reported that the massacres had recommenced, and that the Mussulmans were furious against the Christians, threatening the lives of the foreign consuls.—The war in China has opened. The allied forces of France and Great Britain reached the mouth of the Pei-ho on the 1st of August, and established camps. On the 12th of that month a skirmish took place, when the Chinese troops fled in disorder. An attack on the Taku forts, where the British suffered so severely last year, was on the point of being made.

Literary Notices.

Life and Correspondence of John A. Quitman, by J. F. H. CLAIBORNE. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The brilliant career of the distinguished statesman and soldier of the Southwest is here depicted by a writer whose almost life-long friendship with the subject, cemented by warm personal and political sympathies, has enabled him to engage in the task with a glow of enthusiasm that lends a constant animation and interest to the narrative. General Quitman was a remarkable instance of devotion to the welfare and glory of his adopted State, although his birth and education had been received in a distant and colder clime. He was a native of Rhinebeck, on the Hudson River, where his father for many years was an eminent clergyman of the Lutheran Church, having emigrated to America from Prussia at an early age. Young Quitman, who was born September 1, 1798, was distinguished in his boyhood for the love of enterprise and adventure, which formed a prominent feature in his character in after-life. When not at school, he was always at some athletic sport, or engaged in some mechanical device with the knife and saw. He was, by the unanimous consent of the family, the general lock-maker about the house; he constructed the furniture of his own room; and among other products of his skill, made a violin, which, though not a Cremona, was pronounced by amateurs a highly respectable instrument. His taste for out-door life led him much into the woods; and, fond of exploring the various localities of the neighborhood, he collected, while yet a boy, an extensive cabinet of birds, reptiles, and insects. After receiving his early education, for the most part under the direction of his excellent father in his own house, he engaged for a year or two in the business of teaching, previous to commencing the study of law. With his spirit of enterprise, he was not likely to remain long in the rural districts of the State of New York. At the age of twenty-one, accordingly, we find him, with gun in hand and knapsack on back, tramping over the Alleghenies, to seek his fortune in what was then the distant West. He arrived at Chillicothe in the fall of 1819, and at once became a student in the office of a prominent lawyer in that place, whose acquaintance he had accidentally made while traveling in a stage-coach. On the completion of his legal studies, and in accordance with a long-cherished purpose, he directed his steps toward the South, and at the close of 1821 took up his residence in Natchez, thus becoming a citizen of Mississippi—a State in which he was destined to play a conspicuous part, and with which from that time he identified the favorite aspirations and purposes of his life.

Immediately after his admission to the bar he was brought into close relations with the most prominent business and professional men from all parts of the State, and rapidly sprang into notice as a young man of high character and splendid promise. In 1824 he married a lady from a wealthy family of Virginia, by which he came into possession of a large fortune. He soon engaged in the contests of political life, and in 1827 was a candidate for the Legislature, as representative of the city of Natchez and the county of Adams. His competitor was Colonel Adam Bingaman, a native of the county, and a man of great personal popularity and influence, as well as of superior talents. The canvass was an exciting one, and the ambitious young lawyer engaged in it with characteristic energy and zeal. During its progress an incident occurred which presents a curious illustration of the "genius of the place." Just before the election there was a large gathering of the free and independent voters, at a famous place of resort, called Hering's Store, near the extreme limit of the county. Quitman made his appearance among the crowd in his usual neat dress, but soon threw off his coat, and astonished the spectators by his feats in wrestling, leaping, and boxing. A foot-race was got up, in which he beat the swiftest runners on the ground. On a trial of lifting heavy weights at arm's-length, the strongest man present was forced to yield to his superior prowess. A shooting-match was the next thing in order, and a fat ox, the prize of the day, was driven up, and the target fixed at the distance of sixty yards. Among the expert riflemen eager for a venture, was the noted John Hawkins, the crack shot of the whole country round. No one would shoot against him and "Brown Bess," as he called his favorite rifle, without the odds. The crowd were struck with amazement when Quitman offered to take an even chance. Every body else retired from the contest. The blood of the old marksman was up, and he shot more deliberately than usual. Three times they tried their skill, and three times the veteran was beaten. This was a new experience on his part, and he was at a loss how to bear it. He seemed perfectly thunder-struck, and pierced with grief and anger. At length his admiration got the better of his wrath; he stepped up to Quitman, and, taking off his hat, said, "Sir, you have done what no other man has been able to do. The beef is yours, and John Hawkins is yours too." Quitman took his hand, praised his shooting, caressed Brown Bess, presented him the beef, and proposed a general treat. The crowd chimed in with three cheers for Quitman. From that moment the contest was decided, and he was chosen by a large majority.

His career henceforward was one of distinguished success. He was successively chosen Chancellor of the State, President of the Senate, Major-General of the Militia, and to other responsible offices of a more private character, in all of which he enhanced his reputation for rigid integrity of character, untiring energy of purpose, uncommon practical sense, and great executive ability. On the breaking out of the Mexican war he at once tendered his services to the President, and in the month of June, 1846, was appointed a Brigadier-General of volunteers. From that time until his decease, in 1858, he occupied a prominent position before the whole country, and his career during that period forms an important chapter in the history of the United States.

According to the portraiture which his biographer has drawn in lively colors, General Quitman was remarkable for his earnestness, constancy, and integrity, and the boldness of his views, rather than for brilliant and imposing talents. He studied the future more than the lessons of antiquity, and the actual present more than either. He had no worship of the ideal, but was devoted to liberty, as a practical inheritance or a boon won from tyrants by the sword, and secured by charters and muniments. His notion of freedom was freedom defined and regulated by law, and the rigid enforcement of law as applied to persons, property, and government. His politics were based on the covenants of the Constitution, and he acted with the party that, in his view, adhered most closely to them. Hence he classed himself not as a Whig nor as a Democrat, but as a State-rights man. He was ambitious of political distinction and military fame. He had a natural taste for the pomp and clash of arms. His courage amounted to indifference to danger; in the thickest of the fight he was as calm and cheerful as though merely on parade; and heroism in battle sat upon him as gracefully as gentleness and goodness in private life. He was ever faithful to his promises, true to his friends, firm and unshrinking in the discharge of duty, stooping to no artifice, and even in war preferring assault to strategy. In the family circle he was cordial and affectionate, playful in his manners, and a lover of cheerful conversation. He was a favorite in general society; in early life he was a model of manly beauty, but during the war his fair complexion was bronzed, his features became more rigid and austere, his mustache grim and grizzled; and he looked, when motionless and in thought, like the effigy of a warrior mossed and weather-beaten by the storms of sixty winters. The memoir now published is ample in its details, graphic in description, and earnest in tone. It is a valuable accession to American biography, both as an interesting narrative of the career of its subject, and a lucid exposition of the political system of which he was a prominent representative.

The Adventures of James Capen Adams, Mountaineer and Grizzly Bear Hunter, of California, by THEODORE H. HITTELL. (Published by Crosby, Nichols, Lee, and Co.) The wonderful exploits of a famous bear-hunter among the mountains of Oregon and California form the subject of this entertaining volume. "Old Adams," as he was familiarly called, seems to have been a sort of natural

Leather Stocking, with an inborn taste for the forest and its inhabitants, preferring the companionship of savages and wild animals to the society of civilized men, and full of enterprise and ingenious resource in the pursuit of his favorite occupation. It seems that the veteran of the woods has baited his last trap, fired his last shot, and captured his last bear—his death from an old wound received in his perilous conflicts having been recently announced in the papers of the day. This mighty hunter was a native of Massachusetts, having been born in the rural town of Medway, about fifty-three years ago. He early showed a distaste for plodding in the beaten track of regular industry, and, as soon as he became of age, threw aside the lap-stone and pegging awl—for he had been apprenticed to the trade of shoemaking—and hired himself to a company of showmen as a collector of wild beasts. In this capacity he explored the forests of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, captured a host of panthers, wolves, wild-cats, foxes, and other animals, and thus laid the foundation for the knowledge and love of woodcraft in which he has since acquired such signal distinction. A temporary stop was put to his career, soon after its commencement, by an unlucky incident, which had nearly proved fatal to the young adventurer. Attempting to tame down a royal Bengal tiger, in the menagerie with which he was connected, the ferocious beast struck him to the floor of the cage, which Adams had entered for the purpose of giving him a lesson of good manners, and buried his teeth and claws in the flesh of his victim. He was taken out almost dead from the wounds; and when, after a tedious lapse of time, he finally recovered, his constitution was so shattered that for many years his hunting was at an end. Quietly returning to the shoemaker's bench, he worked at the trade for some fifteen years, and at the end of that time found himself in possession of a snug little property, amounting to some six or eight thousand dollars. With this sum his Yankee blood tempted him to engage in speculation, and venturing the whole in a cargo of boots and shoes for the St. Louis market, he lost every thing by a great fire in that city, and in one short night became a ruined man. This event took place soon after the discovery of gold in California; and sharing in the excitement which prevailed over the whole country, he made his way to the land of promise in the fall of 1849. Here, in the first instance, he turned his hand to almost every thing—sometimes mining, sometimes trading, sometimes farming and raising stock, and rich and poor alternately. At one time he was the owner of immense herds of cattle, worth thousands of dollars, most of which were stolen from him in a single night. Then he had large mining claims, which promised untold amounts of wealth; soon after, valuable lands, which he lost partly by his own reckless speculations, partly by the villainy of others; until, within the space of three years, he failed as many times, and from the heights of prosperity was plunged into the depths of pecuniary trouble. At length, in the fall of 1852, disgusted with the world and dissatisfied with himself, he gave up all his schemes for the accumulation of wealth, turned his back upon the charms of civilized life, and taking the road toward the wildest parts of the Sierra Nevada, resolved to make his home among the fierce animals of the wilderness. The volume before us is devoted to an account of his adventures in this new mode of life, and, apparently prepared for the press by the hands of a friend, forms an exciting and a truly instructive narrative. Although it relates so many astounding stories, it has a certain air of credibility, which is confirmed by what is known of the subject since his return to civilization. The trophies he brought with him were proofs of his veracity, and the appearance of the man was in keeping with his narrations. The wish with which he closes the volume was doomed to be disappointed. "As I come to the end of my book," says he, "I can not but reflect that my life likewise approaches its close. I have looked on death in many forms, and trust that I can meet it, whenever it comes, with a stout heart and steady nerves. If I could choose, I would wish, since it was my destiny to become a mountaineer and grizzly bear hunter of California, to finish my career in the Sierra Nevada. There would I fain lie down with the Lady, Ben, and Rambler at my side; there, surely, I could find rest through the long future, among the eternal rocks and evergreen pines."

Odd People: being a Popular Description of Singular Races of Men, by Captain MAYNE REID. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) If one is in pursuit of human oddities he need not leave this country, or even go far from this famous city, to discover a variety of specimens sufficiently striking to gratify the most eager curiosity. Captain Mayne Reid, however, sets out upon his travels, and penetrates into "deserts vast and antres wild" in the hunt for queer, out-of-the-way races of men, which vocation he seems to prefer to that of Nimrod and Gordon Cumming, whose taste was more decidedly in the line of the four-footed wonders of creation. He has certainly succeeded in bringing to light several odd enough patterns of humanity, and furnishing fresh proof of the old adage that "it takes all sorts of people to make the world." Here, for instance, we have the Bosjesmen, or, to adopt the easier name, the Bushmen of Africa—little yellow savages, who range at large over the southern portion of that continent. But in spite of this locality, the Bushmen, be it known, are not Hottentots. To be sure, they have certain points of resemblance with each other. They look enough alike to be cousins, but not brothers and sisters. Both are woolly-haired. Both have a Chinese cast of features, especially in the form and expression of the eye. Their color, too, is nearly the same; but, on the other hand, the Hottentots are larger than the Bushmen. The Bushman is the smallest man known in history. He stands only about four feet six upon his naked soles, and his wife is of a still more diminutive stature, often not exceeding three feet nine, though crowned with the honors of maternity. His other proportions are in keeping with his height. When young, he is sometimes a pretty stout boy; but at the age of sixteen he begins to lose the little manhood he had attained, and, instead of advancing, rather grows backward. His flesh disappears, his body takes a meagre outline, his arms and limbs grow thin, he loses the calf of his legs and the plumpness of his cheeks. As he becomes older, his skin grows dry and scaly, his bones stick out in all directions, and his legs and arms look like straight sticks, with prominent horny knobs in place of joints. His complexion is naturally a shade of yellow brown, but it appears darker than it is from the grease and filth which he wipes off his fingers on his skin instead of a towel. His hair is short, crisp, and curly, very scant in quantity, and he has no beard at all. His nose is low-bridged, with wide, flattened nostrils; his eye is a mere slit between the eyelids; his cheek-bones are high, his forehead small and receding; but he has a set of fine white teeth, which do not decay as he grows old, but are worn down to stumps like those of cows and sheep.

Though, as has been seen, the Bushman is no beauty, his frame is wiry and capable of great endurance, and he has the agility of an antelope. Nor is he quite destitute of claims to intellect. He has a quick, cheerful mind, always on the alert, and often not a little skill in the manufacture of his weapons and other implements and utensils. His character for courage is not so bad as it might be. Small as he is, he is full of pluck, and when brought to bay fights to the death, discharging his poisoned arrows as long as he can bend a bow.

The costume of the Bushman is of the most primitive character, differing little from that of our first parents after the fall. Instead of the fig-leaf, the men wear a little apron of jackal skin, and the women a sort of fringed or bunch of leather thongs, suspended around the waist by a strap, and hanging down to the knees. Their feet are protected from the sharp stones by a kind of rude sandal; and an attempt at ornament is displayed in a leathern skull-cap, or, more commonly, a circlet around the head, upon which are sewed a number of small shells. Other decorations consist of old brass or copper buttons attached to the little curls of woolly hair; and, among the women, beads of small pieces of ostrich egg-shells, besides a profusion of leathern bracelets on the arms and limbs, often reaching from the knee to the ankle-joint. Red ochre is the fashionable cosmetic. A perfume is obtained from the powdered leaves of a species of diosma.

The domicile of these people is no less primitive than their dress. If the Bushman can find a cleft or cave in the rocks large enough to hold his own body and those of his family he will never build a house. If nothing of this kind can be found in his neighborhood, he chooses a bush that grows near to two or three others, the branches of all meeting in a common centre. These he fastens together at the ends, and wattles some into the others. Over this frame-work a quantity of grass is scattered, so as to shed the rain; a large hole is scraped out in the middle of the floor, wide enough to hold the bodies of three or four persons of about his size, and into this is thrown another parcel of dry grass, so as to form what looks like a gigantic nest. Here the whole family find a bed, sleeping all together in it, coiled like so many monkeys, and covered with their skin karosses.

The Bushman procures his food chiefly by the chase. The desolate region in which he lives is shared also by the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus, the quagga, the zebra, and several species of antelope. In the capture of these animals he displays no little dexterity and cunning. The pit-trap is one of his favorite contrivances. Poisoned arrows become a formidable weapon in his hands. These are mere reeds tipped with pieces of bone, with a split ostrich quill lapped behind the head, and answering for a barb. The poison is obtained from various kinds of vegetables with whose properties he has a familiar acquaintance, and from the fluid found in the fangs of venomous serpents. This he works up into a deadly ointment, making the poison of different degrees of potency, according to the purpose for which it is designed. He also makes an occasional raid into the settlements, and succeeds in carrying off a herd of cattle into his desert fastness. A time of high wassail ensues. Not one ox alone is slaughtered for the feast, but a score of them all at once. They kill them from sheer wantonness, and no longer eat, but raven on the flesh. The feasting is kept up without interruption until all are finished; even if the flesh has begun to taint it is all the same. The kraal exhibits an altered spectacle; the starved, meagre wretches, who were lately seen flitting about the tents, now present a plump, and almost portly appearance. When every ox has been eaten the scene changes. A complete reaction comes over the spirit of the Bushman. He falls into a state of languor, and often sleeps for twenty-four hours at a stretch. It is not until he is compelled by fear of starvation to bestir himself that he recovers a little of his energy, and once more takes to hunting, or, if near a stream, endeavors to catch a few fish. When other resources fail, he attacks the nests of white ants, and fills his bag with the eggs, the insects themselves, and perhaps large quantities of their larvæ. Another source of supply is found in the various bulbous roots which grow in the desert. Ostrich eggs furnish him with many a meal, with an occasional relish of lizards or land-tortoises. His time of greatest plenty, however, is when the locusts appear, and as long as these insects remain with him he knows no hunger, and grows fat.

The Bushmen have no form of religious worship nor marriage ceremony, though they appear to pay some respect to the memory of the dead, usually erecting a large pile of stones over the body. They are not without a love of amusement, and come forth at night from their caves and dens to chatter and make merry with each other. During fine moonlight they dance all night, and don't go home till morning. They have no government—not even that of a headman, or chief, or of the father of a family. They are without tribal organization, living in little communities of about a hundred persons, since, from the nature of their country, a large number could not find subsistence in any one place. Missionary efforts made among them have all proved without effect.

Other examples of strange forms of humanity are found by Captain Reid among the Indian tribes of North and South America, the Turcomans, the Tongans, the Laplanders, and others, from almost every portion of the habitable globe. He writes in an easy, familiar style, and has produced narratives of remarkable interest, not only to the young, for whom they were primarily intended, but for readers of every degree of intelligence and culture.

The Kangaroo Hunters; or, Adventures in the Bush, by ANNE BOWMAN. (Published by Crosby, Nichols, Lee, and Co.) An agreeable narrative of fictitious adventure is here wrought out from the experience of Australian life. It contains no incidents which startle our sense of probability; and from the information which it imparts, no less than from its lively and attractive style, is well adapted to prove a favorite with youthful readers.

Curiosities of Natural History, by FRANCIS T. BUCKLAND. (Published by Rudd and Carleton.) Our literary record this month, consisting chiefly of books describing strange varieties of man and beast, is appropriately closed with the announcement of a new series of the entertaining papers by Mr. Buckland, which, on their first appearance, excited so much popular and scientific interest. The present volume is full of lively descriptions of the habits and instincts of several of the more familiar members of the animal kingdom.

OUR AMERICAN DIGNITY.—It must be confessed that our dignity has lately been put to a test wholly unprecedented, and being called to play the part of host to a prince of the blood—to no less a person than the eldest son of Victoria and the heir of the English throne—we find ourselves earnestly feeling our pulse, and looking at ourselves in the glass, to learn how we have borne the ordeal, and how well we stand in our own opinion as well as in that of our royal guest and his noble attendants. If our anticipations were any criterion of the result we surely need have nothing to fear; for we were very eager to have the Prince come among us, and we had none of the misgivings that are so common among housekeepers who count their silver spoons and tea-cups, and examine their carpets and curtains, when stylish company is expected, not a little doubtful of the adequacy of the supply to the demand, or of the entertainment to the expectation. We felt that we had something to show the young man well worth his seeing; and the anxiety as to our suitable appearance, was either an after-thought of our national pride or the tremor of a nervous caste of exclusives. Our great body of industrious, well-taught, self-relying people took it for granted that the country that God made for us is good enough to receive any body upon its soil, and that they were good enough to welcome any body on earth to its free range and hearty hospitality. They might have some doubt as to their knowledge of court etiquette, and as to the interest that royalty and nobility might take in our republican ways; but they never doubted that all difficulties would in some way be overcome, and that host and guest would have a good time, and be glad that they had been brought together.

If any thing has especially surprised us in our reception of the Prince, it has not been from any strange jealousy or democratic coldness on our part, but from the spontaneous and hearty enthusiasm that has taken possession of us, in spite of ourselves, and made us act as if we were the most loyal people on the face of the earth, and had learned loyal manners in the atmosphere of courts. Yet if we look into the spirit of the most enthusiastic of the popular demonstrations, we shall find that the loyal outburst of welcomes had not a particle of sycophancy in its composition, but was rather the most satisfactory proof of republican independence. Our people felt strong enough in themselves, and in their institutions to afford to be hospitable; and the crowds of well-dressed, well-behaved persons in our streets, who cheered the passing guest with such right good-will, evidently had no fear of him and his kingdom, nor sought any favors of him. They neither wished to engage his hand for a dance, nor to have his name in their albums, nor expected him to buy goods at their counters, nor make presents to their sons and daughters. They thought well of Victoria as a woman and a mother, well of England as a nation, and wished well to the Prince of Wales. Their presence and cheers were not merely the result of curiosity and excitement, but of hearty good-will; and never on earth, we believe, has such a hearty "God bless you!" been given to an utter stranger by voices so many and so free. By certain persons, and in certain circles, some things were said and done, as we shall see in the course of this article, that had better have been otherwise; but our people have borne themselves well, and their conduct enables us to name our subject with satisfaction, and with cheerful hopes to treat of our American Dignity.

We, perhaps, feel our importance sufficiently as a nation, yet we have not as clear an idea as we ought to have of its essential grounds; and, moreover, when we sometimes find ourselves most stoutly vindicating ourselves from assault, we betray a sensitiveness that implies suspicion of defect more than consciousness of strength. The spread-eagle style, which has become so proverbial, is not the tone of conscious power; and the noble bird that we have chosen for our symbol shows more majesty by folding his wings in repose than in forever stretching them in weary flight. We are by no means disposed to claim perfection for our people or our institutions, yet we are convinced that a little candid reflection, alike upon our good points and our deficiencies, may put us in the way to win a better self-respect. Our words will not be in vain if they may hit some prevailing follies while they set forth some comforting truths.

One cheering sign of the rise of a truer dignity in our people is the rapid disappearance of the preposterous vanity that claimed for us a wholly independent origin, and almost self-existent being, without our owing any thing to any antecedents. The staple boast of our Fourth of July orators used to be that a magical piece of paper, called the Declaration of Independence, made us a nation in a day, and cut us wholly off from the old stock of European civilization on which we grew. It seemed to be supposed that this document made the nation, instead of the nation making the document; and the best proof that a man could give of his being a thorough American was his constant pity of every thing colonial, and contempt for every thing foreign, especially English. We have learned a great deal better now, and have mostly outgrown the folly of looking upon ourselves as wholly a self-made people, or as having sprung up from the ground in a night. We find ourselves carefully and reverently studying the annals of colonial enterprise and wisdom, tracing our origin to the stout men and worthy women of the olden time, and discovering affinities between our laws and institutions and those which have had the stamp of centuries upon them in the best countries of the Old World. Our sense of importance, therefore, has lost some of its insolence, and risen in dignity by humbling its conceit. We are now thinking more of our antecedents than ever since the first days of the revolution, before our patriots could make up their minds to cut themselves off from their allegiance to the mother country; and we have no doubt that the welcome given to our royal guest came, in great part, from a growing sense of the close connection between his antecedents and our own.

At one time we might have hesitated to affirm what we must now do—that a man's dignity begins not with what he does, but with what he carries to his work, and that his personal effort is but one of the factors of his honor. Before we begin to do any thing at all, we claim surely an honor that we never can create, but at best can only confirm—the honor of being men, or human; and the child is ranked above the brute not by the scale of merit, but by the fact of blood, being carefully watched over and loved before putting forth any sign of rational intelligence, and when far less active and playful than a kitten, or puppy, or bird of the same age. The child is great by antecedents, while so little in presence; and what is true of the child is true of the man and the nation. The birth-right—or what a man is born to—gives him his position before he has done any thing for himself. It is this that makes us not only human but also national, and enables us to start with our capital of life, constitution, and power. The great birth-right of our common humanity is the essential title to dignity, and should entitle all who hold it to respect: yet the generic title is very much qualified by specific differences; and no sensible person will say that a Guinea negro or a Hottentot starts with the same antecedents, either of blood or position, as a native American citizen, who is born of the old Revolutionary stock, that had been nurtured in the atmosphere of civil liberty since the days of the Barons of Runnymede or William of Orange, and perhaps for ages before. As Americans, we may well claim to come of good blood; and the early colonists, who formed our institutions, and led our armies and legislatures, and give character to our people, were born and bred among the best and freest nations of the Old World. They affirmed, instead of renouncing, their birth-right by the act of Revolution; and Washington gave proof of being of the stock of Alfred and Cromwell, in leading the armies of the Revolution and signing the Constitution of the United States. He and his compeers were willing to be subjects of constitutional law, but not willing to be slaves of arbitrary power; and the illustrious Englishmen who lately paid their reverential visit to Mount Vernon honored their own birth-right and country by the act.

Mere blood of itself avails little unless indorsed by virtues; and when we speak of our birth-right of blood, we mean to connect with it the whole course of its history, and to affirm that a nation, like a family, has a corporate and continuous life, that beats in its heart and works in its hand. Estimated thus, America may claim noble antecedents; and for more than two centuries she has been animated by a spirit of industry and reverence, liberty and order. New elements, indeed, come in to modify the old tendencies; and the solidity and freedom of our English and Dutch ancestry have been brought into new and close relations with Germanic egoism and Irish clannishness. Yet these two extremes have pretty effectually balanced each other; and in spite of serious forebodings to the contrary, our nation is likely to be saved alike from a false individualism and a false centralization, and to go on in the old paths of regulated liberty. Without entering into the philosophy of the subject, or heaping up elaborate statistics, we may point to our people themselves as living proof of our hereditary and constitutional habit. Hundreds of thousands gathered in our streets to welcome the royal Prince, in liberty without license, and in order without menace. The multitude was not a mob, but a people, and as such it was noticed and honored by our sagacious and distinguished guests. We were proud to be among them—one of that vulgar crowd, as a saucy newspaper called it—and were all the more sure of their good behavior because nothing less could be expected of them, after the teaching and habit that two centuries of virtual liberty and order have tended to domesticate on these shores. The fathers, though dead, are still with the children, and the Dutch burgomasters and the English freemen of years long gone lived in the veins and looked out of the eyes of the great company who filled the streets of this vast metropolis.

Of course when we count the antecedents of blood and institutions, we can not omit the land which has given us our home and field. All dignity must have a material basis, and even that Gospel which came to establish a spiritual kingdom claimed also a terrestrial jurisdiction, and promised to its gentle heroes and heroines, God's meek children, that they should inherit the earth. To own land always gives a sense of independence; and while, as a nation with a continent and two oceans for our patrimony, we have a comfortable assurance of having a handsome property, and every school-boy and plowman regards himself as a general partner in the concern, we are not obliged as individuals to plead poverty in the ears of illustrious strangers, and our people are landholders to a degree unknown in the Old World. We are owning land more and more; and while our territory, in its growing vastness, is giving us a new sense of our common national domain, the constant division of the soil among the many by purchase is marvelously extending that feeling of self-respect that is so closely connected with the ownership of land. The Roman gentry took the title of Equites, or horsemen, and there is a good deal of meaning, surely, in the ownership of a horse. Our landholders are generally of the equestrian order; and probably, in proportion to our numbers, we have more of this class of gentry among us than any nation on earth; and that would be a wonderful parade that should marshal on one field all of our cavalry, from the master of a hundred blood-horses on some of our stock farms to the owner of the solitary nag that so often carries civilization to the margin of the Rocky Mountains.

Put all these elements together—our lineage, our institutions, our land, alike in its productiveness and its beauty—and surely we have some antecedents to be proud of. Before we point to any thing that we have done for ourselves, we have something to show for our birth-right. We have a history that enriches every good citizen's pedigree, and enables him to hold up his head wherever he goes. The more reverential and religious is the spirit of our claim so much the better; and the feeling that was so strong in the old Revolutionary times, that our country had a providential mission, and Washington and his compeers were divinely led, is wholesome and rational. No nation is well-born that is not born of God, and no man has any true sense of dignity who is not in some way under a providential commission. When the American connects his faith in the divine calling of his country with a just conviction of his own personal birth-right as a citizen, a Christian, and a man, he is not likely to play the sycophant in any society, or to fawn in the saloons of nobles or before the thrones of kings. The old Puritan character, that has been, on the whole, the most powerful element of our civilization, was based upon this sense of a providential calling, and every man of this stamp started in his career with the idea that God sent him, and that therefore he had a right to be and to work without asking leave of thrones or apologizing to courts. What may be called, in the good sense of the term, our American quality or gentility partakes largely of this disposition; and the men who have done most to form our standard of character united a deep sense of God's care for them with a strong determination to take good care of themselves. The union of personal faith with personal energy is exemplified in our leaders and communities of the old colony times; and when the stout individualism and clannish neighborhoods of those times were brought together under the pressure of common danger during the War of the Revolution, the result was that combination of personal courage and public spirit that has so stamped itself on our history. Thus we maintain that the true American is reverential, brave, and patriotic; and the type of character that we inherit with our blood and history is so eminently dignified that we need only be true to our antecedents to stand upon the true ground of dignity. Our gentility, or our family temperament, has a good deal of the air noble in its tone and bearing, and every man who holds up his head as one of God's children, and puts forth his hand bravely in honest work, proves himself to be of the lineage of Washington, and Franklin, and Adams, and their compeers. What usually passes as gentility is a poor pretense that claims for a few branches of the family what belongs to the family as such, and even they who claim to be lineal descendants of our noted men can no more assume to inherit the virtues of the whole stock than the buds of a single twig can presume to exhaust the sap of the whole trunk. It is our stock as such—the corporate, continuous life of the true American people—that gives us our lineage, or our gentility, or family unity, and the best specimens of its quality are likely to be found elsewhere than in the exclusive cliques that base their dignity upon inheriting an ancient name, while they are strangers to the virtues that gave that name honor.

But whatever may be thought of our antecedents, we must allow that our dignity must at once totter and fall unless it has some present proofs of its worth and its work to stand upon. Antecedence, of course, is as essential to growth as the seed or root is essential to the tree; but presence of growth is the only satisfactory proof that the antecedence has any vital power, or that the seed or root is alive. What is there in our presence as a nation or as individuals that we can build any dignity upon? The question may be answered in two ways, either in respect to our material or our mental developments, or perhaps what may be justly called our wealth and our worth.

Looking to our material presence, we surely need not be ashamed of ourselves. Our country, in its soil and scenery, need not hide its head before our titled guests; and Niagara, the Hudson, and the Catskills—the prairies of the West, and the meadows and forests of the East—need not apologize for asking the young Lord of the British Isles and his ducal companion to look upon them. Of the fruits of our soil, also, we have no reason to be ashamed; and the Goliath who showed to the Prince the granaries of the West—the huge Mayor of Chicago, in his ample bulk—was no inapt impersonation of the wealth of our soil. Long John Wentworth, like our land, is not only big enough for himself, but with a good fund of strength to spare occasionally for the service of a neighbor. We believe, too, that we are less wasteful of our natural resources than before; and, from what we read and what we see, it is obvious that our people are learning and practicing the fundamental principles of good husbandry, and making great advances in the science and art of manuring, draining, and all the branches of horticulture and agriculture. While the wild prairies and dense forests of the West have been peopled with an industrious race, and the land cheered with thriving farms and villages, the old States have been rejuvenated, and the last twenty years have brought a wonderful transformation to all our rural districts, especially to those in the vicinity of our great cities and towns.

Perhaps our business affairs never looked better than at present; and any intelligent American who observes what is now doing in our villages and cities—the enterprise at work in producing, and transforming, and exchanging the products of the soil—can not but take to himself some share of the self-respect that belongs to a people so laborious and so intelligent. The sense of prosperity comes home to great numbers of our people who may seem little active in promoting it; and thousands and hundreds of thousands of quiet citizens have capital invested in the mines, ships, roads, and steamers that enrich the nation, and unite the Atlantic with the Pacific shores. Other marks of prosperity we have that rise into intellectual and moral grandeur; and the schools, charitable asylums, and churches that are covering our land may well give us a new sense of worth that is far more important than wealth. We are quite well aware, indeed, that we have not the imposing signs of greatness which so impress a visitor to the Old World. We have few palaces, and next to no standing army. Nor have we a class of persons whose position entitles them to be regarded as the set dignitaries and established representatives of the nation, such as the kings, princes, nobles, and generals of Europe. Our Government itself is a very feeble expression of the nation, and most of our work is done without its aid, the leaders of enterprise asking little more than to be let alone; somewhat in the language, though not in the surly temper, of Diogenes asking the Alexander at Washington just to get out of the sunshine and allow the light to have its way. Strangers who look for our Government can not find it either in any magistrates, or police, or army; simply because the people are the Government, and their inherent power they hold in their own hands, having only delegated a small portion of it to public functionaries.

Our governing power is most conspicuous at elections, especially at the great State and National elections. Then our people show themselves, and review their magistracies and renew their magistracies. There is something, indeed, in our elections to regret, especially in the growing disposition to employ bribery, directly or indirectly, in influencing votes. But elections in other countries are not immaculate; and we suppose that the ballot-box is quite as pure, on the whole, as in England, considering the immense results that often hang on the contest here—nothing less, in fact, than the change of the whole policy of the Government, and virtually the election of a temporary king. We are afraid that political corruption with us, in this respect, may be worse before it is better; but we are quite sure that causes are at work that must in the end make our political agitations less objectionable. No thoughtful American need be ashamed of the manner in which the present canvass has, on the whole, been conducted. Our first statesmen have laid their most mature thoughts before the nation; and the people themselves, in their various party demonstrations, have generally shown a moderation and order that are most cheering. We have watched processions of enormous numbers, far exceeding in size any of our military parades, and have been astonished at the decorum, and even the good taste and good feeling displayed in the mottoes and manners of the march. In fact, during the Prince's visit there has been something in every great popular demonstration under his eye that has been satisfactory. Our people have done better than their functionaries; and generally the multitude have shown a better quality than the exclusives who claim to be the only quality. They have looked well and done well, and we are proud of them.

Perhaps it is best that it should be so, and that the great middle class, who constitute the bone and sinew, the head and heart of the nation, should best represent us. Yet we confess to feeling some regret that the dignity of our nation has not shown itself in some more conspicuous and organic embodiment. Our President did very well, and we never had a warmer sense of American loyalty than when we read of the hearty welcome to the royal stranger by our venerable chief magistrate, and of the visit of the whole company of guests, with their host, to the tomb of Washington. Prince and President had both antecedents to be proud of; and he who wears officially the mantle of Washington is qualified to meet on equal terms the son of Victoria and the heir of the throne of Alfred. Yet, on the whole, we confess to not being satisfied with the conduct of our officials and managers in the late act of international hospitality. Here, in this metropolis, the mismanagement was most monstrous and disgraceful. Hundreds of thousands of people gathered in our magnificent thoroughfare to see the expected guest, and to give him a hearty cheer, and he was detained for hours to witness, over and over again, the marching and countermarching of our excellent volunteer soldiery. Their evolutions were, as they always are, admirable, and must have given our guests an idea of the instinctive aptitude of our people for military organization: an aptitude which relieves us from the necessity of keeping up a large standing army, since it assures us that at a few weeks' warning all the able-bodied men in the country can be transformed into an army, equal, man for man, to any troops in the world. Their appearance and conduct were worthy of themselves and of the occasion. But why should the review have been repeated, depriving our guests of the opportunity of seeing the brilliant crowds gathered to welcome them, and depriving thousands of the people of occasion to look upon the visitors in honor of whom they had gathered. Somebody blundered, certainly. But it was not the people or our volunteer soldiers. The disappointment was cruel to all parties—to our people and their guest—sending thousands home, in town and country, cold and out of temper, and robbing our guest of probably the best display of popular intelligence, order, and enthusiasm that he ever saw in his life. The conduct of our social functionaries was no more judicious; and we can hardly believe, what is unquestionably true, that the wealth and fashion of this city expended forty thousand dollars on a ball, and neglected to see that the building was safe, and that the temporary floor was secure against the great and unexampled pressure. Twelve thousand dollars was paid for the supper—four dollars for each person—and not four dollars was thought of being devoted to paying a good mechanic or engineer for inspecting the supports that kept royalty and democracy from tumbling into the cellar amidst the stock of pasteboard crowns for tragedy kings, and fustian frocks for simple people. We confess to having a good deal of city as well as national pride; and we find comfort in this mortification only from the fact that it is so positive and so well deserved as to be taken as a retribution, instead of being passed over as a mere accident. It was so like what we are said to be, that we have actually played into the hands of the caricaturists, and put on a bigger fool's-cap than they have ever drawn for us.

Probably a better representation of the intelligence and taste of the city would have averted the scandal of bad manners and poor management which arose at the hands of the self-styled wealth and fashion. Our artists generally were ignored, and our brilliant professional men were postponed to dull capitalists and accomplished dancers. Undoubtedly, many intelligent and estimable persons were engaged in the affair, but good sense was kept in the back-ground; and never in America, surely, was so much money spent in a single evening, with so little good result. The whole thing was a virtual repudiation of American dignity, and a poor imitation of foreign usages. It was not republican either in plan or execution; and surely nothing can be further from our best American manners than to rob a guest of his liberty by obtrusion, and to unite the snob and the sycophant in elbowing, rudeness, and servile adulation. Our people, as a whole, have little sympathy with such proceedings; and we prefer to point to our firemen, our soldiery, and our citizens at large, as specimens of American men and manners.

We do wish that our guests could judge us by some more favorable manifestations of our public men and public occasions than have been set before them. Probably in private they have been more favored, and the choice men and women of the land have been presented to them. What has been said to them in public has been so little satisfactory to our people, indeed, as to make us content that the speech-making has been rare, unless the speakers could be changed. We must confess that our official men who do those things are not generally our ablest men; and as we measure their performances with the best standard we can not help asking, somewhat earnestly, whether we are as well represented in public positions as we ought to be, and whether there are not some causes at work that keep our ablest citizens out of office. The popular vote is surely more likely to fall on the man whom party tact has kept within the lines of prudent mediocrity than the brilliant leader, whose gifts and boldness win admiration and envy, creating, perhaps, an animosity in opponents more than enough to counterbalance the enthusiasm of friends. Again and again we have seen mediocre men raised to high office, while superior gifts and characters have been left to comparative neglect. Thus here, as in the old aristocracies, it is not personal merit that wins the palm, but a kind of hereditary caste; and as in the Old World it is the family blood that regulates the descent of honors, so here it is a traditional party policy that bases its succession more upon party lineage than personal merit. The least offensive man who inherits the party name and spirit, and is conspicuous enough to bear its banner in his name, is more sure of success than the statesman of well-tried service and ripe experience. The check on this mediocrity ought to be found here, as in the Old World, in the selection of superior men to fill the chief places in our cabinets and councils. Probably our ablest officials are not such as are appointed directly by the popular vote; and the State and the nation have been served by heads of departments and judges chosen by the few best acquainted with their merits. But even here there is a great difficulty, for the emoluments of office are generally so small that first-class men are not ambitious of filling them, and thus they sometimes go begging until they fall into the hands of inferiors. Whatever may be the cause, we must confess that the best dignity of our nation is not generally in its officials; and if we would make out our roll of honor, the shining names would be drawn not from the political firmament. Our professional men, editors, teachers, merchants, farmers, mechanics might furnish an ample list; and even the names of statesmen entitled to a place would be quite as likely to be drawn from the retirement to which their minority or their merits have consigned them as from the walks of public life. What check shall be put to this frequent withdrawal of the best men from office we can not predict, sure as we are that a better idea of dignity, as consisting less in wealth than in usefulness, might make office more honorable and money-making less essential. Whatever may be the effective cause, we shall be glad to see the result accomplished, and the public service put upon the good old basis of the Washingtonian times. We certainly are quite ready to be loyal to able public men, and the few eminent statesmen who are known to the whole nation are sure of honor and audience wherever they go. We hope to see the day when the nation, without distinction of party, shall have its leaders; and as we looked upon General Scott during the late ovation, and saw him receiving a measure of honor such as was accorded to no other citizen, we could not but wish that the civil as well as the military service might have its accredited chiefs, with honors above party passions and aims beyond party aggrandizement. With all our personal confidences and hard individualism we are full of social loyalty, and are ready to do honor to every commanding man who comes before us. It will be a great day for us when we find public leaders of gifts and presence corresponding with the intelligence and energy of the people. Our ready enthusiasm for a foreign prince, whose title comes wholly from his blood, should reveal to us our unconscious craving for a prince after our own kind, a kingly man of the true make, by blood and breeding, faith and force, able to command the respect of a brave and free people, and lead them as one among them, not as one above them. It may be, however, that the absence of such a chief is a Providential hint that our people in themselves are to be royal; and the great aim should be to cherish in our children a reverence and a courage that gives each worthy citizen the royal dignity, and so makes the pomp of courts ridiculous. Specimens of such dignity we have, and thousands of solid men and fair women who cheered the royal guest did so with the feeling that humanity is the only royal birth-right; and this Prince is honorable only so far as he and his race stand identified with the human rights and human worth that are the honor of all souls and the safeguard of all nations.

As this feeling rises and spreads among us we shall not only prove a greater antecedence and show a better presence, but we shall have a wider and higher consequence. A man's consequence, indeed, is sometimes measured by his self-esteem or assumption, and many very consequential people are called such apparently because no consequences at all come from them. We attach consequence justly only to those whose character and conduct have important results, and therefore we are entitled to consequence as a people according to the results that are likely to flow from our ideas and works. We allow, indeed, that a king has consequence because he has position and power, and all that he says and does has very significant results. It is not only the thing said or done that is important, but the position from which, and the people to whom it is said or done. And as we all live in social fellowship more or less extended;

we measure our consequence by the quantity and quality of influence that we exert. This consequence is sometimes both personal and impersonal, as in the case of the pilot, who is more important than any other man, not only because he knows the soundings and the coast, but because he stands at the helm, and turns the ship and all on board by his hand. It is useless to deny that, as Americans, we have consequence by our position as masters of this New World, and ought to confirm by our ideas and labors the promise of our position. It is well for us to unite both elements in our schemes of influence, and develop our resources in the providential channels opened for us by the Lord of Ages. The highest law of conquest is growth, not mere diffusion; and as we grow from the organic root we shall spread and rise in true dignity and power. We measure health not by the bulk of what we eat, but by the perfection in which we assimilate it, and renew the exhausted forces and members of our body; and every novice knows that bloated corpulence is not vigor but disease. The health of a nation depends upon the amount of territory and people assimilated by its vital ideas and powers. Evidently, then, our social consequence is to be measured by the same principle, and the better we comprehend and apply the organic laws and usages that have made us a nation, the greater our promise of influence both in America and Europe. At home, we are strong by submitting individual willfulness to the order of free and effective institutions, and distributing power in due degree, so as to unite the people in towns, the towns in States, and the States in the Confederacy, thus guaranteeing local liberty and central law. Abroad, we are strong by appearing in our solid citizenship and personal independence, presenting a great organic power to Europe, alike encouraging to free principles and adverse to all tyranny. Each man confirms his personal dignity by uniting in himself the largeness and the order of the nation, and cherishing free affinities with all men, while he speaks his own mind and does his own work with all energy and self-reliance.

The more thoroughly the citizen identifies himself with the great forces of law, liberty, education, industry, faith, that are working out our mighty future, the more thoroughly he incorporates himself into the body of humanity, and its growth is his growth, and its coronation is his honor. The moment he affirms his own self-sufficiency he destroys his consequence, as the branch that is cut from the root dies in the very attempt to grow of itself. The true man, therefore, proves his consequence by following his antecedents in all present faith and fidelity. He rules by right divine; and the royalty that he wins and wears will hold good under all empires, and last when earthly thrones shall crumble to dust. We ought to be willing to take some lessons in this higher royalty from the gentle, and sensible, and manly, and modest young Prince who has just gone from us. Richter, that profound thinker and rich humorist, has said, in his letter on the Education of a Prince: "I could recommend no other refuge from anticipated courts for an heir-apparent than a foreign country, where the native prince would draw away all flatterers from the stranger." It may be that our native prince, Young America, needs the lesson more than the stranger; and if our sovereign is half as shrewd as he is said to be, he will learn of his visiting brother's simple manners, quiet ease, and thorough good-breeding—to understand better that assumption is not courage, irreverence is not manliness, and self-will is not dignity.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THACKERAY has finished the publication of his Georges in the Cornhill, and they are republished here in a volume. How intensely English they are! All the details and phenomena of the court life and the society they describe are utterly strange to us. The spirit of that society is not so entirely unknown here, perhaps. We worship gilded people, and call them gentlemen too. We don't gamble, and drink, and swear, and riot quite as much as the penultimate Prince of Wales and his crew, but we do our share to keep up the world's reputation for disgraceful misconduct.

The four Georges had, upon the whole, as few admirable or respectable qualities as any series of four monarchs in any history. It shows the inherent vigor of the English people, and the independence of its government of the nominal head of the State, that the country did not succumb under a whole hundred years of King Georges. Their reigns cover a great part of that eighteenth century which Carlyle despises, and they are the least of all the little men who are conspicuous in it. Their contemporary kings were often great men: Frederick the Great and Napoleon Bonaparte were in their time. And they had famous and great men for subjects. Addison, Pope, Swift, Johnson, Goldsmith, Fielding, Gibbon, Hume, Gray, Sterne, Scott, Southey, Coleridge, Clive, Warren Hastings, Robert Walpole, Wellington, James Watt, Jenner, and a galaxy more. These were all subjects and servants of the Georges.

But in his lectures upon the Humorists Thackeray has treated of the literary men and things of the epoch. In the Georges he draws more from social gossip. The narrative is melancholy enough. You follow on through the glittering, racy pages—but that high life is shocking; for it is morning now, and the rouge and tinsel and hollow humbug are so plain, so painful! It is pitiful to contrast—as Thackeray does in the cases of Southey, Colingwood, and Heber, in the last lecture—the wealth wasted upon such wretched frumps as the Georges of England and the patient, life-long, poorly-paid labor, or the miserable struggle and starving, of so many noble Englishmen. The incessant moral is—and it urges itself quietly all the time—"Is it worth while to pay for all this pageantry? Can not sensible, educated men dispense with this expensive and cumbrous machinery?"

Probably the people who listened to the pleasant flow of the lectures neither thought of such things nor asked such questions. When they were first delivered here, in New York, in the autumn of 1855, there was a little shrugging of shoulders and regret that he had not chosen a better subject than a pack of dull kings and their mistresses. But they were the symptoms of the time. Did not Samuel Johnson wait for an hour, hat in hand, in Lord Chesterfield's ante-room? Did not that smart and absurd Horace Walpole call Goldsmith "an inspired idiot?" The time was tainted with the spirit which reveled in high life. You may smile at Mr. Pepys's careful memoranda of trivialities; but Lord Clarendon says that the spirit of the court was the spirit of England.

Besides, do you mean to read only about good and great people? about a pure and cultivated society? It is pleasant reading, but it is limited. It is not only pleasant reading, but it is inspiring. Study the great men. Let your memory be a gallery of the portraits that history and the heart love. But also you must know the men among whom you live, and with whom and upon whom you are to work.

There is a report, which ought to be true, that Thackeray is to write a history of the time of Queen Anne. No man could do it with sincerer interest, for his studies have lain especially in that period, and he has a peculiar sympathy with that quaint aspect of character and manners. There is rich material for such a work, with which he is familiar; and perhaps no man in England could write so good a sequel to Macaulay's volumes. "Henry Esmond" and "The Virginians" show how interesting he could make a history; and as his invention may well be a little weary, it would be agreeable for him to work upon material already at hand. But his constant employment upon the Cornhill, and his indolence—an indolence apparently characteristic of the society of authors—will be serious impediments. We wish he would, but we don't believe he will.

In a late Roundabout paper there is an extract from the famous London novel of forty years ago, "Tom and Jerry." Thackeray has a true relish for it, and serves up the old story with affectionate gusto. He doesn't find it very funny now. But he turns it over so curiously, and looks at it and wonders over it so quaintly, that the mind is carried back to that time, and forced to contemplate the fact that the fashion of the novel passeth away. Who of this generation knows any thing, even by name, of Corinthian Tom and Bob Logic? Yet, as people generally prefer the stories they read in their youth, and continue to read them over and over—as those who were familiar with Scott's novels when they appeared regularly read them now—it would be interesting to know whether there are old English squires in the country who still read that old novel of London life as it was in their youth.

It is instructive, and a little melancholy, to look over a publisher's old book-list. Turn to the end of books printed twenty or twenty-five years ago by any of our leading houses, and scan the names of the new works upon the catalogue. How gently they have sunk into oblivion! How quietly the world has passed over them to study the names of newer works upon newer catalogues! Well, the consolation is that the good things in them have been overlooked and forgotten because the capacity of the world is limited, and the old good things have been replaced by the new.

THE lively Mr. Sala has completed his "Memoirs of Hogarth," which have appeared serially in the Cornhill: "the labor of sixty-seven happy nights," he calls it. He has evidently made it a labor of love, and has accumulated stores of interesting and rare information. The style in which the papers are written is, however, rather ambitious, and not quite his own. Sala's writings have generally tasted of Dickens or Thackeray; but this has a strong flavor of Carlyle. Yet it has all his own talent, and is a valuable biography.

Hogarth was a genuine John Bull. His pictures preach the John Bull morality, which is widely spread. Honesty is the best policy; Tommy be a good boy, and you shall have a tart. Yet in the details of his pictures there is a fullness and dramatic power which make him great among artists as well as moralists. Sala follows the lines of Hogarth's great works with tender fidelity. He edits each picture, so that its significance is clear, and all its allusions are explained. In all of them there is that homely London tone which you find in Fielding and Smollett. If Fielding had had more conscience, and had been a painter or engraver, he would have done similar things to Hogarth's. Indeed, you seem to be reading Fielding when you are looking at Hogarth. They both have the open air, everyday freedom of handling which shows the greatest power. For such skill has no adventitious aids. If some of our own artists should exhibit in the spring at the Academy a series of pictures representing any special current of New York life with the graphic force and courageous detail of Hogarth, and should persuade us as we looked that there was nothing low in such a work, but that it belonged to the highest range of art, how ludicrously small the going to Italy to study the old masters would instantly seem!

Not, of course, that such art is the only great art, nor that it is not a good thing to go to Italy. Not at all; the point would be to remind us that it is not the subject nor the association, but the treatment, which makes the true greatness of art. In another department of art, the "Song of the Shirt" and "The Bridge of Sighs" are the most triumphant illustrations of the same principle. The life of a starving seamstress, and the death of a prostitute, are as familiar and fearful subjects as could well be proposed. Artists who think that Madonnas are essential to high art, and Sir William Wallace to tragical romance, may learn memorable lessons from William Hogarth and Thomas Hood. They were both Englishmen; they both saw the essential fact that it is the business of art, of whatever kind, to use life as its subject: and to both of them humor had a lambent richness which decorated but did not debase life.

AND apropos of art of an older kind, there is an effort to awaken, or develop, a taste for the Italian masters in the gallery of Mr. James Jackson Jarves. He is not unknown to the readers of this Magazine, and his racy books upon French and Italian life are among the most instructive and entertaining of their kind. Mr. Jarves has been for several years resident in Italy, and has collected many pictures illustrative of the progress of art, so that the careful study of them will show the student the "chronological and historical sequence of paintings."

His hope is that there may be sufficient interest in the matter to retain the collection in New York, that we may have the nucleus of a historic gallery such as those of Florence and other chief European cities. This is partly supplied by the well-known and curious collection of Mr. Bryan.

In order to found such a gallery permanently, it is necessary that those who are interested in the subject should labor for it. For the work to be done is not only to have the collection and to know about it, but to inspire other people with the desire to know about it too. There is no popular interest whatever in the "old masters" as such. Their names, with a few exceptions, are entirely unknown, and the few that are somewhat familiar are ignorantly worshiped. How many people in New York would make it a point to go and see an undoubted Giovanni Bellini? Some, doubtless; but not many. Now those "some" are the persons to whom such a collection as this of Mr. Jarves first appeals. They are ex-officio, by their taste, cultivation, and interest, the guardians of the youth of art in this country. They are the Newcastles of that H.R.H.

Well—these must take care that their friends see pictures, and understand why pictures should be seen. Every nation is glorious just in the degree that it encourages the development of the highest human power. The painting of pictures may or may not be one of the results of that encouragement, but the presence, and study, and influence of pictures unquestionably helps that development. It may be doubtful whether any particular form of civilization will be reproduced; but undoubtedly the careful study of all precedent forms assists the new era, whatever it may be. The end of the study of pictures is not that pictures may be painted, but that the soul may be inspired and strengthened.

It should be well understood, therefore, that a distinct duty is laid upon those who share a love of art in every form. Nothing of the kind moves in this country unless it be pushed along. Pictures may be left to make their own way with people—but people must not be left to make their own way to pictures. The gallery of Mr. Jarves will stand upon its merits like other galleries. But pictorial art, this shy stranger, speaks no tongue familiar to our society. She stands among us, glowing and beautiful, but silent. Will those who speak her language not help interpret her to those who would gladly know her and talk with her?

Next month we can all speak of Mr. Jarves's pictures in detail more intelligibly.

THE novel of "Evan Harrington; or, He Would be a Gentleman," is just completed in Once a Week, and is issued here. It is a story of contemporary English life, full of subtlety and spirit, depending for its impression upon the skill and detail with which its characters are delineated.

It is—curiously enough, and perhaps unconsciously—a tale in which the women are more variously and strongly pronounced than the men, and they are the cleverest and most effective actors throughout. The "argument" is the love of a tailor's son, whom Nature made a gentleman, for a baronet's daughter, whom Nature also made a lady. There is no mawkish moralizing in it, but the simple and frequent experience of all society confirms the justice of the plot. The book is quiet, but most interesting, from the author's ability to state the shadowy, evanescent, and glimmering emotions that play through every sensitive mind brought in contact with what it despises as prejudice, and yet can not exactly escape. The Countess is a portrait of very great skill—so is Rose—so is Evan himself—so is his mother.

The moral of the book is not that every tailor is as much a gentleman as every nobleman, but simply that gentlemanhood is determined by causes which can not be calculated, and may appear in a tailor's son and not appear in an earl's. Its farther moral is the picture of the perfectly heathen spirit of modern Christian society, which stigmatizes one man because he is useful, and worships another because his great-grandfather was useful. Certainly George Fourth's tailor was a truer gentleman than George Fourth. He may have been as bad a man, but then he was good for something. Not because he made George's coats. That certainly does not prove it; but because he made coats for other people—honest people, some of them, let us hope, who had an honest business in life.

In Evan Harrington we have one of the most fascinating heroes of the modern novel. Usually the fascinating people in novels do not fascinate. But Evan does. Rose's love is perfectly intelligible. Every girl who reads the book will fall in love with Evan, and that not because he is described with tinted ink as a pirate, or a statesman, or a saint, or a hero; nor because he is invested with some obscure antecedents full of the possibility that he is a king's son, after all. There is nothing of this: nothing of the rose romance. The book is pure daylight throughout, dear young lady. Mr. Evan Harrington is a tailor's son; but he is, somehow, so essentially noble and lovely, that it is like the warmth of the June air, inevitable and universal.

He tells a falsehood once, indeed. It was intended to draw blame upon himself, and to prevent suffering to others. But, as usual, such falsehood was a fault; yet a fault that we can justly pardon, because nobly committed. And Rose, surely she is a true-hearted girl; and her mother, Lady Jocelyn, a most womanly woman. Every one must admire the cool, neutral tint of the story, while the passionate romance of love is touched with a power that few possess.

Among the many novels it is remarkable for its masculine nerve—a tone which springs from knowledge. Too many of the clever novels, nowadays, which are written by women, lack a centre of gravity. They are vague and unsatisfactory. Apparently they are the product of intolerable ennui—with obscure aims and efforts, but without experience. A great novel is written by a man of great genius, whether he have experience or not. Genius is vicarious. It interprets for us emotions it never itself experienced. But very entertaining novels are written by people of tact and talent, provided they have experience or observation. There is Bulwer, for instance.

Then there is a quaint originality in the style of Evan Harrington which is fascinating. The author, George Meredith, is not a new man. He has written other books, of which "The Shaving of Shagpat" is most familiar to us, and a novel called "Richard Feverel," which has a luxuriant power that has been trained and trimmed in Evan Harrington.

THE great ball to the little Prince, of which we chatted together last month, was, alack the day! a failure. There were too many people, and they fell through the floor. It was disgraceful; but the four hundred were not to blame. No, seriously. If you yourself had been one of the Floor Committee you would have gone to Mr. Plank, the builder, and would have said to him, "Floor the parquette of the Academy to hold as many people as can stand upon it." It was a matter that must be confided to an expert. If you had said, when you saw it, "The supports are too weak," and Mr. Plank had answered, "Sir, you are mistaken; and I am a builder," doubtless you would have gracefully held your tongue. And when Mr. Plank added, "Sir, is it likely I should have suffered the floor to be unsupported when I expect to bring Mrs. Plank and my daughter to the ball?" then you would have replied, "Sir, I beg your pardon."

The duties of the Floor Committee could not be so broadly construed as to include the building of the floor or the setting its supports with their own hands. And yet it was disgraceful that the floor fell, because we have a reputation, and we have won it, for shiftlessness—for letting things take care of themselves—for guessing that it will answer—for going it blind—for putting it through with a light heart and a thin pair of breeches. The solid English work, which shows itself in every article of the toilet, in portmanteaus, in printing and binding, in every department of use or comfort, contrasts proudly with our showy and weak way of doing the same things.

But it was a pity that this characteristic of our workmanship should have displayed itself just then and there. How H.R.H., who appears to enjoy jokes, must have laughed at breakfast the next morning with his grim Mentor, Newcastle, and the rest of the lofty company! What good things he must have written his mother! The New Yorkers, we can imagine him saying, gave us a great ball, which was perfectly successful, except that there was such a crowd that there could be no dancing; which was fortunate, because there was no floor to dance upon.

The great partner question of which we had so much speculation last month was easily settled. The Prince's first partner was the wife of the Governor of the State, and the rest were named by the Committee. There was a great agitation of the minds of all the lovely ladies in the city upon this subject; and the air is murmurous with strange whispers since the celestial visitants returned to their native heaven. One story, told in the choicest circles and fully believed, declares that upon entering the Academy the soft eyes of H.R.H. fell upon Juno, the most gorgeous of women, and he announced that it was necessary he should dance with that lady. And H.R.H. persisted and wished to be presented without delay. But one of the Committee replied sententiously, that all his partners were already selected, and that Juno was not upon the list. Now Juno overheard these dreadful words! The Prince danced according to the bill of fair; but the gorgeous Juno, with lightning in her eyes, declared that Mr. Fourhundredth, the Committee man, had openly insulted her. Do you envy Fourhundredth's position? Do you think he will enjoy his balls this winter? Do you not see in imagination those superbly-scornful eyes of Juno, burning him through and through as he shrinks behind the fans and the feathers, trying to escape a roasting! Poor shivering Fourhundredth, answer this question asked by that magnificent Junonine contempt, "What right had you and your fellows to select partners for the Prince, or to prevent from dancing with him any lady whose appearance attracted him? When the society of New York gave him a ball at which all the ladies were equally unknown to him, it was to be supposed that all were of the same social claims, was it not? Every lady in the building had an equal right with every other to be his partner, isn't it so? Well, you, and Smith, and Jones, and the rest of your set, selected certain people to dance with him; yes, but by what authority? Do you say that he couldn't dance with every body? Yes, that is true, but why should not he have made his own selection? We women were all of the same social standing—I don't mean of the same set—and we were all equally unknown to him. We had all paid for our tickets, and for a chance in the lottery of the dance. And you interfered, you miserable Fourhundredth, and I have lost the only opportunity I shall ever have of dancing with a Prince of Wales."

Mercy! mercy! who would be in the shoes of that hapless young gentleman?

H.R.H. seems to have been thwarted in many ways. Thus it is related by the veracious tongue of private gossip that, when the Boston gentleman who carried the invitation from that city to the review, arrived in the presence, and stated the object of his mission, Mentor Newcastle turned to Telemachus and said, "Your Royal Highness, the city of Boston invites you to a review."

"Oh, dear! I am tired to death of reviews," replied Telemachus. "I won't have any more. I can't stand it."

"But your Royal Highness, the city has taken great trouble, and will be very much disappointed; and we have been so kindly received, that it really seems worth while to strain a point."

"No, no. I don't care, and I'm very tired; and I won't have any review."

Whereupon the severe Newcastle smiles blandly upon the Boston Ambassador and replies:

"His Royal Highness is deeply moved, and accepts with great pleasure the kind offer of the review in the city of Boston."

Poor little Renfrew! He couldn't dance with Juno when he wanted to, and had to have a review when he didn't want to.

THE ball inevitably reminded every New Yorker of the ball given some twenty years ago to another Englishman, not famous as the son of a line of kings, but for writing his own name in history—the ball to Charles Dickens at the old Park Theatre. That was called very splendid in those days, and it is a historical fact that the floor did not break down. Since Lafayette came over to us in 1825, there had been no such overflowing enthusiasm as was shown in the reception of Dickens; and the worth of it was, that it was all his own doing. He had made a foreign country love him.

Carlyle, in his "Past and Present," had his little sneer at "Schnauspiel, the distinguished novelist;" but was there ever a more honorable homage than that we offered to the greatest of living authors? Very possibly we overdid it. Love and reverence and enthusiasm are very apt to overdo it. If Julius Cæsar were in love, Julius Cæsar would probably be spoony, and would be caught ogling his mistress and pressing her hand; performances which are not edifying to the cool spectator, but are as serious as the conquest of Gaul to Julius Cæsar in love.

We were that enamored chieftain when Boz came to us, and if we were demonstrative, and very ardent, and what you derisively call "spoony," what then? Are we ashamed of it? Good Heavens! can we run after Japanese Embassadors, can we set the whole country koo-tooing before a fair-haired young Oxonian, nineteen years old, who has never done any thing but be the great grandson of George Third—and yet feel red and flushed at remembering how we honored a man of genius, whose works help make the renown of England and the delight of civilized mankind? Come! come! you may be proud that you were at the Prince's ball: the Easy Chair is proud that it saw the Boz ball.

It was given in the old Park Theatre. You can not find it now. You can look up a narrow street, from Ann Street to Beekman, which is known as Theatre Alley. That was in the rear of the temple of the muses. The building was coated with cement or plaster, I think, and there was a row of doors arched at the top, and a row of stately arched windows over them, the windows of the "saloon," or a foyer with a bar attached. All the theatrical sentiment of New York—and it is sadly second-hand—clusters about the old Park Theatre. That it was second-hand you may understand from the fact that it was called our "Old Drury." In like manner Fenimore Cooper was called the Walter Scott of America.

The resemblance lay in their both writing novels, and there it ceased. Drury Lane Theatre in London and the Park in New York had the same kind of resemblance; they were both play-houses.

But it had some interesting associations. It was built in 1798, and opened upon three evenings in the week. It was burned in 1820 and again in 1849. Here Cooke acted, and Kean, Cooper, Booth, Wallack, Conway, Matthews, Powers, Ellen Tree, and Fanny Kemble. Here Incledon, Braham, and Phillips, had sung; and here Malibran was crowned Queen of Song. In 1825 she sang on the 29th of November in the Barber of Seville. Many have sung it since, and sung it sweetly. But those who heard Malibran's Rosina have never heard any other: at least they say so.

The building was historic, therefore, in its way. There had been dancing there, too. Celeste—do you remember Celeste, venerable Sir of fifty-five? Augusta—most fascinating of bayadères. Do you remember "Buy-it-dear" at Mitchell's Olympic? And last and greatest and most memorable of all, Fanny Ellsler had victoriously trodden the town under her sublime feet, and the wild fascination of her foreign dances, with their marked and melodious music, still invested the old Park with peculiar interest, when it was resolved by "people" that a ball should be given to Mr. Dickens in that very place.

He had had a dinner at the old City Hotel, at which Washington Irving presided. The whole town of young ladies had intrigued to secure locks of his hair. His autograph was a boon beyond hope. To look at him was joy. To talk with him was bliss. He should have a ball, and we would all have a chance at him. Well, we had the ball. At least, as I said, the floor did not break down. We didn't go in at the front door and come out through the cellar. And we were not crushed and crowded. The New York of those days was well-bred, and understood how to give balls. Ask any gentleman turned of forty-five if it were not so.

The only difficulty was that of Dr. Johnson's biographer. The ball was too Boz-y. The front of the balconies were painted in fresco (I am quite sure it was upon canvas) to represent library shelves and piles of books; and all the libraries were composed of the works of the immortal Boz. And at the bottom of the stage—or rather where the stage should have been—there was a little curtain which constantly drew aside and displayed a series of tableaux, and all the pictures were drawn from the works of the immortal Boz. Gentlemen moved about and ladies looked about, all awaiting the coming of the guest; and by-and-by there was the flutter and the rush and the "now for it," and behold! advancing through a lane of admiring and curious ladies and gentlemen, a young man thirty years old, with a splendid chevelure of dark hair, with large, soft, brilliant eyes—with an extraordinary red waistcoat covered with bright buttons and chains, and with the air of a man overwhelmed by unexpected homage. It was the immortal Boz. It was the English author of the most affluent and delightful genius since Shakespeare.

The venerable Sirs, turned of forty-five and fifty now, found it hard to forgive that red waistcoat. Take any shape but that, they seemed to say. But they forbore remark. They bowed and turned again to the dance, which they performed with that painful solemnity which distinguished the New York dandy of the time—for there were dandies in that day—and all was happiness and peace.

So far as I remember nothing marred that festal night, and every body went home as satisfied as people are after a great ball. Boz did not waltz. The polka had not come in; and I seem to remember his walking through a quadrille.

It is all over now. The last set of that ball was danced eighteen years ago. Maidens who were there may have had daughters at the Prince's ball the other evening. Gentlemen who were conspicuous in its management—Philip Hone, for instance—well known in their time, have departed. The guest of the evening long ago sailed from our shores, and with more banning than blessing. We have crossed swords with him since. We have bombarded him with indignation, and he has poured into us sharp volleys of sarcasm. It was unfair and unkind all round. That splendid chevelure is thinner and grayer now. That smooth, boy's face is now heavily bearded. But the great, generous, genial genius is untouched by time. Humane and humorous, it still enriches the world and draws men nearer to each other. Thackeray says he should like to have been Shakespeare's errand boy. Who wouldn't be glad to have seen Fielding? May you hereafter remember that you went to the Prince's ball at the Academy with the same satisfaction with which the Easy Chair recalls the Boz ball at the Park!

THE question has been asked a great many times whether our reception of the Prince showed that we were a nation of snobs. Why should not the son of the Queen of England travel among us, says Mr. Tammany, like the son of any body else? Why, Mr. Tammany, why didn't Mr. Martin Van Buren, when he was President, travel among us like Mr. Anybody else? He was no more of a man when he was President than when he wasn't, was he? Why, then, did you and your friends parade in the streets, and hang out banners and shout and drink?

Simply because it was not Mr. Martin Van Buren at all, but the President of the United States; and the Baron Renfrew, or the Prince of Wales, was received by us, not as Master Albert Edward Guelph, but as son and successor of the Queen of England. The jubilee of his journey was merely the expression of our good-will for a friendly nation. The Prince himself may be a very amiable young man, but America grows amiable young men too. In the person of Albert Edward this nation saw England symbolized; and it was to the symbol it made its bow.

Now snobbishness is obsequiousness to the person simply. Your genuine snob wants a bottle of the water in which the Prince washed, or a piece of the sofa on which he sat—not because he is a hero, but because he is a Prince; and not because, as a Prince, he is a symbol, but because as Prince he is a conspicuous person. That part of a Prince which is princely can not be washed off, nor cut out of his clothes. In his bath-room and dressing-room he is a man like the rest of us. His interest is in his symbolical character, and you can't carry off specimens and chips and drops of that. How sad it is to read that, of all men in the world, Walter Scott was the man who carried away the glass out of which his sacred Majesty George Fourth had drunk his toddy! I am glad he sat down on it and broke it when he reached home. A kind Providence could not suffer Walter Scott to show George Fourth's wine glass as a holy relic. If the regal symbolism could save the person of George from contempt, certainly it did not extend to his boots and fur collars and cravats. Great Britain might have blushed that its majesty was represented by that man—but under the burly, bad man it would have honored itself. We can understand that.

So when the innocent little Renfrew drove up Broadway, that mighty welcome of a million people was a friendly word to Great Britain.

At least it was so in part. Another part was our entire willingness to be amused. We are sober, but we do like spectacles. We like to have somebody come and be "received." Above all, we like to have that somebody make a speech. How lucky the Prince was! He didn't make a speech—perhaps he couldn't. There is a rumor that he said something to Mayor Wood at Castle Garden, but it wants confirmation. Certain gentlemen made speeches to him—long speeches—dry speeches—but he held his tongue and bowed. Think of a millennium when our great men—Congressmen, for instance, and Assemblymen—may merely hold their tongues and bow to their constituents! Cease, Hope, cease that flattering tale!

No, snobs would have reverently preserved the plate out of which he ate his pudding, and the stump of his cigar, and the spittoon which he may have used. Let us hope there were not many Americans of that kind. We know that the spirit of the people at large was not snobbish; for when his carriage came to be sold—the identical carriage in which he made that amazing progress through New York—the carriage drawn by the six proud blacks (horses, namely)—the carriage whose cushions were, so to speak, yet warm with the pressure of the royal person, the actual heat of the living body of the prospective King of England—this carriage could not bring a tolerable audience to an auction, much less a tolerable bid, and it was bought in for the owner. Bless his heart! he thought we were fonder of toads, didn't he?

The numerical fact is that the carriage cost a thousand dollars. Five hundred were bid for it, and it was bought in for six hundred. That states the matter. The Prince's coming was a great free holiday for the people of New York. They went out to see a sight. They beheld a Queen's son and the future head of a friendly power. They welcomed him with a heartiness, and dignity, and decorum that might have brought tears to the eyes of his companions. And there were a few who licked dirt before him, and gulped the fattest toads. But they were few and exceptional—not enough to fill an auction-room—and they have carriages already.

ONE day during the summer the Easy Chair waddled up a narrow flight of stairs at the corner of Broadway and Ninth Street, and upon the upper floor met an acquaintance of old Italian days, George L. Brown, the painter. And upon his easel, just broadly sketched in, stood a picture of the city and harbor of New York. The canvas was about the size of Church's "Heart of the Andes;" and in the long warm days the indefatigable painter, while others were panting under green trees, was painting them in his fore-ground, and while the city had gone out of town, was quietly putting it upon his canvas precisely as it looks when it is at home.

The view is panoramic, and is taken from the Hoboken heights, and as if from the lawn of Mr. Stevens. The fore-ground is bold with rocks and wild shrubbery and pasture-grass; and you look down upon the river, and the multitudinous metropolis, with its clustering chimneys and spires, its flashing windows, its mass of various building, its forest fringe of masts; beyond it the heights of Long Island, and below, the harbor and the uplands of Staten Island and the Narrows. The water gleams and smokes all over with sails and steamers; the busy life of the great city murmurs under your eye; and overhead an American sky of fretted splendor bathes all the scene in tender light. It is an admirable picture of the scene, with as much and as little charm as any picture of New York must have. The spirit which suggested the work is noble and manly.

But no picture of our precious metropolis can be—let us say it softly—very, very interesting. We carefully remove every relic of historic association. We are opposed to romance, and great cities can be made romantic only by things permanent and memorable. Time, perhaps, the great moulder, will touch us into beauty and picturesque charm; and the descendants of the Prince, for whom this fine picture has been purchased by some gentlemen of the city, may look back with wonder and smiles upon the time when their queer old ancestor came to a country which was just beginning its history, and brought away this picture of a city which will have become as majestic in fact as it is in the conceit of its citizens.

Our Foreign Bureau.

HOW can we begin, how should we begin, except with Italy? How our thoughts verge thither, though we are tinkling our breakfast-spoon in a deep white cup of the nectar they call café au lait at the Café of the Rotonde in the Palais Royal, or struggling to disintegrate a leathern muffin in the coffee-room of the Royal Inn at Matlock. Wherever we happen to be—and it matters not now to ask or answer the question—we seem to see Vesuvius yonder in the back-ground as we look across a glorious bay of blue and sunshine; we seem to see prisoners with matted hair and unshaven faces enjoying light and freedom again; we seem to see crowds hurrying pell-mell all down the Via Toledo, and its balconies hung with tri-colored tapestries, and women with flowers in their hands and in their hair; we seem to see a motley array and procession of carriages, which every eye in the balconies and every eye upon the street watches hard and earnestly, until one with three gray-bearded men appears, and a shout that startles us echoes along all the houses—Viva Garibaldi!

There is no army with him; his force is three days' march away; there are royal soldiers looking through the loopholes of the fortress under whose walls the Liberator passes; yet he has nothing to fear. The gray-bearded men have grave, thoughtful, unburned faces, and their red shirts show purple stains that tell of dismal work gone through: but all that is forgotten in the crazy joyousness of this hour of welcome. There are armfuls of flowers ready to be thrown down upon the Dictator; but there is an earnest, calm look about him that forbids such ovation, and the flowers drop upon the heads of the gay ones who shout in his train.

All Naples is free, but no houses are plundered. Drunken with the joy of deliverance, the people sleep calmly and well. But the Dictator, for whom the flowers had been gathered, has a government to organize. Long after this thoughtless crowd that has shouted his welcome has wearied itself into careless repose, the General is busy with his friends planning new conquests and schemes for effective municipal administration. It is hardly strange that blunders should be made. Even a great General and patriot can not learn in a day what choice to make of a civil executive. The friend who has talked so wisely and so well of the Italian wrongs and of the brilliant future of his country, may yet be no man to conciliate the opposing jealousies of the day and make sure the triumph that an army can only half win. It is no wonder if the thinking and cultivated men of Naples should chafe greatly to find the melodramatic romancist of France, Alexandre Dumas, suddenly elevated to the post of conservator of all their art-treasures, and made director of those investigations which have so long taxed the patience and rewarded the pride of the most zealous antiquarians of their country. Is this accomplishment of liberty and assertion of nationality (they ask) to be only then a Monte Cristo extravaganza? Is Mazzini to be installed in whatever grand place he may covet, and Miss White to become director of finances?

And so there has been coolness at Naples on the part of those who had most seriously and thoughtfully detested the old régime and welcomed the deliverer; all the more of it when it was perceived that Garibaldi, under the advices of injudicious friends, or elated by too easy victories, had volunteered a revival of his old differences with Cavour, and hurled a defiance at him through the columns of the journal in his confidence. But Cavour is not the man to be diverted from the career of a lifetime by a taunt: he is of cooler mettle than Garibaldi, and as earnest. There has been stay of quarrel: the ugly battle of Volturno, and the dangers of the trying hours in that day's fight, have moderated the enthusiasm of the Dictator. He is brought to feel that every art, whether of war, or forbearance, or patience, must be brought into the field before his dream of a united and a free Italy is made real. It will never do to sneer at the statesman who instigated and organized the great movement which gave Lombardy and Tuscany back to Italian hands; never do with that hastily-gathered army to rush madly upon the redoubts and bastions of Verona.

It looks very much now as if there might be room for breathing time, and for consideration in the interval. As we write, there is not a little of hard work to be done yet on the Volturno. Austria, indeed, holds aloof; she will not sacrifice anything by coming to help her friend Francis there at Capua. But she is not idle; all along the Venetian and the Istrian shores her fortresses are being doubled in their effective capacity; the muskets bristle every where between Mantua and the Adriatic.

The poor Irish brigade, of which we had our mention last month, has done its little work—severe but soon over. The stalwart sergeants of the Green Isle will date their next letters from Turin, where we hope they may find better rations than they drew from the larder of the Pope. Lamoricière, too, whom we have watched from time to time, has finished this third epoch of his career most ingloriously: not that he was poltroon, or knave, or incapable. For he was neither; but, on the contrary, a bold, brave, accomplished soldier, who had conquered a reputation for military capacity in the hard school of Algeria, and for sterling honesty in his open and straightforward advocacy of Republicanism in the days of 1849 and 1850. He was always honestly stern, too, in his support of the Papal Church, its rights, its sanctities, and, unfortunately, all its traditions. With better material to sustain him, he would have made a better show outside of Ancona: but the hireling Swiss, the decrepit soldiers of the Pope, the Irish brigade, and the injustice of the cause, were his ruin. It is the way, just now that he is fallen, to speak of him as a disappointed man, who, failing of his share in the military honors of the Crimea or of Lombardy, sought this final chance of retrieving the brilliant promise of his early fame in Algeria; but we love rather to think of him as a brave man who has made at last a grave mistake—not the first of brave men, surely, who has given his fortune to a cause that was no way worthy of him.

On the same field which saw the discomfiture of Lamoricière there fell a certain Marquis de Pimodan, wounded seriously in battle, and having been taken prisoner died the following day. His name is not widely known; but it may not be uninteresting to your Western readers to know that he was a young scion (not forty at his death) of one of the bravest and oldest of the Vendean families of France. Born to an honored name and a small fortune, he gave himself up to a military career with a passion that would not brook delay, and that would not forego old family prejudices of royalty and Church supremacy. In the years '49 and '50 he was a soldier of Austria by voluntary enlistment, and led so brave and dashing a career while in the Imperial army that he was rewarded with special favor and was given the command of a regiment.

Upon the cessation of hostilities he returned to France, where he married a beautiful girl, who was a daughter of the house of Montmorency, and brought him an ample fortune. But war had more charms for him than the dalliance of a gay life in Paris; so he took a command in the Papal army—feeding thus his love for the old Church traditions of his native province of Brittany, and gratifying his passion as a soldier. He fought bravely, and died calmly. His widow still lives in France.

We tell the story of the Marquis de Pimodan because the name of his family has made it notable; but who can tell how many ambitious souls made the last struggle for a name in that motley army which fought under the colors of the Pope? How many rich masses in these Paris churches, and at humbler altars of Ireland, shall be said for those who fought and died in the last great battle for the Father of the Church?

As for Florence, it has rejoiced more than Umbria itself over the victorious march of King Emanuel's army. The royal proclamation, which your papers will have given, was greeted every where with most boisterous enthusiasm; especially the postscript, which was credited to the large, free hand of the King himself. "They call me ambitious," he says; "yes, my ambition is to restore the principles (i principii) of order," etc.

Now it happens that by dropping one i from the word principii, the King is made to say that he will restore the princes (principi), i.e., Dukes of Parma, Tuscany, etc.—a fact which the mischief-makers of the city were not slow to avail themselves of, alleging an error of the printer. But confidence in Victor Emanuel is not so easily shaken; and they who ventured to read the proclamation under this revised form were greeted with a (solenne fischiata) regular good hissing. And the crowd who compelled the proper reading of the proclamation moved on to the Pitti Palace, where they insisted, over and over again, that the stout Prince Carignan should receive their vivas with smiles and bows. It is worthy of note too, that, in the enthusiasm of the night, a certain Perugian refugee was crazy enough to set up the cry of "Viva la Repubblica!" But so far from accepting it kindly, the crowd had nearly pommelled him to death, except a few soldiers of the National Guard had volunteered his protection and removal to quieter quarters. Indeed, just now, the Florentines add to their enthusiastic admiration of Victor Emanuel a half hope that Florence may yet become the capital of United Italy. And why not? Italy has no queenlier city; rich meadows flank it that are free from the malaria of the Campagna; rich hill-sides flank the meadows that are rich in wine and in olives; a well-established and well-ordered railway runs down to Pisa and Leghorn; besides which are the memories—Galileo, and Dante, and Brunelleschi, and Donati, and Michael Angelo. There are poorer capitals every way than Florence would be.

But no matter for the capital, no matter for monarchism or republicanism; let Italy only go on unitedly to declare itself free, and to make itself free, and to show a calm power over itself under access of freedom, and we will rejoice in her triumph, though she should set up her capitol under the melancholy towers of Ravenna.

To us, as every mail comes freighted with new tidings from Italy, the affairs of the Peninsula make the engrossing topic, and all the more just now that both the capitals of Paris and London are, for the time, deserted. The Queen is in the North, listening to the good Scotch preaching that may be heard near to Balmoral; or she is dashing over the German roads, to spend a fortnight's mourning at the funeral of the Prince's step-mother of Coburg-Gotha.

Traveling through Germany, not as a certain grandsire of hers traveled, years ago—poor George the First—all one side palsied, and he murmuring in jumbled, broken speech, "C'en est fait de moi—Osnabruck, Osnabruck!" which mention brings to mind expectancy of the new volumes of Carlyle's History of Frederick the Great. They are promised; and who does not wish to follow the career of the rare Frederick, when he is at length set free from the tutelage of that brutal hero father? Who, at least, that has fathomed the beginning of his story—that has struggled through the dreary maze of Margraves, and Kaisers, and Kurfürsts; going back to such hopelessly-dim date as 1000 A.D.; here and there catching a bright flash of wit, here and there seeing some intelligible face breaking through the centuries, here and there a live man talking or fighting, but, for the most part, meeting only mythical giants, or mythical dwarfs, dancing a confused devil's-dance in the diplomacy of Popes and Emperors and Electors?

It is altogether a curious beginning for a history. First, one or two placid and life-like pictures of the men we are to read about; and then a jump upon that sad entanglement of ancestry, and the gradual Prussian approaches to power. As if one were to open suddenly upon cleared land, with streams, and culture, and grassy fields; and then be decoyed back into dense, scrubby forest, wandering there half lost, yet tracking the way back slowly and fatiguingly to sunlight again, by certain tall trees (Kurfürsts or Kaisers) which are blazed, with Carlyle's Saxon hatchet-pen, with such marks as these: "Heavy Peg," "Staircase of Grumnitz," "Beneficence of Heaven;" and following such (hoping always to see the last of the old giants), one emerges at length into sunlight again, and finds himself just at the point where he started: a little more appetite, by reason of that rough scramble in the German forest of Margraves, and ready to brush on fast and sharp with the history of the baby Frederick.

Another notable thing in the book, as we get on with it, is the writer's superb disdain of certain classes of facts which ordinary historians have been at such pains to hunt for and set before us—i. e., details of treaties, dates, descriptions of court ceremonials, and histories of negotiation. Carlyle, in his grand manner, masses these all, troubling our memory only with the gist, and giving most of his painstaking and his wonderful pictorial power to exposition of the interior life of the men who made the courts. How that tobacco parliament chapter, and the sighs and grumblings of good Sophie over the doubtful double marriages, lets us see the working of courts as we never saw them before!

How it makes us wait for the volumes to come!

All this wide mention has grown out of Victoria's journey into Germany; and our talk of Victoria was prefaced by saying that London was deserted. So is Paris; and the Emperor and Empress are away. The journals will have told you which way they have traveled—to Savoy, Grenoble, afterward to Nice, and thence to Algiers. Of course it was an ovation all the way: these things are understood by the Imperialists, and it is not for outsiders to say how much was true and how much was provided.

Yet why provided?

The Empress is a pretty woman and a fond mother; are these not passports to sympathy and admiration every where? The Emperor is a strong man, who, in the disturbed political relations of the last ten years, has played his part more cleverly, and with rarer and keener foresight, than any sovereign in Europe; all which Savoyards and Marseillais and Algerines know full well—why not cheer?

Of course a powerful monarch can always command plaudits—a fact which the French Republicans iterate on every fête day of France—but, just now, where is the necessity?

The Prince of England had not a more decorous or enthusiastic welcome in the Canadas than the French Emperor in Algeria. An old Moorish palace received their Imperial Majesties, and they were entertained by an Oriental fête.

It is even possible that, while you have been surfeited with accounts of the Prince's progress, you have heard nothing of the Fantasia of Algiers. Yet the affair is worth its jotting down. The scene of it was an hour's ride away from the capital—a plain bounded by the scathed and burned hills of Africa, and dotted all over with white tents of Arabs, with horsemen and shining guns. The mountains of Kabylie, lifting a deep, dark blue beyond the hills, and the plain yellow with sand, save here and there oases of blooming green. First of all, defiling far from the left, came long trains of cattle and sheep, guided and guarded by the native herdsmen; then camels laden with merchandise, camels with pack-saddles, camels with huge water-sacks, and camels with waving plumes of ostrich feathers and tapestried cushions. Last of all is a company of armed and turbaned horsemen. An Algerine chief, brilliant with barbaric colors, commands the field; and little children of the desert rush wildly from camel to camel, quickening their march with pointed staves. Shrill Arabic music enlivens the tramp, and completes the picture of an Oriental convoy journeying through the desert.

Horsemen and camels and trooping women and children have fairly and fully deployed upon the plain, when a marauding company of Bedouins bursts from a copse upon the right and begins an attack. The frightened camels mass together; the women fill the air with shrieks; the rear horsemen spur forward to the defense.

They make a pretty tropical battle of it; a few of the maddest bite the dust in earnest; there is wild clashing of steel, and clouds of sand rise that look brazen in the fierce sunlight. It seems a dull chance for the convoy, the camels, and the frightened women, when—as in all good romance—a friendly tribe comes thundering from the eastward, with spears in rest and turbans flaming in the wind. The Empress claps her hands, and cries a pretty bravo! The marauding Bedouins are driven away, the camels troop into tedious line again, the bare-legged boys punch them with their sharp staves, the cavaliers bring up the rear again; and so the scene passes, as such scenes do in life and in theatres.

THAT sad Syrian imbroglio is still disturbing the quietude of all who have friends within reach of the infatuated Moslem. The minister of the Sultan has acted nobly, so far as he has gone; he has spared no official whose guilt was clearly determined; executions have succeeded each other with a horrible frequency; but the Druses are represented as nursing their wrath against the good occasion which is to come. The mutilated bodies of the assassins do not contribute to the tranquillity of the Maronites.

A late observer, writing nearly three months after the massacre, gives this revolting description of Dheir-el-Kamar:

"May God grant I may never again see such a sight as I witnessed three days ago at Dheir-el-Kamar! and such would be the prayer of any man who has been in that town since the massacre. Although the place was under the special government of the Sultan, no effort whatever has been made to bury the dead, even at this date of two months and a half after the tragedy. What has been done to hasten the disappearance of human bodies has been effected by the dogs, and wolves, and jackals of the surrounding districts. It was a fearful scene! Here stood, ninety days ago, a thriving town of 8000 souls and upward, and when the troubles in Lebanon broke out nearly two thousand Christians from various parts had sought refuge in the place. Where are now those images of God? Where are the comfortable homes, the thriving trades, the rich silk crops, the produce of grapes and of olives, the hundreds of working silk-looms that this population possessed? Where are the wives and daughters of these traders and land-owners, where the happy children, the hearty welcome which all strangers received, the wealth in dress and jewels with which the matrons were adorned? The men of the place—ay, and some of the women, too, for I counted no less than a dozen in one spot—the men are here; these corrupting masses of putrid skulls are all that remain of them. Their houses are all burned or pulled down; their property all plundered or destroyed; their women beggars in the streets of Beyrout; their male children hacked to pieces by the knives of the Druses. Among so many horrors it was difficult to select one place more fearful than another, but the Maronite Church and the Turkish Governor's divan, or receiving room, exceeded all I could have believed possible. The former is surrounded by a small court-yard, the door of which was shut. When we opened it the stench was something hardly to be conceived. On the pavement in front of the church, to which a large portion of the inhabitants had evidently fled for shelter, the dead bodies lay literally heaped in dozens one upon another, as they had been murdered and flung down. The steps up to the church are white, and down them was a broad purple mark of twenty or thirty feet long, from the interior of the altar-rails out far beyond the door, which told but too plainly the tale of murder. The body of the church is about the size of the Lock Chapel, in the Harrow Road; the court-yard is broader, but about half its length. But in no part of that church, on no inch of that court, could any man, put he his steps ever so nicely, walk without putting his foot on some part or other of a dead man's body. The skeletons are, with few exceptions, perfectly naked, for every survivor of the massacre that I have questioned—and more than a hundred have related the same tale to various parties in Beyrout—say so cold-blooded were the Druses in their murderous work, that, before butchering a man whose clothes were at all good, they first made him undress himself, and then hacked him to pieces with their long knives, thus preserving his garments uncut and unstained with blood. For some reason or other, however, they appear not to have taken the Maronite priests' clothes, as I observed many of the corpses still clad in the black coarse gown of the monks."

The admirable conduct of Abd-el-Kader at Damascus has called the attention of Europe to him as the fit ruler, and the only fit ruler (under the Sultan), for Syria. We quote this exposé of the current talk upon the matter:

"The difficulty in all deadly strifes between men of different races and faiths is the inexperience of all in matters lying beyond their own small circle of interests. The Arab can not enter into the feelings of the Frank, and the Frank has not the remotest conception of the views and ideas of the Moslem. There is no man but Abd-el-Kader who has seen Moslem and Christian life equally closely, and who can compare Western and Eastern civilization, and determine within a given area whether they can be reconciled, and if not, which must prevail. His natural sympathies are with the wild warriors of the Desert and the mountain, while his reverent admiration has been fairly and permanently won by the organization and aims of Christian society. His genius as a military chief commands the homage of every tribe of his great race. His unyielding fight for fifteen years for the emancipation of his country makes him the idol of all unconquerable hearts throughout the East. The holy war which he waged in the Prophet's name sets him forever above slander or suspicion in regard to the Faith; and yet experience has shown him why the Christians of all churches have as good a right to their religion as the Moslem. He may pity Jew and Christian for their religion, as every Moslem naturally does; but he has learned why they should be unmolested in it. He early saw what the propagation of a religion and civilization by the sword is like; and the ugliness of the spectacle in Algeria opened his eyes to its deformities in Syria and Arabia. Surely such a man is the one of all mankind to rule a country in which Moslem, Greek, Latin, and Armenian Christians, Jews, Druses, and Maronites can not live together in peace, and can not be separated. By his calling the tribes together in Algeria and Morocco to preserve the territory for the true Faith, and by his religious submission to defeat, captivity, and suppression, he has impressed the Faithful in all lands with the conviction of his being the most eminent servant of the Prophet in this age when the destinies of Islam are to be determined. By his making himself the refuge of the Christians in the late Damascus massacre he has proved himself to be up to the civilization of his time. Moreover, there is no experience of war, confusion, terror, triumph, defeat, or glory—no trial of danger, toil, want, or temptation—that is not more familiar to him than to other men. What the mountaineer feels in conquering or hiding he has felt. What survivors suffer in treading among the dead he has suffered. He has made his bed in the snow, and has escaped through smoke and fire kindled at the cavern's mouth. He has girded his waist tight to make hunger endurable; and he has preserved his temperance and holy poverty amidst the dainties of captured Christian tents and the treasures of undefended palaces. He knows what religious hatred is, and remembers it well while insisting that it can not be allowed. He has for many years adored the spirit of universal brotherhood, which he first heard of from Christians, and perceives to be assumed in every scheme of freedom and civilization. Thus, when the virulent Moslem lifts the sword in Syria, Abd-el-Kader is the man to stay his hand. When the Druses cant and lie, he is the man to rebuke the deceit, for no man living has so splendidly kept a faith so painfully pledged."

As an indication of the character of the chieftain, we quote farther this letter, which he has recently addressed to Cardinal Morlot, Archbishop of Paris:

"MOST EMINENT AND REVEREND LORD,—May the Most High prolong the duration of your archiepiscopal authority; Amen. On the occasion of the recent news, I thought of your noble qualities when I received the letter which your Eminence honored me with under date of the 10th August. Your Eminence has acquired fresh claims to my gratitude by the congratulations which you have deigned to address to me. They are an additional proof of your charity and sanctity. I feel myself most highly flattered by the attention with which the Emperor has deigned to honor a man whose only merit is that of having paid what he owed to his conscience. In my eyes it is a high distinction fallen to the lot of an unoccupied man—for he who only does his duty is not entitled to honors. A great subject of delight for me is the assistance which the Emperor and the French nation are giving to the inhabitants of Syria. It is not I who saved them, but the rays of the French Emperor's power, who has in all the corners of the world faithful servants ready to perform their duty. Deign to present my respects to the honorable ecclesiastics who surround you, and to my friends. May God prolong your days! Written on the part of SEID ABD-EL-KADER BEN MO-IDDIN."

Under the Eastern Rubrique we may mention farther a strange rumor, to the effect that Sir Henry Bulwer is actively conspiring to secure the dethronement of the present Sultan, and the elevation of his brother, Abdul-Azis, who represents the old and unyielding Turkish element. Of course it is a rumor which hardly receives English comment, and yet it is set forth in the Russian journals with every particularity of detail. All we may safely infer from it is, that the present British minister is not upon the best of terms with his majesty Abdul-Mejid.

The Presse regales its readers with unwearying narrative of the new persecutions to which Christians are subject in every corner of Syria; and in all French papers we find the best of arguments for the continuance of French occupation.

The first little ripple of war-news has just now reached us from the stir of the great war-fleet that lies in the waters of China. Sixty pennants they count there, all told; and before this page shall reach the eye of our readers the way to Peking will be open. Meantime, and with a much rarer sagacity, the Russian officials are pressing a march down from the northward with only a courtly diplomacy to aid them. Every year discovers new progress of theirs along the North Pacific coast, and a new influence over the Tartar tribes that live southward of the Amoor. Before many months are over, probably before the European war is ended, a telegraphic line will connect the region of the Amoor with St. Petersburg.

A pretty bit of Chinese illustration of the British defeat of last year is thus described by a visitor at Ta-lien-lwan:

"The braves are in all the glories of yellow ochre and bright vermilion. The barbarians' despair is depicted in every variety of gloomy, sombre colors. Admiral Hope stands on the bridge of a steamer, his face black with woe. But our Chinaman appreciates his signal gallantry, for he is waving on his men regardless of the shower of bullets most liberally bestowed upon him. The gun-boat has a magnificent main-top, into which a 32-pounder has been hoisted. Its shot falls harmless among the braves. Not so the guns from the fort. One of these is pointed on a cutter containing two British naval and two military officers in full uniform. The shot streams full upon their faces, which exhibit the most curious expression of passive endurance. A regiment of Tartars—due to the imagination of the painter—sabres the marines and blue-jackets in the mud, while three mandarins in a lofty chair of state look serenely upon the fight."

It will be remembered that the British steamer Cormorant was sunk last year in the Pei-ho: the Chinese have succeeded in raising the vessel, and after great labor have removed the engines to a smaller craft of their own. But the engines would not work, and no one could set them going. So Sang-ho-lin-sin sent down four watchmakers from Peking. "You are accustomed to machines," said he; "set that barbarian machine to work or I will cut off your heads." The unhappy watchmakers succeeded in lighting the fires and inducing the smoke to ascend through the funnel. This seems to have contented their taskmaster, for, though the engines are not working, we have no account of the watchmakers' decapitation.

The Chinese with their Cormorant remind us of the British capitalists and the Great Eastern: it is only in local papers now, that date from the neighborhood of Milford Haven, that we find any detailed accounts of the great ship. We cite some of the later developments:

"At low water on Friday there was a general movement of those connected with the great ship to search for the wonderful and gigantic forms of vegetable and animal life which it was supposed would be found vegetating on the ship's bottom. It was to these weeds and luxuriant vegetation that the comparatively slow rate of speed was attributed, and it was their removal, as the public were over and over again told, that was to have the effect of giving an addition of at least two knots an hour. There was no doubt, it was said, that the speed was in her, but the weeds outside were too much; remove them, and New York was within seven or eight days of England. Judge, then, of the astonishment of the directors and others when, after floundering about in the mud, duly provided with lanterns, and stumbling over the iron bars of the gridiron, nothing was to be found but some wretched stubby little hairy tufts and a few diminutive 'limpets,' among which one of half an inch in length was secured by Mr. Appold as a veritable giant among those parasitical mollusca. There are many portions of the ship's side and bottom, of several feet in area, upon which not a solitary weed, or shell, or any form of foulness is to be found. A careful calculation, founded on an examination of several large areas, shows that on an average there is one tuft of weed to about every two square feet of surface. Those tufts are small circular spots, very closely resembling in form, size, and general appearance those hirsute developments upon the human chin known as 'imperials.' They are not even mossy or spongy, and do not, therefore, absorb and hold any quantity of water; they are formed of coarse, stubborn hair, and the most hardy species of barnacles could not hope to obtain pasturage or herbage upon them. The general appearance of the side of the ship below the water line is that of an old brick wall, bronzed with age, slightly covered with gray and yellow lichen. The rich vegetation which covered the ship while in Southampton water was almost entirely removed before she left for America, and any that remained was effectually cleared off in the Atlantic. It was necessary for the purpose of preserving the ship to clean and scrape her, and give her some coats of paint; but there was clearly no necessity for beaching her with the view of obtaining any increased speed. All the scraping and painting in the world will not add the fraction of a knot to her capabilities in this respect."

Editor's Drawer.

THE Publishers announce, with more than usual satisfaction, that, with this number, their Magazine enters on its Twenty-Second Volume. So rapid has been its progress, so wide its reach, and so large its hold upon the English reading and speaking people in all sections of the earth, that it has become a bond of sympathy and union among men of various climes and every pursuit. Its resources are inexhaustible. It illustrates with pencil and pen the most distant realms, and reflects the world of matter and mind on its pages. Now is the best time in the whole year to begin the reading of it; and the Drawer is requested to intimate to his good-natured friends that they can not please him more than by sending thousands of clubs and tens of thousands of new subscribers to be added to the lists of readers for the year 1861.

A MODEL as well as a monument of patience and perseverance must be one of the subscribers to the Magazine and a contributor to the Drawer, who resides in El Paso, Mexico. He writes to the Drawer that he has sent, within the last five years, two and a half dollars five times to the publishers, and has received but two numbers of the Magazine in all that time. He now remits a quarter eagle again, and hopes for better luck. May he get it! The mails are very irregular. Postmasters in those parts have an eye to good things, and the Drawer is opened by the way. But when Old Mexico, as well as New Mexico, is annexed to the universal Yankee nation, we will regulate the mails down there, so that our patient and persevering friend shall get twelve Drawers full every year.

THE Nebraska law which the Drawer commended to the Common Council of New York has excited a deal of attention. It was enacted by the Legislature that, "For the violation of the third section of an act to license and regulate the sale of malt, spirituous, and vinous liquors, $25, and on proof of the violation of said section, or any part thereof, the justice shall render judgment for the whole amount of costs, and be committed to the common jail until the sum is paid."

One of the newspapers published in the Territory, the Nebraskan, copies the Drawer's remarks, and says: "We have examined the manuscript of that law, on file in the Secretary's office, and are compelled to admit that it is just so."

Another of the newspapers, the Advertiser, quotes another law on the books in these words: "That no horse over the age of two years shall be allowed to run at large; and the owner of such animal, found running at large, shall be liable to a fine of five dollars for the first offense, and ten dollars for any subsequent offense."

The owner is only to be fined in case he is found running at large. This law is a good one, but not so efficient as the one that commits the justice to jail till the fine he imposes is paid.

OLD BUNDY lived in Alleghany County, and being down in the city some one said to him: "It is quite a mountainous country you live in, Mr. Bundy, is it not?"

"Why, no," said the old man; "it ain't exactly mountaneous, but it's rayther a hilltaneous country, that's a fact."

THE Drawer has many laughing readers along the classic Valley of the Tallahatchie—a considerable river of the seventh magnitude, which courses its sluggish way through North Mississippi; but they have never seen therein—the Drawer, we mean—the name, so familiar to them all, of "Old Billy"—elongated into William Guzman by his friends on state occasions.

"Old Billy" was keeper of the ferry across the Tallahatchie at the little town of Belmont, and was greatly respected and revered by his colored brethren all the country around as a pious and orthodox Hard Shell. On one occasion, the heavy rains having widened and greatly augmented the impetuosity of the stream, an ox-driver, the color of charcoal, with a wagon heavily laden, drove his "team" into the boat; and as the old man turned his wheel and drew off from shore, the ox-driver, looking uneasily forth upon the turbid stream, appealed to this reverend ferryman:

"I say, ung Billy, s'pose dem ropes break, whar you reckon we'd go to?"

"I reckon you'd stay in de boat," answered Old Billy.

"Yes, but"—continued the other—"de boat mought be in heben 'fore we know it."

Old Billy looked upon his young disciple with the utmost scorn and contempt, and replied:

"Did you ever hear of a boat gwine to heben?"

"Whar de ole ship ob Zion?" promptly asked the other.

This was a stunner. Old Billy, being a Hard Shell of the strictest kind, could not gainsay the existence and destination of this illustrious and sacred craft. So eying his questioner for a minute with extreme annoyance, he at length uttered a groan, and said:

"Dat boat warn't made ob wood, it was made ob faith." And, as if emboldened by a new idea perfectly unanswerable, he added: "And it didn't go to heben neither. It jist went to de shore and 'livered de passengers."

This explanation was rather too much for the younger darkey; and deferring to the greater age and biblical learning of his "elder brudder," he resigned himself and team to the care of Providence and the nautical skill of William Guzman.

ALL the ignorance is not confined "out West," nor among the Hard Shells.

A very worthy minister, settled not a hundred miles from Boston, was one Sabbath morning descanting upon the importance of plain speaking: "Why, my hearers," said he, "St. Paul never used any 'highfalutin' expressions. No! He always spoke the plain Anglo-Saxon language!"

At a parish meeting, or something of the sort, in the same town, a Mr. L—— was nominated for the office of vice-superintendent of the Sunday-school. Before it could be put to vote, the nominee arose in considerable trepidation, and said he "must decline the nomination, as he did not feel able to give advice to any one, much less to the superintendent."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL superintendent, on a visit to another Sunday-school, was invited to make some remarks. The lesson of the school was on the Creation and the Garden of Eden. From this he took his cue, and expatiated on the delights and beauties that must have been in that sinless Paradise—the trees and flowers, the birds and animals, "and the little children playing among the bushes!"

A MINISTER of the same town found, one Sabbath, a notice of a public meeting which had been cut from the Saturday's newspaper, and placed in his desk for him to read to his congregation. But, by a strange coincidence, there happened to be printed on the other side of the same slip the advertisement of a certain shoe-dealer, a prominent member of his church, and without turning the paper to read the other side, as the advertisement met his eye, the good man concluded it was expected he would read it, and accordingly, to the surprise of all, he announced, at the usual point for reading notices, that "George S. B—— keeps constantly on hand and for sale a large and well-selected assortment of boots and shoes, which he will sell low for cash, at No. — Street;" and added, "Brother B—— is a worthy member of this church and society, and deserving the patronage of the congregation."

The consternation of Brother B—— may better be imagined than described.

"APPROPOS of speeches from the little folks, I send you the following: I was telling Johnny's mother about a railroad accident by which a cartman had both legs crushed, from the effect of which he died the same day. Little Johnny, about six years old, stood by, greatly interested in the account.

"Thay, Doctor," he broke in, with his eyes wide open, and in his lisping way, 'wath the horth hurt?'

"I don't know. I was more interested in the man, and didn't think of the horse," I answered.

"Well, I don't care," said he, taking my reply as an implied rebuke; 'a live horth ith better 'n a dead man, any way.'"

"I HEREWITH send you the copy of an inscription on a tomb-stone in Accomack County, Virginia, which is brief and comprehensive—expressive of all that the most labored eulogy could say, yet modest and without tendency to the ridiculous. I have copied it verbatim, and given each line as it appears on the time-worn stone:

Here lyes the Body of COLL. TULLY ROBINSON late of Accomack County in Virginia
Who was born August the 31st Anno 1653
and departed this life November the 1st

A Gentleman Honourable in his day an Ornament of all Places of Honour
He was Loyall to his Prince Unshaken to his friend and a true Son of the Church of England."

A CLERICAL correspondent, doubtless a grave as well as reverend divine, sends us words from the tombs—epitaphs which he has gleaned from the fields of church-yard literature. Some of them are too trifling for our pages, but we give a few of the most suitable:

On Mrs. Ann Jennings.

Some have children, some have none;
Here lies the mother of twenty-one.

Relict of Sir Gregory Page, Bart.

In the 56th year of her age.
In 67 months she was tapped 60 times, &
Had taken away 240 gallons of water.

I murdered was upon the fell,
And by the man I knew full well;
By bread and butter which he'd laid,
I being harmless was betrayed.
I hope he will rewarded be,
That laid the poison there for me.

A CORRESPONDENT in the South, in a letter to the Drawer, gives a description of a Christmas on the plantation:

"Just as day began to dawn we were aroused from our slumbers by the usual Christmas-morning salutation of 'Christmas gift, massa!' 'Christmas gift, mistis!'

"Aha! who is that creeping softly up the back steps? Oh, I see! Christmas gift, Sallie!"

"Dar! ha, ha, ha! Massa done kotch me!"

"But there is a little favorite stealing along, that massa don't choose to catch.

"Christmas gift, massa!" shouts John, clapping his hands with delight. 'I'se kotchted massa! Please buy me a fiddle, Sah!'

"There is another group at the back gate; and many voices are ringing with, 'Please buy me this,' and 'Please buy me that.'

"Please buy me a wife, massa," says Geordie, a youth of sixteen.

"Whew! do you want to break me? Off to the 'quarter,' you noisy rascals, and get your breakfast."

"And away they scamper.

"As the negroes had behaved well, and made a good crop for massa, they were to have a fine Christmas dinner, and a dance in the evening.

"Dinner was served on a pleasant sloping lawn, with no canopy but the soft blue sky. On the upper side of the slope might have been seen the picturesque cabins of the darkeys; and on the lower side a little stream rippled along, edged by a gigantic growth of cane, that still looked green and flourishing.

"A bill of fare, following the arrangement of the table, would have read something in this way: Turkey and Oranges; Chickens and Almonds; Roast Pig and Raisins; Cake and Cabbage; and so on to the end of the chapter. And as no beverage more exhilarating than coffee is allowed on a Southern plantation, the entertainment passed off quietly and pleasantly.

"At an early hour in the evening the musical instruments (consisting of two violins and a tambourine) strike up a lively tune, and the dance commences.

"Pat is the hero of this department. 'Make way for Uncle Pat!' shout the little darkeys; and see with what an air of conscious superiority he steps forth.

"He commences slowly and gracefully. That pirouette was a chef-d'œuvre. But now the music inspires him; it has made its way to his very fingers' ends; 'he fairly outdoes all his former out-dancings.'

"The admiring spectators appreciate his performance, and the merry ha-ha's make the old rafters ring again.

"And those ladies in that reel, or quadrille, or whatever you choose to call it—see with what a natural ease they 'trip upon the light fantastic toe;' in and out—in many a winding bout.' How they do enjoy it!

"But time would fail me to tell of the Sallies, the Bessies, the Gracies, the muslins, the ribbons, the laces; the skins of ebony, and teeth of pearl; and of those dark Apollos, who fancy they see 'Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt.' Suffice it to say, that fun and frolic are carried into the wee hours of the night, and then—

"To bed we creep;

By whispering winds soon lull'd to sleep."

THE humors of New England do not often find their way into print; but this story of rough practical fun will amuse the reader. It comes from a correspondent in Massachusetts:

"The Connecticut River boatmen of years long since gone used to be 'some' on a time. One Independence Day, about the year 1834, a party of them started for Hartford, bound on a cruise down the river for a day's sport, and more particularly an Independence celebration in the 'good old-fashioned style,' as Captain Henry S—, of Northampton, observed previous to starting from H— in the old-fashioned stern-wheeled steamer John Cooley, taken from her regular business of towing freight-boats over the Falls at Enfield, and fitted this day with every convenience for going it strongly, for once at least.

"When off Saybrook, about the middle of the day, it was proposed to fire the noon salute, in honor of the day, from a small field-piece borrowed for the occasion. Several of the boat-hands were detailed, under Captain Broughton A—, to handle the piece. After ramming home the charge, it was found impossible to withdraw the rammer—whether from the wood's swelling, the cannon's shrinking, or the gunner's incapacity to haul straight, deponent saith not; at any rate, the rammer could not be got out. One end protruded from the mouth of the piece some three feet; and Captain A—, like a true river seaman as he was, took the end of a tow-line, made a clove-hitch around the ramrod, sung out for volunteers to 'hang-on' to it; which was quickly responded to by two or three of the crew, ready to obey any order that came from him, especially on that day.

"Now, boys, when I touch her off, you hang on to that rope like death to a dead boatman," said Captain A—.

"Ay, ay, Sir!" responded the crew.

"One, two, three, and away she goes. Hang on to the line for your lives, boys!" shouted Captain A—. And they did 'hang on.' Old Grandpa H— was carried over the bow of the boat head over heels, followed so closely by Eb. M— and Captain Henry S—, that the noise of the gun had hardly ceased when there was an outcry from the water of 'Help! help!' that set them all to thinking and acting too. The boat's headway was stopped, and the three gunners rescued from the water in a half-drowned condition. When they had fairly come to themselves, it can be easily imagined how they walked into Captain Broughton, as he was called; blessings, or something worse, were showered on his head with all the river-pathos imaginable; but as no serious result arose worse than words, Captain A— solaced them with the remark: 'Why didn't you hang on to the line, you fools? and then you wouldn't have got wet!' Whether this consoled them or not, I do not believe they have ever practiced gunnery since under Captain A—."

THE diffident correspondent in Indiana who sends the next sketch is always welcome:

"When very young I lived in the city of L—, and we had a few local notabilities that I have never in after years been able to forget. Among them was generous, kind-hearted, queer-looking Charley W—. He was the picture of a good-sized beer-keg perambulating on a good-sized pair of nine-pins. His immense shirt-ruffles of immaculate whiteness, and his coat of the brightest blue, adorned with a number of the largest brass buttons, I can never forget. His face was as red as good eating and drinking could make it; and there was always a gracious smile upon it for all he met. Our good citizens took it into their heads to elect him Mayor; his manners were perfectly magnificent in his condescension to his constituents, and a stranger could not visit the city without becoming the recipient of the Mayor's favors. A short time after he was elected, Lord Morpeth was obliged to stop in the place all day, to wait for the evening boat for Pittsburgh. Of course this was a grand occasion for our newly-elected dignitary, and he received the English nobleman with the greatest empressement, and displayed to him the beauties of the town and surrounding scenery, and also those of the various combinations of liquor that are popular with Kentuckians during the hot months. Juleps, slings, cobblers, cherry-bounce, and many others too numerous to mention, had all to be partaken of by the party. His noble guest seemed particularly careful to partake with great moderation; but Charley considered it due to his guest that he should drain every glass. By the time the boat arrived he was in a glorious state, loved the whole world, and was anxious to show it. He made a long farewell speech to Lord Morpeth; and just as that gentleman was going to turn away and step on the plank from the boat, he seized his hand once more, and exclaimed: 'By-the-way, Morpeth, I had almost, in my grief at parting with you, neglected to send any message to that most estimable lady, Victoria. Say to her that I, the Mayor of this city, send her my profoundest regards; and should she ever visit this glorious Union, and will come to our beautiful city—the rival of Cincinnati, miscalled the Queen of the West—that Dick D— and myself will guarantee to her the very jolliest time she ever had in her life!'

Lord M. shook his hand once more, promised to deliver the message, and left in the midst of a round of cheers and laughter.

"Poor Charley W—! how he would have delighted in welcoming the Prince of Wales, who doubtless would have found the promised reception more to his taste than that of his mother. But I have lost sight of him for many years; and never do I expect to find a warmer heart than beat in the be-ruffled breast of Charley, the first Mayor of our rising city."

THE following story has two merits. It is literally true (or was, in the time of it), and has never been in print. Skipp and Town were proprietors of a line of omnibuses, once popular, now among the things that were. In their employ was a driver named Jemmy—a good man, careful to get all his fares, civil to his passengers, deferential to his employers, and, in fact, quite without fault; but Jemmy had a queer habit. At the end of every trip he retired for a few minutes to the hay-mow, and every effort made to find out the nature of his errand there was a failure. If any intruder made his appearance, Jemmy descended at once, and took his seat quietly upon his box. Impelled by an intense desire to find out the reason for so strange a whim, one of his employers hid himself one day in the hay-mow, and awaited the return of Jemmy. In good time he ascends the stairs, looks cautiously about him, takes off his hat, and empties into it some small silver, the proceeds of his trip. He proceeds to divide the money carefully into two piles, repeating, as each piece was counted, "Sixpence for old Skip, sixpence for Jemmy," and so on, to the end. But there was an odd sixpence. "Now," says Jemmy, "I wonder what I ought to do with that odd sixpence? I do all the hard work; am out in all weather: that ought to be mine; but hold on! Old Skip furnishes team and stage and feed, and so forth. I guess, on the whole, we'll throw up for that." Up goes the sixpence with a fillip. "Head, by gracious! Skip wins it! Well, let him have it this time." Up jumps the employer. "Hold, Jemmy! I won that last sixpence fairly. If you hadn't given it to me, you never should have driven a stage for me again!"

"I AM not troubled much," writes an up-country friend, "with 'corruptible things, as silver and gold,' but I owe you many a hearty laugh; and as I have nothing else to pay with, will you accept the following as 'part pay?' It relates to myself, and is strictly true:

"Several years ago I received the unparalleled distinction of being invited to deliver an address on Agriculture before the Agricultural Society of an adjoining county. Now, be it known to all concerned, that I know as much about agriculture as a tadpole does about steering by the North star, and was about as fit to make such a speech as an ox would be to enter as salesman in a china-store. I, however, 'with great diffidence, accepted' the distinguished post.

"On the day set apart to hear what I thought to be the great speech, unfortunately a cold, drizzly, damp, disagreeable day thrust itself in unasked and unannounced. It was the day on which jennets and jacks were to be exhibited. About noon the few hundreds who were present were clustered about the stand to hear the 'orator.' I felt the dignity of my position. I rose, and soared, and sailed. I was more apt at physical demonstration than Booth, more eloquent than Cicero, more learned than Dick. In what I thought one of my happiest flights of fancy, when I was vainly endeavoring to hide my want of knowledge by well-selected words and a succession of gorgeous images, an ass on the opposite side of the ring began one of those grand, imposing, thrilling caliopean (?) overtures to a concert for which he is so famous. A wag, who sat just behind me, who had not 'the fear of God before his eyes, and being instigated by the Devil,' arose, and pointing his lean, lank, ligneous, famine-stricken looking finger just over my shoulder, said, in a stentorian voice, "One at a time! One at a time, over there!"

"I 'subsided.'"

"STOPPING for a short time last fall in one of the interior counties in Missouri, twelve miles distant from a post-office—mail once a week—my letters were brought down, and among them one from a strange post-office. On opening it, I found that I must have a namesake in that vicinity, and that I had, through mistake, received his letter, which contained the refusal of an offer of marriage. As I had partly finished the letter before I discovered my mistake, I went through with it, discovered its unique character, made a copy of it, and returned the original to the post-office, to await its rightful owner. I send you the copy verbatim from the original, except the names and dates:

"DEAR FRIEND,—Your letter exprises me werry much—it all most give me a dutch chill—I am sorey to larn you are in wich a bad situation and cannot conveintly help your self—I am sorey to tell you that I cannot help your situation—If it was in my power to help you, I would help, but, John it is out of my power to do so—but I think you are in as good a situation as ever eny body was in, for I now a single is as easy a life to live as eny, at best you may know I think so er I would not stay single—but John perhaps you think different from what I do, perhaps the fit has come on you now to marcy—and when any body takes that fit their notion is changed mitely, at best I think so, I don't know for I never had the fit yet—but John if the fit is come on you bare it paciently as you can—and try to get some body to say yes, I would be glad to say yes if I could—but it is out of my power—I am always sorey when any body calls on me to help them and I cannot—you must excuse me this time—your letter was read with great pleasure—these few lines leaves me well, and hope when they come safe to hand they will find you enjoyin the same blessing—good bye for this time

"Yours as ever—"

TRAVELERS through Central Vermont, in days of horse-flesh and mail-stage, will remember Peter Bates, always called Uncle Peter, who at one time kept an inn near the centre of the State. He was a great judge of horse-flesh.

Once a spirited young mare was led up to the hotel, and quite a crowd soon gathered to see her. The owner spoke of her good points, boasted of her speed, and said she could trot a mile in three minutes. Presently along came Uncle Peter, and hearing the talk, carefully looked the mare over; and then, removing his short pipe, said,

"Boys, I don't see but one reason why the mare can't trot a mile in three minutes."

"What is it? What is it, Uncle Peter?" asked the young tyros, anxious to learn from one of such acknowledged skill in such matters.

"Why," said he, "the distance is too great for so short a time!"

Wasn't there a wild shout as soon as the hearers could "take in" the wisdom of the reply.

THE following is a fact: "Our sidewalks are paved in most cases with granite slabs. A short time since one of our most popular milliners took up one of these slabs before her door, and put down a marble one, with the following engraved upon it:

"MRS. DURAND'S

"MILLINERY ROOM."

"A countryman passing by, was attracted by the white slab, and reading the lady's name, exclaimed, 'Well, if this ain't the beatenest town I ever saw! What in the world did they bury this woman in the sidewalk for?'"

THE Drawer is deeply in debt to the kind correspondent who furnishes the following cluster of anecdotes from the recollections of our last war:

"Sam, the negro servant attached to the staff mess of the First Pennsylvania Regiment, was a trump. He possessed in a wonderful degree all the qualifications of a successful forager. Was the mess short of a necessary or a delicacy (and this was, generally speaking, always), and the article was to be had in camp, Sam was always sure to get it—honestly if he could, otherwise if he must. During the whole campaign not an officer of the mess could charge him with an abstraction to the value of a dime, while other messes were continually lamenting the loss of eatables and drinkables at the hands of their dishonest servants.

"Sam was a genius as well as a trump. When the order was given to land at Vera Cruz it so happened that, when our turn came, it was quite dark. The surf-boats came alongside, each taking their complement of men, with the officers attached to the detachment. The boat in which we embarked had on board principally the field and staff, with probably twenty men. Sam, of course, accompanied his mess. The boats were beached within, say, twenty feet of the shore, and the men jumped out in about three feet of water, and waded ashore. The sailors who rowed the boats, however, stood alongside, ready to carry ashore on their brawny shoulders any of the officers who did not wish to get wet. Most of the officers, however, took to the water, to show the men thus early in the campaign that they were ready to share with them any danger or hardship. Sam watched his chance, and, favored by the darkness, very coolly got astride the shoulders of the nearest sailor, and was carried ashore dry-shod, and as carefully set down, high and dry, as though he had been General Scott himself!

"The joke was too good to keep, and as Sam was the only 'culled pusson' that came off the Potomac, the sailors made common cause against him, and were determined to hunt him up, and, as they said, 'take it out of his black hide.' This was, of course, unknown to any of us, and least of all to Sam. The next morning it was necessary to send him on board the ship for some forgotten article, and when he returned his own mother would not have recognized him. He was no longer a shining black—he was blue, purple, and livid. The sailors had beaten him within an inch of his life. Poor Sam paid dearly for his joke. During the whole time we were before Vera Cruz Sam never could be induced to go within a mile of the shore.

"SAM was not only a trump and a genius; he was a great coward as well. Some days after this our regiment was ordered to the heights overlooking the city. The fire from the forts and castle was at times very severe, and the large shells could be distinctly heard booming through the air, and, dropping in the loose sand, would generally imbed themselves without exploding. Sam had followed the fortunes of his masters to the field, but it was noticed, after the firing became pretty severe, and several unsuccessful attempts had been made to dislodge us by light troops, Sam was nowhere to be found. After holding the position all day, we were relieved in the evening by another regiment. On our way back to camp, descending the hill, the colonel saw the outlines of a human figure covered over with sand, and thinking some poor fellow who had received his quietus was temporarily placed there until his comrades could find time to give him Christian burial, was in the act of turning over the body, when who should pop up his woolly head but Sam.

"'Why, you black rascal, what are you doing here? Are you hurt?'"

"'No, Massa Colonel, dis chile tain't hurt, but he come mighty near it. I tell you what, Massa Colonel, dis chile can stand de grape-shot an' de six-pounders an' de escopets, but when dey begin to fire de Pennsylvania Dutch ovens he always hide hisself!'"

"The 'Dutch ovens' were the immense shells, of course.

"WHEN the Fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers were preparing for the Mexican War a camp for instruction was held near Springfield. Colonel Baker had on one occasion ordered the regiment to parade for inspection on a certain day. Judge his surprise, on riding through the camp on his way to the head of his regiment, to find one entire company 'lying around loose' under the trees, while, monopolizing an extra shady place, lay stretched at full length the first sergeant.

"COLONEL. 'Why, sergeant, what is the meaning of this? Why have you not your men on parade, Sir?'"

"SERGEANT (without rising, and looking lazily over his shoulder at the Colonel). 'We're about concluded not to parade to-day, Colonel!'"

"It was noticed afterward that the company did parade, and that when they came up, it was in double-quick time.

"A REAL jolly good fellow was Dr. S—. I was introduced to him just as the steamer North Star was leaving her dock at New York for Europe. For the first twenty-four hours 'Richard was himself;' but that fell destroyer, who spares neither age, sex, nor condition—sca-sickness—seized him, and nothing more was seen of the jolly Doctor for several days. We had left the Banks, and were steaming along beautifully, when one morning I saw the Doctor's head emerging from the lower regions. But what a face!—long, lugubrious, distressed—his hair not cared for, dress untidy, eyes blood-shot. I could scarce believe this apparition was the jolly Doctor who had kept us all in a roar the first day out.

"'Well, my dear Doctor, how do you feel by this time?'"

"'Feel!' said he—and there was an unmistakable earnestness in his eye—'feel! why I feel as though I had but two objects in life now: one is, to put my foot once more on terra firma; and the other, to find out and whip the fellow who wrote "A Life on the Ocean Wave!"'"

"At the close of the Mexican War, the First Pennsylvania Regiment of Volunteers was sent up the river, in order to be disbanded at Pittsburgh. On their way up one of the poor sick fellows died. The boat was hauled up alongside a wood-yard, a rough coffin made, and a file of men, with drum and fife, proceeded a short distance into the timber, where a grave had been hastily dug, to pay the last sad respect to the dead soldier. One of his companions, also much wasted with the disease that so fearfully decimated our ranks, staggered ashore to accompany the detachment, but being too weak to follow, seated himself on a log, and with his face buried in his hands, on hearing the Dead March played by the drum and fife, gave vent to a torrent of tears. Almost in sight of home, the thought that his turn would probably come next, overpowered the weak nerves of the soldier. While sorrowing thus, he was rudely accosted by a rough woodsman,

"'I say, stranger! I reckon you've hearn that tune afore, time of the war?'"

"'Heard it,' answered the poor fellow, as he looked up at his interlocutor through his tears; 'heard it, did you say? why, the very birds learned to sing it in Mexico!'"

"IN a certain town in East Tennessee," writes a friend to the Drawer, "containing from six to eight thousand inhabitants, and within one hundred and fifty miles of C—, there resided not long since a very learned Yankee, who held the exalted position of 'Professor' in 'the college' at that place. When our Professor came to — he was still in the enjoyment of single blessedness; but, like all other professors, his prefix rendered him quite popular, especially with the softer sex, and it was not long before he found himself negotiating for a matrimonial alliance with a Tennessee belle. The wedding-day soon arrived, and the Professor presented himself at the office of the County Clerk to get 'a pair o' licenses.'"

"'By Act of Assembly' the clerk is compelled to require a bond for twelve hundred and fifty dollars, with security, of the person obtaining license to marry, 'to prevent unlawful marriages.' It is, however, considered a mere matter of form, as any name will be taken as security, however irresponsible the parties may be. But our Yankee, it seems, was not posted in the laws of his adopted State, and was perfectly dumb-struck on being required to give security for so large an amount.

"'Twelve hundred and fifty dollars!' he exclaimed, 'I had no idea it was so much; but I'm in for it now, and can't back out. But it is unnecessary to give a bond. You know I'm good for the whole amount, but I have only nine hundred dollars now, which I will pay down, and the balance in three months.'

"He was greatly relieved when the nature of the bond was explained to him; but it is to be presumed that he did not confide his troubles to his lady-love until after she had promised 'to love, honor, and obey.'"

"HAVING frequently seen good things in the Drawer from little fellows, I give you the following, as a specimen brick from our Western home:

"Willie, who is just entering upon his fourth winter, had very attentively watched one of his aunts dressing for an evening party; and as it was summer time, and fashionable, the dress did not come as far up on the neck as Willie's ideas of propriety suggested. He went to her wardrobe, and in a moment came back pulling a close-fitting basque after him, when the following conversation ensued:

"AUNT. 'What is that for?'

"WILLIE. 'For you to put on.'

"AUNT. 'But I am all dressed now. I look pretty, don't I?'

"WILLIE. 'Yes,' giving a modest glance at her shoulders; 'but somebody might see you!'

THE writer of the following beautiful lines does not send his address:

IN MEMORIAM.

Another little form asleep,
And a little spirit gone;
Another little voice is hushed,
And a little angel born.
Two little feet are on the way
To the home beyond the skies,
And our hearts are like the void that comes
When a strain of music dies.
A pair of little baby shoes,
And a lock of golden hair;
The toy our little darling loved,
And the dress she used to wear;
The little grave in the shady nook
Where the flowers love to grow—
And these are all of the little hope
That came three years ago.
The birds will sit on the branch above,
And sing a requiem
To the beautiful little sleeping form
That used to sing to them.
But never again will the little lips
To their songs of love reply;
For that silvery voice is blended with
The minstrelsy on high.

A CORRESPONDENT in St. Louis enriches the Drawer with these recollections:

"The Irish do not figure very largely in your Drawer. Will you allow me to tell of one who was the servant of a friend of mine while in the army?"

"In 1823 Michael came to Lieutenant C—, at Fort Dearborne, to hire. He said, 'Faith, he had no char-ac-ter;' he 'lost it three months before at Mauntraal, intirely.' However, the Lieutenant took him, and as he was soon after ordered to the Military Post at Council Bluffs, he took Michael and a fine setter dog, 'Close,' with him, in a bark canoe, as far as St. Louis, then a mere village, where he expected to take the steamer Mandan for the Bluffs—the first steamer that ever ascended the Missouri River.

"When they had drawn up the canoe on the beach, the Lieutenant ordered Michael to shoulder his trunk, and follow him with 'Close' to the hotel. After walking a short distance he heard a violent altercation round the corner he had just passed. On going back to see what it could be, there was Michael, with a poor, cadaverous-looking Frenchman up against the fence, pommeling him with his fists (having set the trunk down in the street), saying, 'I'll knock your two eyes into one, so I will; you kicked the Leftenant's dog!' With some difficulty the poor frightened Frenchman was released, and Michael made to understand that kind of work would not answer.

"Poor Michael was an honest creature, a second Micky Free, but he in time acquired the habit of drinking too much, for which he was discharged. On account of this fault he never remained long in one situation, and when out of one he regularly came back to Lieutenant C— for a home, which was always kindly given him for weeks at a time.

"The Lieutenant got married, and it was not so pleasant for his wife to see a drunken man in the kitchen sleeping in his chair. So one day, after hearing the cook complain of his being forever in the kitchen, she requested her husband to talk to him, and tell him it was high time to find a place, as she could not have him there any longer. Michael did not say a word, but walked off, apparently very much mortified. In the afternoon he met Lieutenant C— on the back porch, and said, 'Well, Leftenant, I'll have fur to lave you' (sniffing). 'I'm very sorry, but I'll have fur to lave you. I could live with the Leftenant all my life; but indade I couldn't live with your wife—she's too hard to plaze intirely.'

"A few years after, Lieutenant C—, with others, was ordered South to the Choctaw Nation. Michael went along as servant to one of the officers, still claiming his old home when out of a place, which now became very frequent. Quarters in the encampment being very limited, a tent was pitched in a corner of the yard for Michael's accommodation. One time he had been missing for a week; nothing had been seen or heard from him. Mrs. C— really hoped he had found a better home on some of the plantations around the camp; but one evening at twilight, as they were sitting at their cabin-door with some friends, a dark object was seen coming up the hill in front of the house, which at first was supposed to be a drunken Indian. As it came nearer it proved to be Michael, very much intoxicated, sitting on an old Indian pony without either saddle or bridle. As he rode up the dog barked violently at him. Lieutenant C—, seeing his situation, went to him, and took the horse by the mane to lead him round to the tent. Michael said, 'Oh! Leftenant, I come back like the prodigal son. I could bear any thing, but the dog didn't know me!' Michael was helped off his horse, and put in the tent to sleep away the effects of his dissipation."

"I AM glad to see, Mr. Editor, you take such a warm interest in the sayings and doings of the little folks. I love their prattle too, and must tell you something of my little four-year old boy. His father had been absent in Florida for a long time, and George had been taught to pray every night for God to take care of his father, and bring him home soon. One morning he came to me, saying, 'Mamma, when will my father come home?'

"Indeed, I do not know, my dear. I hope very soon. Why, George?"

"Because, mamma, I'm most tired praying for God to take care of him."

For more original anecdotes of distinguished men the Drawer is indebted to a valued friend in Brandon, Mississippi:

"A long time ago, when Mr. Clay visited Hopkinsville, Kentucky, a dinner was tendered to him by his friends, which he accepted. It is necessary to premise that it was a short time after the war of 1812, when the whole country was overflowing with gratitude to the heroes of that war for their gallant services in defense of their country. Among the numerous guests at the dinner was an old gentleman who had spent the greater portion of his life in Bourbon County, Kentucky, not far from the residence of Mr. Clay, and with whom Mr. Clay was well acquainted. This was Colonel Laban S—. He was a plain, straightforward man, who was more remarkable for his strict attention to business than for visiting convivial meetings. He had probably never been present at a dinner before given in honor of any man, and was present on this occasion purely as an act of friendship for Mr. Clay. After Mr. Clay had made a speech in answer to a complimentary toast, good feeling and hilarity pervaded the assemblage. Many toasts were drunk and responded to, and Colonel S— remained a silent spectator up to this moment. Mr. Clay observing his silence, and knowing his habits as well as his eccentricities, whispered to the president to call upon him for a toast, which the president did. Colonel S— seemed to be taken by surprise. But the exhilarated crowd shouted his name loud and long; and this made him quake with fear, for he had never heard his name called for before in his life. He felt like a fish out of water, and cursed his folly for being present on the occasion. Finding no excuse would serve his purpose, he rose in great trepidation, and said, in a loud voice, 'I give you old "J. Brown,"' and took his seat. Some laughed, some yelled, and some demurred that the toast required explanation; that they wished to know what 'J. Brown' was to be toasted; that no doubt 'J. Brown' was a very clever man; but that they wished more precision—in a word, they wished to know who the man was. All this time the Colonel sat like one on the rack or gridiron. He would not explain until Mr. Clay arose, and, with great gravity, proceeded to volunteer a ludicrous explanation, wide, awfully wide of the mark, as he knew it to be. Finding from repeated shakes of the head that the Colonel refused his exposition, he then besought him earnestly to give the explanation, that all might join in the toast. Colonel S— rose the second time, more nervous than ever, and said: 'I mean that old foughten fellow at the North, who just signs his name "J. Brown," and goes about his business.' All understood at once he meant General Jacob Brown, the renowned Commander-in-chief of the American Army, and never was toast drunk with more hearty good-will. The Colonel had never spoken so much in all his life, but no orator ever succeeded better in 'bringing down the house' than he did in that short first speech of his.

"I have frequently thought how different would be the feelings of the revelers of this day if the same toast were given at the South, without the explanation. Whew! what a storm it would raise!

"DURING the great political excitement of 1840 Judge M— took an active part on the stump for Harrison and Tyler, or, in the rich vernacular of that day, of 'Tippecanoe and Tyler too.' He was known to be rather an improvident man, and of very moderate means. He was also exceedingly impulsive and enthusiastic, entering with his whole soul into the great canvass then on hand. He was a fine orator, and of most imposing and self-possessed appearance on the stump. Knowing the importance of getting himself in full sympathy with his audience, he dilated at length upon his losses—for he remembered it was upon the heels of those terrible disasters in Mississippi, in which almost every man in the State became a sufferer, either directly or indirectly. I allude to the disastrous consequences of what is known as 'the specie circular' of General Jackson. In order, then, to place himself in sympathy with his audience, and to command for his assertions the fullest credence, he went on to say that there was scarcely a man in the State who had been a greater sufferer by the change in the times than himself; that he had lost over one hundred thousand dollars by that iniquitous measure, the specie circular; and he claimed to be heard as a common sufferer with the people; for he was identified with them in residence, in pecuniary losses, in mental and physical sufferings. Thus obtaining the ear and the heart of his audience at the start, he made a most powerful and eloquent speech.

"After the speech was over his friend, Judge J—, said to him, with a good deal of surprise in his countenance, 'My dear Judge M—, I was not aware before that your losses had been so great. I really did not know that you ever possessed one-fifth of the amount of property you said you had lost. Do tell me how it happened that you suffered so much.'

"'Why,' said Judge M—, 'I can explain it the easiest in the world. It was money that I ought to have made, and would have made, but for the change in the times.'

"JUDGE M— was a candidate for the Senate, and had made a speech in which he had borne very hard upon his opponent, Colonel D—, who was very fiery and impulsive. The Colonel, in reply, became very angry, and said, among other things, that he could whip the Judge before forty men could part them. Judge M— calmly retorted that, 'when he was a boy, his father had a very large bull, that could whip any bull in the neighborhood, far or near. But,' said he, with a sort of deprecating tone, 'my father's bull could not legislate,' and then quietly took his seat. The audience were perfectly satisfied that fighting was not the best qualification for a Senator."

A FRIEND in New England vouches for the truth of what follows:

"Several good stories, current some fifty years ago in the little town of Woodbury, Connecticut, are still remembered of one General Hinton, who was an eccentric old farmer in that vicinity. The General feared neither God nor man, but loved Mammon, and was remarkably keen-sighted in his service of his chosen deity. He was noted among his farming neighbors for his peculiar management of his hired help. For many years his men had invariably left him before their 'time was out,' and, in consequence, had forfeited their wages. The General was always rather austere in the treatment of his workmen, but he usually took care to let more than half of the time agreed upon at commencement elapse before he set about offending, and so getting rid of a man, with forfeit of wages. Every one in the neighborhood of Woodbury knowing the peculiar propensity of this cunning old farmer, no laborers could be hired, at any price, about home; and consequently a stranger, seeking to do with his might what his hands found, usually unshouldered his bundle at the General's gate, and went into the field.

"One day, in the busy season, a stranger came along, sought work, and, as usual, was hired. After a few days, he was not a little surprised on being told by one of the neighbors that he guessed he would leave before his time was up, as no man had ever been able, thus far, to remain so long in the employ of General H. The man thought differently; and perceiving how his employer would manage the matter, resolved to do just as he was bidden, without caring whether the command was reasonable or otherwise.

"Early one morning, after this man had worked about half as many months as had been agreed upon at commencement, the General came into the farm-yard as usual. John was ordered to carry a bundle of straw, then lying by the stable-door, into the middle of a field near at hand, and to leave it about midway between two trees, which grew several rods apart. John complied, without a word; and on his return for further orders, was shown a cart-ropes, with orders to stretch the same from tree to tree, at least eight feet from the ground. This was also done; and John again returned to seek further orders, inwardly laughing at his employer's unsuccessful attempts to disturb him.

"Now, John," said the General, in reply to his rather crank 'What next, Sir?' 'you may unbind that bundle, and throw the straws over the rope, one by one, and when you have done, come again.'

"Much to the surprise of his employer, John went as he was bidden. Some time was required to complete the task; and when he returned with the report of complete success, and demanded another job, the General gave it up, and telling him, with real admiration for his coolness, that he was the first man he could not get mad, ordered him to the field to join the other laborers.

"From that day John's employer was quite agreeable. The time was worked out, to the surprise of all not concerned, and John was the first man ever known to get month wages from old General Hinton."

The following comes from the same source as the former, and is equally vouched for:

"Captain Smith was a neighbor of the General's, and kept a large herd of asses, which were in the habit of breaking into our friend's orchard. The General had complained to his neighbor, Smith, who was always willing to send and get the asses home; but they were back again so soon, that removing them proved of little use.

"One day the minister of the parish called on General Hinton, for the purpose of getting his apples for winter use. The old farmer, with unusual liberality, told the parson to drive into the orchard and help himself. He did so; and after selecting eight or nine bushels of such fruit as he liked best, he came out, with the intention of settling his bill and taking his departure.

"Have you got all you want?" was the General's inquiry.

"Perhaps not all I could use," the minister said, 'but all I can afford.'

"Go back and get all you want!" said the General, in a rather commanding tone; and he added, 'I will make it easy for you.' Our clerical friend remonstrated, but the other would hear none of it; and the result was that, instead of eight, the minister took twenty bushels of the finest apples.

"The good man was pleased with his bountiful supply of winter provision, but not without some fear and trembling did he again demand the amount of his bill.

"You have got all you want?" said General H.

"All I can use."

"Then," said the General, 'I want you to go home and pray that Captain Smith may keep his jackasses out of my orchard!'

"The troublesome animals were kept at home ever afterward; and the General often said that he got better paid for the apples he let Parson Brown have than for any lot that he ever disposed of."

"As you have published in the Drawer the saw-mill advertisement of John Rabb, I send you another (taken from the True Issue, a paper published in Lagrange, Texas), by which you will see that he offers his mill for sale, as he can not obtain a suitable miller:

Can't get the kind of a miller I want.

Won't have any other sort.

Too pushing a business for an old man.

Can't get time to pray enough.

Too far from church.

Intend, by the will of God, to sell out and quit business, At least such pushing business.

A NATCHEZ correspondent sends us the following admirable story, showing "how a steamer got named:

"Bob was a dissolute fellow very early in life, and he fell to his saddest ebb just prior to his marriage. The beauty, spirit, and worth of his destined wife were proverbial. Bob was fascinated, and determined to win her. She accepted him, conditionally that he would reform from that moment, and he did so. The honey-moon had been gone a year.

In that interval Bob had assiduously devoted his fine talents to raising himself to eminence in his profession, and to raising cotton on his plantation. The pair were voyaging up the river to their 'place,' when there came aboard the boat Bob's wealthy quondam friend, Captain R——, familiar with Bob in the latter's days of bachelor revelry. The Captain was a 'very hard old boy,' and could drink most men under the table. Bob was inveigled to the outside of that little cupboard called the bar, where the red-eye and the eye-opener circulated freely. Twelve at midnight came, when all but Bob and Captain R—— seemed to have retired from the cabin. Empty Champagne bottles on a table marked the half hours already gone, while the full ones in a basket showed the time yet to be measured by each pop and fizz. The Captain was about launching a new boat, and so many names for her had been severally discussed and rejected that the bottles had popped to two o'clock in the morning.

"'Su-Su-Suth'n Union,' suggested Bob.

"'No; One Union,' said the Captain.

"'Suthnugn.' reiterated Bob.

"'One Union.' responded the Captain, striking the table.

"Bob could only maintain a see-saw perpendicular, while the Captain was 'high' in exhilaration. Gently, then, a state-room door was opened. Forth stepped Bob's beautiful wife, followed by her waiting-maid with two buckets of water.

"'Captain R——, I believe no one is in this cabin but we four?'

"'No, Madam.'

"'Then, Sir, name your boat The Drunken Beast.'

"The dainty little hands went aloft, and down came the contents of one bucket on the head and shoulders of her husband. The other bucket speedily cooled down the Captain's person. What passed thereafter in that cabin it may be that the clerk didn't slyly observe; but certainly it was through his agency that the little lady had pre-exchanged her state-room; and without pausing for a sequel, she beat an orderly retreat. When Bob shied into the repudiated room, didn't he pronounce the vacuum 'versinglar,' and lie on the floor outpouring dubious expletives! The trio had a late breakfast; and their painful silence was broken by Captain R——. 'Mr. —, if agreeable, I would be most happy of an introduction to your lady.'

"'Captain R——, Mrs. —, my wife.'

"'Madam,' said the Captain, 'I trust that I shall not be considered impertinent by remarking that I believe you were Miss — before your marriage?'

"'That was my name then, Sir; and,' rather sternly, 'I wish it were mine now, Sir.'

"'Ah! and so do I, Madam,' gallantly and significantly responded the Captain. 'But the name shall be preserved, Madam; it shall be gilded on my new boat, and when she becomes too old to honor it she shall be superseded by another. As long as I live that name shall be borne up and down this river; and perhaps its constant contemplation will induce me to use at my table the element that the name will float over.'

"Now one of the finest, stanchest, and fleetest steamers on our Southern waters is that same —. I know, by authority, that neither Bob nor his wife has ever alluded to that night; and I know, too, that there never was a steadier, higher-toned gentleman than Bob has been in the past three years. No bar can lure him now but the bar of his honor; and though no eye-opener can win him, he succumbs to the beautiful open eye of his wife; and though he will often 'smile,' it is only to reflect her charming laugh."

"I HAVE been down in Arkansas lately, and during my stay in that country became acquainted with one of her citizens, concerning whom a very good story is told. Without naming him more particularly, I will merely say that he has represented Arkansas in Congress many terms, and that he is particularly distinguished for the care he bestows upon his personal appearance.

"I will add to this prolegomena that the faro-dealers on the Mississippi River boats are wont to carry the peculiar implements of their profession in small mahogany boxes—this for the benefit of the untraveled among your readers.

Our Representative friend, then, upon a certain time, having occasion to go up the river, took with him, for state-room convenience, a toilet-box, which for a few minutes after getting on the boat he carried in his hand. His advent was very cheering to the souls of two or three Kentuckians on board, who had been all day itching to jump at a tiger; thinking, from his foppish appearance and from the box in his possession, that he was a member of the sporting fraternity. After some consultation among themselves, one of the Kentuckians advanced toward Mr. —, and in a most affable tone bade him good-evening. The salutation was returned courteously, and, thus encouraged, Kentucky proceeded to interrogate:

"'When yo' going to open up, stranger?'

"'What did you observe, Sir?' said the honorable member, not precisely understanding the drift of the remark.

"'Oh! open up, yo' know; when are you going to give us a show agin the animil?'

"'I don't understand your allusion, Sir, in the least. I am entirely in the dark regarding your meaning in asking such questions, Sir!' was responded, with dignity.

"'Oh! a-playing the 'possum game, are yo'? Maybe yo' think we ain't game for yo'r gun!' said Kentucky; and as his companions came up he exhibited a large roll of bills, and added, 'Thar are three such bundles in this crowd, stranger; and Kentucky boys arn't afeard to risk their money! Won't you open up this evening, stranger?'

"Mr. — was growing angry; the passengers were beginning to press around; and, in a voice bursting with wrath, he asked,

"'For whom do you take me, Sir? and what do you suppose is my business?'

"'Take yo' for? What should we take yo' for? An't that a faro-box? Maybe yo' mean to say yo' are not a sporting gentleman, and never heard of sich a thing as a tiger!'

"A light began to break upon the mind of the astonished 'gentleman from Arkansas.' Anxious to correct a misapprehension which he saw had extended to the passengers, he nervously unlocked his toilet-box, and displayed to the vision of the Kentuckians his complement of combs, brushes, and other adjuncts of the toilet, in triumph.

"Silence was observed for a moment on both sides. Then the Kentuckians, with an air of disgust, turned away simultaneously, as one of them muttered, "'Stranger, we thought yo' war a sporting GENTLEMAN! But if we had a knowed you war a barber we wouldn't have spoken to you!'

That's a very good story; but it was told years ago of the accomplished Colonel Preston, of South Carolina.

THE OPERA CLOAK represented on the preceding page is one of the prime favorites of the season. The elegance of the sleeves in particular excites special admiration. The garment is composed of white merino, lined with pink taffeta, and ornamented with tassels and fringe in colors to match. A style of garment very similar to this, adapted for the street, is made of black velvet. One of this description, with a crochet-headed fringe and black silk lining, has been much admired.

FURS.—The leading authority upon this important article of winter costume reports that there will be, this season, only slight modifications upon former styles; the chief variations being that full capes and victorines are somewhat deeper, and the number of tails are increased to eight or ten.—The Russian Sable, of course, still retains its aristocratic position over the more common and less expensive materials. Next in order of precedence comes the Hudson Bay Sable; while Mink, Stone-Martin, and Fitch follow in order of rank. From these varied materials our friends will find no difficulty in graduating their purchases in such a manner as to meet their special tastes and the exigencies of their porte-monnaies. We may add, by way of hint, that the Victorine may be safely chosen by those who, for any reason, do not choose to adopt the more ample, and therefore more expensive styles—the Full Cape or the Half Cape. Our illustrations present all that need be specified respecting these various forms.—As to Muffs, there is no change of exterior form; but according to the latest mode the lining is arranged in such a manner that it is closed in the middle, forming separate compartments for the hands, so that the one which is in the muff is not liable to be chilled on the withdrawal of the other.

four hundred men, and the additional numbers that might be expected before night, was not a pleasant prospect; but to be caught in a snow-storm on the summit, where so many had perished during the past winter, was worse still. Upon reviewing the chances I resolved to start, and if the storm continued I thought there would be no difficulty in finding the way back. It was eight miles of a continuous and precipitous ascent to the summit, and three miles from that point to the Lake House in Lake Valley, where the accommodations were said to be the worst on the whole trail.

A few miles from Strawberry one of the party gave out in consequence of sore feet; the other two pushed on, despite the storm which now raged fearfully, but had not proceeded far when they were forced to turn back. I was loth to leave my disabled friend, and returned with him to Strawberry, where we had a repetition of nearly all that has already been described, only a little intensified in consequence of increased numbers. The others of our party stopped somewhere on the road, and I did not meet them again until next afternoon at Woodford's, on the other side of the mountain.

As soon as it was light next morning I took another observation of the weather. It was still snowing, but not so heavily as on the preceding day. My remaining partner was by this time completely crippled in his feet, and had to hire a horse at the rate of twenty dollars for twenty-five miles.

I was delayed some hours in getting off, owing to the pressure of the forces at the breakfast-table; but finally made a fair start for the summit. My pack had become a source of considerable inconvenience. I was accustomed to walking, but not to carrying a burden of twenty or twenty-five pounds. My shoulders and ankles were so galled that every step had to be made on the nicest calculation; but the new snow on top of the old trail began to melt as soon as the sun came out, making a very bad trail for pedestrians. Two miles from Strawberry we crossed a bridge, and struck for the summit.

Here we had need of all our powers of endurance. It was a constant struggle through melted snow and mud — slipping, sliding, grasping, rolling, tumbling, and climbing, up again and still up, till it verily seemed as if we must be approaching the clouds. The most prominent peculiarity of these mountains is, that a person on foot, with a heavy load on his back, is never at the top when he imagines he is; the "divide" is always a little farther on, and a little higher up—at least until he passes it, which he does, entirely ignorant of the fact. There is really no perceptible "divide;" you pass a series of elevations, and commence the descent without any apparent difference in the trail.

The pack trains had broken through the old snow in many places, leaving deep holes, which, being now partially covered with recent snow, proved to be regular man-traps—often bringing up the unwary pedestrian "all standing." The sudden wrenching of the feet in the smaller holes, which had been explored by the legs of horses, mules, and cattle, was an occurrence of every ten or a dozen steps. In many places the trail was perfectly honey-combed with holes, where the heavily-laden animals had cut through the snow; and it was exceedingly difficult to find a foothold. To step on either side and avoid these bad places would seem easy enough, but I tried it on more than one occasion and got very nearly buried alive. All along the route, at intervals of a mile or two, we continued to meet pack trains; and as every body had to give way before them, the tumbling out and plunging in the snow were very lively.

I walked on rapidly in the hope of making Woodford's—the station on the eastern slope of the mountain—before night, and by degrees got ahead of the main body of footmen, who had left Strawberry that morning. In a narrow gorge, a short distance from the commencement of the descent into Lake Valley, I happened to look up a little to the right, where, to my astonishment, I perceived four large brown wolves sitting on their haunches not over twenty feet from me! They seemed entirely unconcerned at my presence, except in so far as they may have indulged in some speculation as to the amount of flesh contained on my body. As I was entirely unarmed, I thought it would be but common politeness to speak to them, so I gave them a yell in the Indian language. At this they retired a short distance, but presently came back again as if to inquire the exact meaning of my salutation. I now thought it best not to be too intimate, for I saw that they were getting rather familiar on a short acquaintance; and picking up a stick of wood, I made a rush and a yell at them which must have been formidable in the extreme. This time they retreated more rapidly, and seemed undecided about returning. At this crisis in affairs a pack train came along, the driver of which had a pistol. Upon pointing out the wolves to him he fired, but missed them. They then retreated up the side of the mountain, and I saw nothing more of them.

The descent of the "grade" was the next rough feature in our day's journey. From the point overlooking Lake Valley the view is exceedingly fine. Lake Bigler—a sheet of water forty or fifty miles in length by ten or fifteen wide—lies embosomed in the mountains in full view from this elevation; but there was a drizzling sleet which obscured it on this occasion. I had a fine sight of it on my return, however, and have seldom witnessed any scene in Europe or elsewhere to compare with it in extent and grandeur.

The trail on the grade was slippery with sleet, and walking upon it was out of the question. Running, jumping, and sliding were the only modes of locomotion at all practicable. I tried one of the short cuts, and found it an expeditious way of getting to the bottom. Some trifling obstruction deprived me of the use of my feet at the very start, after which I traveled down in a series of gyrations at once picturesque and complicated. When I reached the bottom I was entirely unable to comprehend how it had all happened; but there I was, pack and baggage, all safely delivered in the snow—bones sound, and free of expense.

At the Lake House—a tolerably good-sized shanty at the foot of the grade—we found a large party assembled, taking their ease as they best could in such a place, without much to eat and but little to drink, except old-fashioned tarantula-juice, "warranted to kill at forty paces."

The host of the Lake was in a constant state of nervous excitement, and did more scolding, swearing, gouging, and general hotel work, in the brief space of half an hour, than any man I ever saw. He seemed to be quite worn-out with his run of customers—from a hundred to three hundred of a night, and nowhere to stow 'em—all cussin' at him for not keepin' provisions: and how could he, when they ate him clean out every day, and some of 'em never paid him, and never will?

"WE ARE WAITING FOR YOU."

A SHORT CUT.

I was not sorry to get clear of the Lake House, its filth, and its troubles.

Upon crossing the valley, which is here about a mile wide, the ascent of the next summit commences. Here we had almost a repetition of the main summit, except that the descent on the other side is more gradual.

At length we struck the beginning of Hope Valley. I shall always remember this portion of the journey as the worst I ever traveled on foot. Every yard of the trail was honey-combed to the depth of two or three feet. On the edges there was no foothold at all; and occasionally we had to wade knee-deep in black, sticky mire, from which it was difficult to extricate one's feet and boots at the same time. I was glad enough when myself and two casual acquaintances succeeded in reaching the solitary log-house which stands near the middle of the valley.

I little expected to find in this wilderness a philosopher of the old school; but here was a man who had evidently made up his mind to withstand all the allurements of wealth, and devote the remainder of his life to ascetic reflections upon the follies of mankind. Diogenes in his tub was not more rigorous in his seclusion than this isolated inhabitant of Hope Valley. His log-cabin, to be sure, was some improvement, in extent, upon the domicile of that famous philosopher; but in point of architectural style, I don't know that there could have been much advantage either way.

A few empty bags, and a bar entirely destitute of bottles, with a rough bench to sit upon, comprised all the furniture that was visible to the naked eye. From a beam overhead hung a bunch of fox-skins, which emitted a very gamy odor; and the clay floor had apparently never been swept, save by the storms that had passed over it before the cabin was built. A couple of rifles hung upon pegs projecting from the chimney, and a powder-flask was the only mantle-piece ornament. Diogenes sat, or rather reclined, on the pile of empty sacks, holding by the neck a fierce bull-dog. The sanguinary propensities of this animal were manifested by repeated attempts to break away, and seize somebody by the throat or the leg: not that he growled, or snarled, or showed any puppyish symptoms of a trifling kind; but there was a playful switching of his tail and a leer of the eye uncommonly vicious and tiger-like. It certainly would not have taken him more than two minutes to hamstring the stoutest man in the party.

Between the dog and his master there was a very striking congeniality of disposition, if one might judge by the expression of their respective countenances. It would apparently have taken but little provocation to make either of them bite.

Battered and bruised as we were, and hungry into the bargain, after our hard struggle over the mountain, it became a matter of vital importance that we should secure lodgings for the night, and, if possible, get something to eat. The place looked rather unpromising; but after our experience in Lake Valley we were not easily discouraged. Upon broaching the subject to Diogenes, in the mildest possible manner, his brow darkened, as if a positive insult to his common sense had been attempted.

"Stay here all night!" he repeated, savagely. "What the h—ll do you want to stay here all night for?"

We hinted at a disposition to sleep, and thought he might possibly have room on the floor for our blankets.

At this he snapped his fingers contemptuously, and muttered, "Can't come that over me! I've been here too long for that!"

"But we are willing to pay you whatever is fair."

"Pay? Who said I wanted pay? Do I look like a man that wants money?"

We thought not.

"If I wanted money," continued Diogenes, "I could have made fifty dollars a day for the last two months. But I ask no favors of the world. Some of 'em wants to stay here whether I will or no; I rather think I'm too many for any of that sort—eh, Bull?—what d'ye say?" Bull growled, with a blood-thirsty meaning. "Too many altogether, gents—me and Bull."

There was a sturdy independence about this fellow, and a scorn for filthy lucre that rather astonished me as a citizen of a money-loving State.

"Well, if you can't let us stay all night, perhaps you can get us up a snack of dinner?"

"Snack of dinner?"—and here there was a guttural chuckle that boded failure again—"I tell you this ain't a tavern; and, if it was, my cook's gone out to take a airing."

"But have you nothing in the house to eat?"

"Oh yes, there's a bunch of fox-skins. If you'd like some of 'em cooked, I'll bile 'em for you."

This man's disposition had evidently been soured in early life. I think he must have been crossed in love. His style had the merit of being terse, but his manner was sarcastic to the verge of impoliteness.

"Well, I suppose we can warm ourselves at the fire?"

"If you can," quoth Diogenes, "you can do more than I can;" and here he hauled his blanket over his shoulders, and fell back on the empty potato-sacks as if there was no more to be said on that or any other subject.

The bull-dog seemed to be of the same way of thinking, and quietly laid down by his master; still, however, keeping his eye on us, as suspicious characters.

Nothing remained but to push on for Woodford's, distant six miles.

Now, when you come to put six miles on the end of a day's journey such as ours had been, it becomes a serious matter. Besides, it was growing late, and a terrific wind, accompanied by a blinding sleet, rendered it scarcely practicable to stand up, much less to walk. I do not know how we ever staggered over that six miles. The last three, however, were downhill, and not so bad, as the snow was pretty well gone from the cañon on the approach to Woodford's.

This is the last station on the way over from Carson, and forms the upper terminus of that valley. It is supposed to be in Utah, but our landlord could not tell us exactly where the boundary line ran.

We found here several hundred people, bound in both directions, and passed a very rough night, trying to get a little sleep amidst the motley and noisy crowd.

I had endured the journey thus far very well, and had gained considerably in strength and appetite. The next day, however, upon striking into the sand of Carson Valley, my feet became terribly blistered, and the walking was exceedingly painful. There are some good farms in the upper part of the valley, between Woodford's and Genoa, though the general aspect of the country is barren in the extreme.

By sundown I had made only fifteen miles, and still was three miles from Genoa. Every hundred yards was now equal to a mile. At length I found it utterly impossible to move another step. It was quite dark, and there was nothing for it but to sit down on the road-side. Fortunately, the weather was comparatively mild. As I was meditating how to pass the night, I perceived a hot spring close by, toward which I crept; and finding the water strongly impregnated with salt, it occurred to me that it might benefit my feet. I soon plunged them in, and in half an hour found them so much improved that I was enabled to resume my journey. An hour more and I was snugly housed at Genoa.

This was a place of some importance during the time of the Mormon settlements, but had not kept pace with Carson City in the general improvement caused by the recent discoveries. At present it contained a population of not more than two or three hundred, chiefly store-keepers, teamsters, and workmen employed upon a neighboring saw-mill. The inhabitants professed to be rich in silver leads, but upon an examination of the records to find the lead in which my San Francisco friend had invested, and which was represented to be in this district, I was unable to find any trace of it; and there was no such name as that of the alleged owner known or ever heard of in Genoa. In fact, as I afterward ascertained, it was purely a fictitious name, and the whole transaction was one of those Peter Funk swindles so often practiced upon the unwary during this memorable era of swindles. I don't know how my friend received the intelligence, but I reported it to him without a solitary mitigating circumstance. Had I met with the vile miscreant who had imposed upon him, I should have felt bound to resort to personal measures of satisfaction, in consideration of the fund expended by my friend on the expenses of this Commission of Inquiry. The deeds were so admirably drawn, and the names written so legibly, that I don't wonder he was taken in. In fact, the only obstacle to his scheme of sudden wealth was, that there were no such mines, and no such men as the alleged discoverers, in existence.

I proceeded the next day to Carson City, which I had fixed upon as the future headquarters of my agency. The distance from Genoa is fifteen miles, the road winding around the base of the foot-hills most of the way. I was much impressed with the marked difference between the country on this side of the Sierra Nevada range and the California side. Here the mountains were but sparsely timbered; the soil was poor and sandy, producing little else than stunted sage bushes; and the few scattering farms had a thriftless and poverty-stricken look, as if the task of cultivation had proved entirely hopeless, and had long since been given up. Across the valley toward the Desert, ranges of mountains, almost destitute of trees, and of most stern and forbidding aspect, stretched as far as the eye could reach. Carson River, which courses through the plain, presented the only pleasing feature in the scene.

I was rather agreeably surprised at the civilized aspect of Carson City. It is really quite a pretty and thrifty little town. Situated within a mile of the foot-hills, within reach of the main timber region of the country, and well watered by streams from the mountains, it is rather imposing on first acquaintance; but the climate is abominable, and not to be endured. I know of none so bad except that of Virginia City, which is infinitely worse. The population was about twelve or fifteen hundred at the time of my visit. There was great speculation in town lots going on—a rumor having come from Salt Lake that the seat of government of Utah was about to be removed to Carson. Hotels and stores were in progress of erection all about the Plaza; but especially drinking and gambling saloons—it being an article of faith among the embryo sovereigns of Utah that no government can be judiciously administered without plenty of whisky, and superior accommodations for "bucking at Monte." I am not sure but there is a similar feature in the California constitution; at least, the practice is carried on to some extent at Sacramento during the sittings of the Legislature. Measures of the most vital importance are first introduced in rum-cocktails, then steeped in whisky, after which they are engrossed in gin for a third reading. Before the final vote the opponents adjourn to a game of poker or sledge, and upon the amount of Champagne furnished on the occasion by the respective parties interested in the bill depends its passage or defeat. It was said that Champagne carried one of the great Senatorial elections; but this has been denied, and it would be dangerous to insist upon it.

I had the pleasure of meeting in Carson an esteemed friend from San Francisco, Mr. A. J. Van Winkle, Real Estate Agent; who, being a descendant of the famous Rip Van Winkle, was thoughtful enough to furnish me with a bunk to sleep in. Warned by the fate of his unhappy ancestor, my friend had gone briskly into the land business, and now owned enough of town lots, of amazingly appreciative value, to keep any man awake for the remainder of his life. I think if I had as much property, doubling itself up all the time like an acrobat in a circus, I would never sleep another wink thinking about it.

Chief among the curiosities of Carson City is the Territorial Enterprise—a newspaper of an origin long anterior to the mining excitement. I was introduced to "the Colonel," who presides over the editorial department, and found him uncommonly strong on the ultimate destiny of Carson. His office was located in a dirty frame shanty, where, amidst types, rollers, composing-stones, and general rubbish of a dark and literary aspect, those astounding editorials which now and then arouse the public mind are concocted. The Colonel and his compositors live in a sort of family fashion, entirely free from the rigorous etiquette of such establishments in New York. They cook their own food in the composition room (which is also the editorial and press room), and being, as a general thing, short of plates, use the frying-pan in common for that purpose. In cases of great festivity and rejoicing, when a subscriber has settled up arrearages or the cash is paid down for a good job of hand-bills, the Colonel purchases the best tender-loin steak to be had in market, and cooks it with one hand, while with the other he writes a letter of thanks to the subscriber, or a puff on the hand-bill. But the great hope upon which the Colonel feeds his imagination is the removal of the seat of government from Salt Lake to Carson City, which he considers the proper place. Mr. Van Winkle is also of the same opinion; and, as a general thing, the proposition is favorably entertained by the citizens of Carson.

As usual in new countries, a strong feeling of rivalry exists between the Carsonites and the inhabitants of Virginia City. I have summed up the arguments on both sides and reduced them to the following pungent essence :

Virginia City—a mud-hole ; climate, hurricanes and snow ; water, a dilution of arsenic, plumbago, and copperas ; wood, none at all except sage brush ; no title to property, and no property worth having.

Carson City—a mere accident ; occupation of the inhabitants, waylaying strangers bound for Virginia ; business, selling whisky, and so dull at that, men fall asleep in the middle of the street going from one groggery to another ; productions, grass and weeds on the Plaza.

While this fight is going on Silver City, which lies about midway between the two, shrugs her shoulders and thanks her stars there can be no rivalry in her case. If ever there was a spot fitted by nature for a seat of government it is Silver City—the most central, the most moral, the most promising ; in short, the only place where the seat of government can exist for any length of time.

This Kilkenny-cat fight is highly edifying to a stranger, who, of course, is expected to take sides, or at once acknowledge himself an enemy. The result, I hope, will be satisfactory and triumphant to all parties. I would suggest that the government be split into three slices, and a slice stowed away under ground in each of the great cities, so that it may permeate the foundations of society.

A few days after my arrival in Carson the sky darkened, and we soon had a specimen of the spring weather of this region. To say that it stormed, snowed, and rained would be ridiculously tame in comparison with the real state of the case. The wind whistled through the thin shanties in a manner that left scarcely a hope of roof or frame standing till night. Through the crevices came little hurricanes of snow-drift mixed with sand ; each tenement groaned and creaked as if its last hour had come ; the air was bitterly cold ; and it seemed, in short, as if the vengeance of Heaven had been let loose on this desolate and benighted region.

Next day the clouds gradually lifted from the mountain tops, and the sun once more shone out bright and clear. The snow, which now covered the valley, began to disappear ; the lowing of half-starved cattle, in search of the few green patches visible here and there, gave some promise of life ; but soon the portentous gusts of wind swept down again from the cañons ; dark clouds overspread the sky, and a still more violent storm than on the preceding day set in, and continued without intermission all night. By morning the whole face of the country was covered with snow. A few stragglers came in from Woodford's, who reported that the trail to Placerville was covered up to the depth of six or eight feet, and was entirely unpracticable for man or beast. Apprehensions were felt for the safety of the trains on the way through, as nothing could be heard from them. A large party had started out to open the trail, but were forced back by the severity of the weather. The snow-drifts were said to vary from twenty to thirty feet in depth.

Here was a pretty predicament ! To be shut up in this desolate region, where even the cattle were dying of starvation, with seven or eight thousand human mouths to be fed, and the stock of provisions rapidly giving out, was rather a serious aspect of affairs. I do not know that actual starvation could have resulted for some time, certainly not until what cattle were alive had been killed, and soup made of the dead carcasses that covered the plain. Even before resorting to the latter extremity there were horses, mules, burros, and dogs, on hand, upon which the cravings of hunger might be appeased for a month or so ; and in the event of all these resources giving out, should the worst come to the worst, the few digger Indians that hung around the settlements might be made available as an article of temporary subsistence.

In this extremity, when considerable suffering if not absolute starvation stared us in the face, the anxiety respecting the opening of the trails became general. Groups of men of divers occupations stood in the streets, or on every little rise of ground in the neighborhood, speculating upon the chances or peering through the gloom in the hope of discerning the approach of some relief train. The sugar was gone ; flour was eighty dollars a sack, and but little to be had at that ; barley was seventy-five cents a pound, and hay sixty cents ; horses were dying for want of something to eat ; cigars were rapidly giving out ; whisky might stand the pull another week, but the prospect was gloomy of any thing more nourishing.

In this exciting state of affairs, when every brain was racked to devise ways and means of relief, and when hope of succor was almost at an end, a scout came running in from the direction of the Downerville trail with the glorious tidings of an approaching mule train. The taverns, billiard saloons, groggeries, and various stores were soon empty—every body rushed down the street to have assurance made doubly sure. Cheer after cheer burst from the elated crowd when the train hove in sight. On it came—at first like a row of ants creeping down the hillside ; then nearer and larger, till the clatter of the hoofs and the rattling of the packs could be heard ; then the blowing of the tired mules ; and at last the leader, an old gray mule, came staggering wearily along heavily packed. A barrel was poised on his back—doubtless a barrel of beef, or it might be pork, or bacon. The brand heaves in sight. Per Baccho ! it is neither beef, pork, nor bacon, but whisky—old Bourbon whisky ! The next mule totters along under two half-barrels. Speculation is rife. Every man with a stomach and an appetite for wholesome food is interested. Pigs' feet perhaps, or mackerel, or, it may be, preserved chicken ? But here is the mark—brandy ; by the powers ! nothing but brandy ! However, here comes the third with a load of five-gallon kegs—molasses beyond question, or lard, or butter ? Wrong again, gentlemen—gin, nothing but gin. On staggers a fourth heavily burdened with more kegs—sugar, or corn meal, or preserved apples, I'll bet my head. Never bet your head. It is nothing but bitters—Mack's Bitters! But surely the fifth carries a box of crushed sugar on his back, he bears himself so gayly under his burden. And well he may! That box contains no more sugar than you do, my friend; it is stuffed chock-full with decanters, tumblers, and pewter spoons. But there are still ten or fifteen mules more. Surely there must be some provisions in the train. Nobody can live to a very protracted period of life on brandy, whisky, gin, Mack's Bitters, and glass-ware. Alas, for human expectation! One by one the jaded animals pass, groaning and tottering under their heavy burdens—a barrel of rum; two boxes of bottled ale; six crates of Champagne; two pipes of California wine; a large crate of bar fixtures; and a dozen boxes of cigars—none of them nutritious articles of subsistence.

As if to enhance our troubles, the party in charge of the train had been nearly starved out in the mountains, and now came in the very lankest and hungriest of the crowd. If they were thirsty, it was their own fault; but none of them looked as if they had suffered in that respect.

Before entering into the responsible duties of my agency I was desirous of seeing as much of the mining region as possible, and with this view took the stage for Virginia City. The most remarkable peculiarity on the road was the driver, whose likeness I struck in a happy moment of inspiration. At Silver City, eight miles from Carson, I dismounted, and proceeded the rest of the way on foot. The road here becomes rough and hilly, and but little is to be seen of the city except a few tents and board shanties. Half a mile beyond is a remarkable gap cut by Nature through the mountain, as if for the express purpose of giving the road an opportunity to visit Virginia City.

As I passed through the Devil's Gate it struck me that there was something ominous in the name. "Let all who enter here—" But I had already reached the other side. It was too late now for repentance. I was about to inquire where the devil— Excuse me, I use the word in no indecorous sense. I was simply about to ask where he lived, when, looking up the road, I saw amidst the smoke and din of shivered rocks, where grimy imps were at work blasting for ore, a string of adventurers laden with picks, shovels, and crowbars; kegs of powder, frying-pans, pitchforks, and other instruments of torture—all wearily toiling in the same direction; decrepit old men, with avarice imprinted upon their furrowed brows; Jews and Gentiles, foot-weary and haggard; the young and the old, the strong and the weak, all alike burning with an unhallowed lust for lucre; and then I shuddered as the truth flashed upon me that they were going straight to—Virginia City.

Every foot of the cañon was claimed, and gangs of miners were at work all along the road, digging and delving into the earth like so many infatuated gophers. Many of these unfortunate creatures lived in holes dug into the side of the hill, and here and there a blanket thrown over a few stakes served as a domicile to shield them from the weather.

At Gold Hill, two miles beyond the Gate, the excitement was quite pitiable to behold. Those who were not at work, burrowing holes into the mountain, were gathered in gangs around the whisky saloons, pouring liquid fire down their throats and swearing all the time in a manner so utterly reckless as to satisfy me they had long since bid farewell to hope.

This district is said to be exceedingly rich in gold, and I fancy it may well be so, for it is certainly rich in nothing else. A more barren-looking and forbidding spot could scarcely be found elsewhere on the face of the earth. The whole aspect of the country indicates that it must have been burned up in hot fires many years ago and reduced to a mass of cinders; or scraped up from all the desolate spots in the known world, and thrown over the Sierra Nevada Mountains in a confused mass to be out of the way. I do not wish to be understood as speaking disrespectfully of any of the works of creation; but it is inconceivable that this region should ever have been designed as an abode for man.

A short distance beyond Gold Hill we came in sight of the great mining capital of Washoe, the far famed Virginia City. In the course of a varied existence it had been my fortune to visit the city of Jerusalem, the city of Constantinople, the city of the Sea, the City of the Dead, the Seven Cities, and others of historical celebrity in the Old World; and many famous cities in the New, including Port Townsend, Crescent City, Benicia, and the New York of the Pacific; but I had never yet beheld such a city as that which now burst upon my distended organs of vision.

On a slope of mountains speckled with snow, sage-bushes, and mounds of upturned earth, without any apparent beginning or end, congruity or regard for the eternal fitness of things, lay outspread the wondrous city of Virginia.

Frame shanties, pitched together as if by accident; tents of canvas, of blankets, of brush, of potato-sacks and old shirts, with empty whisky barrels for chimneys; smoky hovels of mud and stone; coyote holes in the mountain-side forcibly seized and held by men; pits and shafts with smoke issuing from every crevice; piles of goods and rubbish on craggy points, in the hollows, on the rocks, in the mud, in the snow, every where, scattered broadcast in pell-mell confusion, as if the clouds had suddenly burst overhead and rained down the dregs of all the flimsy, rickety, filthy little hovels and rubbish of merchandise that had ever undergone the process of evaporation from the earth since the days of Noah. The intervals of space, which may or may not have been streets, were dotted over with human beings of such sort, variety, and numbers that the famous ant-hills of Africa were as nothing in the comparison. To say that they were rough, muddy, unkempt and unwashed, would be but faintly expressive of their actual appearance; they were all this by reason of exposure to the weather; but they seemed to have caught the very diabolical tint and grime of the whole place. Here and there, to be sure, a San Francisco dandy of the "boiled shirt" and "stove-pipe" pattern loomed up in proud consciousness of the triumphs of art under adverse circumstances; but they were merely peacocks in the barn-yard.

A fraction of the crowd, as we entered the precincts of the town, were engaged in a lawsuit relative to a question of title. The arguments used on both sides were empty whisky-bottles, after the fashion of the Basiliunum, or club law, which, according to Addison, prevailed in the colleges of learned men in former times. Several of the disputants had already been knocked down and convinced, and various others were freely shedding their blood in the cause of justice. Even the bull-terriers took an active part—or, at least, a very prominent part. The difficulty was about the ownership of a lot, which had been staked out by one party and "jumped" by another. Some two or three hundred disinterested observers stood by, enjoying the spectacle, several of them with their hands on their revolvers, to be ready in case of any serious issue; but these dangerous weapons are only used on great occasions—a refusal to drink, or some illegitimate trick at monte.

Upon fairly reaching what might be considered the centre of the town, it was interesting to observe the manners and customs of the place. Groups of keen speculators were huddled around the corners, in earnest consultation about the rise and fall of stocks; rough customers, with red and blue flannel shirts, were straggling in from the Flowery Diggings, the Desert, and other rich points, with specimens of croppings in their hands, or offering bargains in the "Rogers," the "Lady Bryant," the "Mammoth," the "Woolly Horse," and Heaven knows how many other valuable leads, at prices varying from ten to seventy-five dollars a foot. Small knots of the knowing ones were in confidential interchange of thought on the subject of every other man's business; here and there a loose man was caught by the button, and led aside behind a shanty to be "stuffed;" every body had some grand secret, which nobody else could find out; and the game of "dodge" and "pump" was universally played. Jew clothing-men were setting out their goods and chattels in front of wretched-looking tenements; monte-dealers, gamblers, thieves, cut-throats, and murderers were mingling miscellaneously in the dense crowds gathered around the bars of the drinking saloons. Now and then a half-starved Pah-Ute or Washoe Indian came tottering along under a heavy press of fagots and whisky. On the main street, where the mass of the population were gathered, a jaunty fellow who had "made a good thing of it" dashed through the crowds on horseback, accoutred in genuine Mexican style, swinging his reata over his head, and yelling like a devil let loose. All this time the wind blew in terrific gusts from the four quarters of the compass, tearing away signs, capsizing tents, scattering the grit from the gravel-banks with blinding force in every body's eyes, and sweeping furiously around every crook and corner in search of some sinner to smite. Never was such a wind as this—so scathing, so searching, so given to penetrate the very core of suffering humanity; disdaining overcoats, and utterly scornful of shawls and blankets. It actually seemed to double up, twist, pull, push, and screw the unfortunate biped till his muscles cracked and his bones rattled—following him wherever he sought refuge, pursuing him down the back of the neck, up the coat-sleeves, through the legs of his pantaloons, into his boots—in short, it was the most villainous and persecuting wind that ever blew, and I boldly protest that it did nobody good.

Yet, in the midst of the general wreck and crash of matter, the business of trading in claims, "bucking," and "bearing" went on as if the zephyrs of Virginia were as soft and balmy as those of San Francisco.

This was surely—No matter; nothing on earth could aspire to competition with such a place. It was essentially infernal in every aspect, whether viewed from the Comstock Ledge or the summit of Gold Hill. Nobody seemed to own the lots except by right of possession; yet there was trading in lots to an unlimited extent. Nobody had any money, yet every body was a millionaire in silver claims. Nobody had any credit, yet every body bought thousands of feet of glittering ore. Sales were made in the Mammoth, the Lady Bryant, the Sacramento, the Winnebunk, and the innumerable other "outside claims," at the most astounding figures—but not a dime passed hands. All was silver underground, and deeds and mortgages on top; silver, silver every where, but scarce a dollar in coin. The small change had somehow gotten out of the hands of the public into the gambling saloons.

Every speck of ground covered by canvas, boards, baked mud, brush, or other architectural material, was jammed to suffocation; there were sleeping houses, twenty feet by thirty, in which from one hundred and fifty to two hundred solid sleepers sought slumber at night, at a dollar a head; tents, eight by ten, offering accommodations to the multitude; any thing or any place, even a stall in a stable, would have been a luxury.

The chief hotel, called, if I remember, the "Indication," or the "Hotel de Haystack," or some such euphonious name, professed to accommodate three hundred live men, and it doubtless did so, for the floors were covered from the attic to the solid earth—three hundred human beings in a tinder-box not bigger than a first-class hen-coop! But they were sorry-looking sleepers as they came forth each morning, swearing at the evil genius who had directed them to this miserable spot—every man a dollar and a pound of flesh poorer. I saw some, who perhaps were short of means, take surreptitious naps against the posts and walls in the bar-room, while they ostensibly professed to be mere spectators.

In truth, wherever I turned there was much to confirm the forebodings with which I had entered the Devil's Gate. The deep pits on the hill-sides; the blasted and barren appearance of the whole country; the unsightly hodge-podge of a town; the horrible confusion of tongues; the roaring, raving drunkards at the bar-rooms, swilling fiery liquids from morning till night; the flaring and flaunting gambling-saloons, filled with desperadoes of the vilest sort; the ceaseless torrent of imprecations that shocked the ear on every side; the mad speculations and feverish thirst for gain—all combined to give me a forcible impression of the unhallowed character of the place.

What dreadful savage is that? I asked, as a ferocious-looking monster in human shape stalked through the crowd. Is it—can it be the—No; that's only a murderer. He shot three men a few weeks ago, and will probably shoot another before night. And this aged and decrepit man, his thin locks floating around his haggard and unshaven face, and matted with filth? That's a speculator from San Francisco. See how wildly he grasps at every "indication," as if he had a lease of life for a thousand years! And this bull-dog fellow, with a mutilated face, button-holing every by-passer? That fellow? Oh, he's only a "bummer" in search of a cocktail. And this—and this—all these crazy-looking wretches, running hither and thither with hammers and stones in their hands, calling one another aside, hurrying to the assay-offices, pulling out papers, exchanging mysterious signals—who and what are all these? Oh, these are Washoe millionaires. They are deep in "outside claims." The little fragments of rock they carry in their hands are "croppings" and "indications" from the "Wake-up-Jake," "Root-Hog-or-Die," "Wild-Cat," "Grizzly Hill," "Dry-up," "Same Horse," "Let-her-Rip," "You Bet," "Gouge-Eye," and other famous ledges and companies, in which they own some thousands of feet. Hold, good friend! I am convinced there is no rest for the wicked. All night long these dreadful noises continue; the ears are distracted with an unintelligible jargon of "croppings," "ledges," "lodes," "leads," "indications," "feet," and "strikes," and the nostrils offended with foul odors of boots, old pipes, and dirty blankets—who can doubt the locality? If the climate is more rigorous than Dante describes it—if Calypso might search in vain for Ulysses in such a motley crowd—these apparent differences are not inconsistent with the general theory of changes produced by American emigration and the sudden conglomeration of such incongruous elements.

I was grieved and astonished to find many friends here—some of them gentlemen who had borne a very fair reputation in San Francisco, and whose unhappy fate I never could have anticipated. The bankers and brokers who had been cut off, after a prosperous career on Montgomery Street, had, of course, reached the goal toward which they had long been tending; the lawyers, who had set their unfortunate fellow-creatures by the ears, were now in a congenial element; the hard traders and unscrupulous speculators, who had violated all the moral obligations of life in their greedy lust for money, naturally abounded in large numbers; in short, it was not a matter of surprise that justice had at length been dealt out to many sinful men. But when I recognized friends whom I had formerly known as good citizens, the fathers of interesting families, exemplary members of society in San Francisco, I was profoundly shocked. It was impossible to deny that they must have been guilty of some grievous wickedness to entitle them to such a punishment.

SAN FRANCISCO SPECULATORS.

What surprised me most of all was to find Colonel R—, to whom I had a letter of introduction, the leading spirit here. His assistance was sought by all. He was the best friend to any man in need of advice. Hospitality with him was a cardinal virtue. He had turned out of his own snug quarters long since to make room for the sick and disabled, and now slept about wherever he could find shelter. He was chief owner in the "Comstock Lead," and showed great liberality in giving a helping hand to others on the road to fortune. In fine, I am utterly unable to determine for what crime he was now suffering expiation. There was nothing in his conduct that I could discover the least unbecoming to a good citizen. His benevolence, hospitality, and genial manners, were worthy any Christian. To me and to many others he proved the good Samaritan, and I still hesitate to believe that he merited the hard fate now meted out to him. But who can fathom the judgments pronounced upon men?

The bare contemplation of the miseries suffered by the inhabitants of this dreadful place was enough to stagger all convictions of my identity. Could it be possible that I was at last in—in Virginia City? What had I done to bring me to this? In vain I entered into a retrospection of the various iniquities of my life; but I could hit upon nothing that seemed bad enough to warrant such a fate. At length a withering truth flashed upon me. This must be the end of a Federal existence! This must be the abode of Ex-Inspector-Generals! It must be here that the accounts current of the decapitated are examined. Woe to the wretch who failed to profit by specie clause of the Independent Treasury Act while he had official claws on hand! Such laches of public duty can not be tolerated even in—Virginia City.

I slept, or rather tried to sleep, at one "Zip's," where there were only twenty "bunks" in the room, and was fortunate in securing a bunk even there. But the great Macbeth himself, laboring under the stings of an evil conscience, could have made a better hand of sleeping than I did at Zip's. It proved to be a general meeting-place for my San Francisco friends, and as they were all very rich in mining claims, and bent on getting still richer, they were continually making out deeds, examining titles, trading and transferring claims, discussing the purchases and prospects of the day, and exhibiting the most extraordinary "indications" yet discovered, in which one or other of them held an interest of fifty or a hundred feet, worth, say, a thousand dollars a foot. Between the cat-naps of oblivion that visited my eyes there was a constant din of "croppings"—"feet"—"fifty thousand dollars"—"struck it rich!"—"the Comstock Ledge!"—"the Billy Choller!"—"Miller on the rise!"—"Mammoth!"—"Sacramento!"—"Lady Bryant!"—"a thousand feet more!"—"great bargain"—"forty dollars a foot!"—crash! rip! bang!—"an earthquake!"—"run for your lives!"

What the deuce is the matter?

It happened thus one night. The wind was blowing in terrific gusts. In the midst of the general clatter on the subject of croppings, bargains, and indications, down came our next neighbor's house on the top of us with a terrific crash. For a moment it was difficult to tell which house was the ruin. Amidst projecting and shivered planks, the flapping of canvas, and the howling of the wind, it really seemed as if chaos had come again. But "Zip's" was well braced, and stood the shock without much damage, a slight heel and lurch to leeward being the chief result. I could not help thinking, as I turned in again after the alarm, that there could no longer be a doubt on the subject which had already occasioned me so many unpleasant reflections. It even seemed as if I smelled something like brimstone; but upon calling to Zip to know what was the matter, he informed me that he was "only dryin' the boots on the stove."

Notwithstanding the number of physicians who had already hoisted their "shingles," there was much sickness in Virginia, owing chiefly to exposure and dissipation, but in some measure to the deleterious quality of the water. Nothing more was wanting to confirm my original impressions. The water was certainly the worst ever used by man. Filtered through the Comstock Lead, it carried with it much of the plumbago, arsenic, copperas, and other poisonous minerals alleged to exist in that vein. The citizens of Virginia had discovered what they conceived to be an infallible way of "correcting it;" that is to say, it was their practice to mix a spoonful of water in half a tumbler of whisky, and then drink it. The whisky was supposed to neutralize the bad effects of the water. Sometimes it was considered good to mix it with gin. I was unable to see how any advantage could be gained in this way. The whisky contained strychnine, oil of tobacco, tarentula juice, and various effective poisons of the same general nature, including a dash of corrosive sublimate; and the gin was manufactured out of turpentine and whisky, with a sprinkling of Prussic acid to give it flavor. For my part, I preferred taking poison in its least complicated form, and therefore adhered to the water. With hot saleratus bread, beans fried in grease, and such drink as this, it was no wonder that scores were taken down sick from day to day.

Sickness is bad enough at the best of times; but here the condition of the sick was truly pitiable. There was scarcely a tenement in the place that could be regarded as affording shelter against the piercing wind; and crowded as every tent and hovel was to its utmost capacity, it was hard even to find a vacant spot to lie down, much less sleep or rest in comfort. Many had come with barely means sufficient to defray their expenses to the diggings, in the confident belief that they would immediately strike upon "something rich." Or, if they failed in that, they could work a while on wages. But the highest wages here for common labor were three dollars a day, while meals were a dollar each, and lodgings the same. It was a favor to get work for "grub." Under such circumstances, when a poor fellow fell sick, his recovery could only be regarded as a matter of luck. No record of the deaths was kept. The mass of the emigration were strangers to each other, and it concerned nobody in particular when a man "pegged out," except to put him in a hole somewhere out of the way.

I soon felt the bad effects of the water. Possibly I had committed an error in not mixing it with the other poisons; but it was quite poisonous enough alone to give me violent pains in the stomach and a very severe diarrhea. At the same time, I was seized with an acute attack of rheumatism in the shoulder and neuralgic pains in the head. The complication of miseries which I now suffered was beyond all my calculations of the hardships of mining life. As yet I had struck nothing better than "Winn's Restaurant," where I took my meals. The Comstock Ledge was all very fine; but a THOUSAND DOLLARS A FOOT! Who ever had a thousand dollars to put in a running foot of ground, when not even the great Comstock himself could tell where it was running to. On the whole, I did not consider the prospect cheering.

At this period there were no laws of any kind in the district for the preservation of order. Some regulations had been established to secure the right of discovery to claimants; but they were loose and indefinite, differing in each district according to the caprice of the miners, and subject to no enforcement except that of the revolver. In some localities the original discoverer of a vein was entitled to 400 running feet; he could put down the names of as many friends as he chose at 200 feet each. Notice had to be recorded at certain places of record, designating the date and location of discovery. All "leads" were taken up with their "dips, spurs, and angles." But who was to judge of the "dips, spurs, and angles?" That was the difficulty. Every man ran them to suit himself. The Comstock Ledge was in a mess of confusion. The shareholders had the most enlarged views of its "dips, spurs, and angles;" but those who struck croppings above and below were equally liberal in their notions; so that, in fine, every body's spurs were running into every body else's angles. The Cedar Hill Company were spurring the Miller Company; the Virginia Ledge was spurring the Continuation; the Dow Company were spurring the Billy Choller, and so on. It was a free fight all round, in which the dips, spurs, and angles might be represented thus—after the pattern of a bunch of snakes:

THE CLAIMS.

The contention was very lively. Great hopes were entertained that when Judge Cradlebaugh arrived he would hold Court, and then there would be some hope of settling these conflicting claims. I must confess I did not share in the opinion that law would settle any dispute in which silver was concerned. The Almaden Mine case is not yet settled, and never will be as long as there are judges and juries to sit upon it, and lawyers to argue it, and silver to pay expenses. Already Virginia City was infested with gentlemen of the bar, thirsting and hungering for chances at the Comstock. If it could only be brought into Court, what a picking of bones there would be!

When the snow began to clear away there was no end to the discoveries alleged to be made every day. The Flowery Diggings, six miles below Virginia, were represented to be wonderfully rich—so rich, indeed, that the language of every speculator who held a claim there partook of the flowery character of the diggings. The whole country was staked off to the distance of twenty or thirty miles. Every hill-side was grubbed open, and even the Desert was pegged, like the sole of a boot, with stakes designating claims. Those who could not spare time to go out "prospecting" hired others, or furnished provisions and pack-mules, and went shares. If the prospecting party struck "any thing rich," it was expected they would share it honestly; but I always fancied they would find it more profitable to hold on to that, and find some other rich lead for the resident partners.

In Virginia City a man who had been at work digging a cellar found rich indications. He immediately laid claim to a whole street covered with houses. The excitement produced by this "streak of luck" was perfectly frantic. Hundreds went to work grubbing up the ground under their own and their neighbors' tents; and it was not long before the whole city seemed in a fair way of being undermined. The famous Winn, as I was told, struck the richest lead of all directly under his restaurant, and was next day considered worth a million of dollars. The dips, spurs, and angles of these various discoveries covered every foot of ground within an area of six miles. It was utterly impossible that a fraction of the city could be left. Owners of lots protested in vain. The mining laws were paramount where there was no law at all. There was no security to personal property, or even to persons. He who turned in to sleep at night might find himself in a pit of silver by morning. At least it was thus when I made up my mind to escape from that delectable region; and now, four months later, I really don't know whether the great City of Virginia is still in existence, or whether the inhabitants have not found a "deeper deep, still threatening to devour."

It must not be supposed, from the general character of the population, that Virginia City was altogether destitute of men skilled in scientific pursuits. There were few, indeed, who did not profess to know something of geology; and as for assayers and assay offices, they were almost as numerous as bar-keepers and groggeries. A tent, a furnace, half a dozen crucibles, a bottle of acid, and a hammer, generally comprised the entire establishment; but it is worthy of remark that the assays were always satisfactory. Silver, or indications of silver, were sure to be found in every specimen. I am confident some of these learned gentlemen in the assay business could have detected the precious metals in an Irish potato or a round of cheese for a reasonable consideration.

It was also a remarkable peculiarity of the country that the great "Comstock Lead" was discovered to exist in almost every locality, however remote or divergent from the original direction of the vein. I know a gentleman who certainly discovered a continuation of the Comstock forty miles from the Ophir mines, and at an angle of more than sixty degrees. But how could the enterprising adventurer fail to hit upon something rich, when every clod of earth and fragment of rock contained, according to the assays, both silver and gold? There was not a coyote hole in the ground that did not develop "indications." I heard of one lucky fellow who struck upon a rich vein, and organized an extensive company on the strength of having stumped his toe. Claims were even staked out and companies organized on "indications" rooted up by the squirrels and gophers. If they were not always indications of gold or silver, they were sure to contain copper, lead, or some other valuable mineral—plumbago or iridium, for instance. One man actually professed to have discovered "amberggris;" but I think he must have been an old whaler.

The complications of ills which had befallen me soon became so serious that I resolved to get away by hook or crook, if it was possible to cheat the — corporate authorities of their dues. I had not come there to enlist in the service of Mammon at such wages.

Bundling up my pack one dark morning, I paid "Zip" the customary dollar, and while the evil powers were roistering about the grog-shops, taking their early bitters, made good my escape from the accursed place. Weak as I was, the hope of never seeing it again gave me nerve; and when I ascended the first elevation on the way to Gold Hill, and cast a look back over the confused mass of tents and hovels, and thought of all I had suffered there in the brief space of a few days, I involuntarily exclaimed, "If ever I put foot in that hole again, may the—"

But perhaps I had better not use strong language till I once more get clear of the Devil's Gate.

"INDICATIONS, SURE!"

GOLD MEDAL AWARDED TO GENERAL MORGAN.

THE BATTLE OF THE COWPENS.

JANUARY 18, 1781.

TO the Cowpens riding proudly, boasting loudly, rebels scorning, Tarleton hurried, hot and eager for the fight;
From the Cowpens, sore-confounded, on that January morning,
Tarleton hurried somewhat faster, fain to save himself by flight.

In the morn he scorned us rarely, but he fairly found his error,
When his force was made our ready blows to feel;
When his horsemen and his footmen fled in wild and pallid terror
At the leaping of our bullets and the sweeping of our steel.

All the day before we fled them, and we led them to pursue us,
Then at night on Thicketty Mountain made our camp;
There we lay upon our rifles, slumber quickly coming to us,
Spite the crackling of our camp-fires, and our sentries' heavy tramp.

DANIEL MORGAN.

Morning on the mountain border ranged in order found our forces, Ere our scouts announced the coming of the foe;
While the hoar-frost lying near us, and the distant water-courses, Gleamed like silver in the sunlight, seemed like silver in their glow.

Morgan ranged us there to meet them, and to greet them with such favor
That they scarce would care to follow us again:
In the rear, the Continentals—none were readier nor braver;
In the van, with ready rifles, steady, stern, our mountain men.

Washington, our trooper peerless, gay and fearless, with his forces
Waiting panther-like upon the foe to fall, Formed upon the slope behind us, where, on raw-boned country horses, Sat the sudden-summoned levies brought from Georgia by M'Call.

Soon we heard a distant drumming, nearer coming, slow advancing—
It was then upon the very nick of nine—
Soon upon the road from Spartanburg we saw their bayonets glancing,
And the morning sunlight playing on their swaying scarlet line.

In the distance seen so dimly, they looked grimly—coming nearer
 There was naught about them fearful after all,
 Until some one near me spoke in voice than falling water clearer—
 "Tarleton's quarter is the sword-blade—Tarleton's mercy is the ball."

Then the memory came unto me, heavy, gloomy, of my brother
 Who was slain while asking quarter at their hand;
 Of that morning when was driven forth my sister and my mother
 From our cabin in the valley by the spoilers of the land.

I remembered of my brother slain, my mother spurned and beaten,
 Of my sister in her beauty brought to shame;
 Of the wretches' jeers and laughter, as from mud-sill up to rafter,
 Of the stripped and plundered cabin leapt the fierce, consuming flame.

But that memory had no power there in that hour there to depress me—
 No! it stirred within my spirit fiercer ire;
 And I gripped my sword-hilt firmer, and my arm and heart grew stronger;
 And I longed to meet the wronger on the sea of steel and fire.

On they came, our might disdaining, when the raining bullets leaden Pattered fast from scattered rifles on each wing;
 Here and there went down a foeman, and the ground began to redden;
 And they drew them back a moment, like the tiger ere his spring.

Then said Morgan, "Ball and powder kill much prouder men than George's—On your rifles and a careful aim rely;
 They were trained in many battles—we in work-shops, fields, and forges;
 But we have our homes to fight for, and we do not fear to die."

Though our leader's words we cheered not, yet we feared not—we awaited, Strong of heart, the threatened onset, and it came:
 Up the sloping hill-side swiftly rushed the foe so fiercely hated;
 On they came with gleaming bayonet, mid the cannons' smoke and flame.

COLONEL TARLETON.

At their head rode Tarleton proudly—ringing loudly o'er the yelling
 Of his men we heard his voice's brazen tone—
 With his dark eyes flashing fiercely, and his sombre features telling
 In their look the pride that filled him as the champion of the throne.

On they pressed, when sudden flashing, ringing, crashing, came the firing
 Of our forward line upon their close-set ranks;
 Then at coming of their steel, which moved with steadiness untiring,
 Fled our mountaineers, re-forming in good order on our flanks.

Then the combat's ranging anger, din, and clangor, round and o'er us Filled the forest, stirred the air and shook the ground;
 Charged with thunder-tramp the horsemen, while their sabres shone before us, Gleaming lightly, streaming brightly through the smoky cloud around.

Through the pines and oaks resounding, madly bounding from the mountain, Leapt the rattle of the battle and the roar;
 Fierce the hand-to-hand engaging, and the human freshet raging
 Of the surging current urging past a dark and bloody shore.

Soon the course of fight was altered; soon they faltered at the leaden Storm that smote them; and we saw their centre swerve;
 Tarleton's eye flashed fierce in anger; Tarleton's face began to redden;
 Tarleton gave the closing order—"Bring to action the reserve!"

Up the slope his legion thundered, full three hundred; fiercely spurring, Cheering lustily, they fell upon our flanks;
 And their worn and wearied comrades, at the sound so spirit-stirring,
 Felt a thrill of hope and courage pass along their shattered ranks.

JOHN E. HOWARD.

By the wind the smoke-cloud lifted lightly drifted to the nor'ward,
And displayed in all their pride the scarlet foe;
We beheld them, with a steady tramp and fearless moving forward,
With their banners proudly waving, and their bayonets leveled low.

Morgan gave his order clearly—"Fall back nearly to the border
Of the hill, and let the enemy come nigher!"
Oh! they thought we had retreated, and they charged in fierce disorder, When out rang the voice of Howard—"To the right about face! Fire!"

Then upon our very wheeling came the pealing of our volley,
And our balls made red a pathway down the hill;
Broke the foe and shrank and cowered; rang again the voice of Howard—
"Give the hireling dogs the bayonet!"—and we did it with a will.

In the meanwhile one red-coated troop, unnoted, riding faster Than their comrades on our rear in fury bore;
But the light-horse led by Washington soon brought it to disaster,
For they shattered it and scattered it, and smote it fast and sore.

WILLIAM WASHINGTON.

Like a herd of startled cattle from the battlefield we drove them;
In disorder down the Mill-gap road they fled;
Tarleton led them in the racing, fast he fled before our chasing,
And he stopped not for the dying, and he staid not for the dead.

Down the Mill-gap road they scurried and they hurried with such fleetness—
We had never seen such running in our lives!
Ran they swifter than if seeking homes to taste
domestic sweetness,
Having many years been parted from their children and their wives.

Ah! for some, no wife to meet them, child to greet them, friend to shield them!
To their home o'er ocean never sailing back;
After them the red avengers, bitter hate for death had sealed them, Yelped the dark and red-eyed sleuth-hound unrelenting on their track.

In their midst I saw one trooper, and around his waist I noted Tied a simple silken scarf of blue and white;
When my vision grasped it clearly to my hatred I devoted Him, from all the hireling wretches who were mingled there in flight.

For that token in the summer had been from our cabin taken By the robber-hands of wrongers of my kin;
'Twas my sister's—for the moment things around me were forsaken—
I was blind to fleeing foemen, I was deaf to battle's din.

Olden comrades round me lying dead or dying were unheeded—
Vain to me they looked for succor in their need;
O'er the corpses of the soldiers, through the gory pools I speeded, Driving rowel-deep my spurs within my madly-bounding steed.

As I came he turned, and staring at my glaring eyes he shivered;
 Pallid fear went quickly o'er his features grim;
 As he grasped his sword in terror, every nerve within him quivered—
 For his guilty spirit told him why I solely sought for him.

Though the stroke I dealt he parried, onward carried, down I bore him—
 Horse and rider—down together went the twain:

“Quarter!”—He! that scarf had doomed him! stood a son and brother o'er him—
 Down through plume and brass and leather went my sabre to the brain—
 Never music like that crashing through the skull-bone to the brain.

PORT ROYAL, FROM NAVAL HOSPITAL.

THE title that I have given to this chapter of woe is a metaphorical one. I was not, like Columbus, exactly wrecked upon the coast of Jamaica. I was simply banished there by an Esculapian ukase, and forbidden, under penalty of death, to leave the island for six months. In this light, then, I was cast away, and—may Heaven be thanked for all its mercies!—I live to record the fact.

We are told of a snake that fascinates the bird it is making preparations to devour. I can imagine the feelings of a bird in this dilemma, for

I experienced similar sensations when I first saw Jamaica. The passage from New York in a ninety-ton schooner had not been a pleasant one. It was the stormiest season of the year, and, for a fortnight, I had not been able to use my legs; not from sea-sickness, for I'm never sea-sick, but I found it impossible to stand, like a fly, on the side of a wall. The four square feet of deck, to which my movements were limited, never lost their perpendicular during the voyage except when the larboard was changed for the starboard tack, or vice versa, and the base suddenly became the summit of the wall. Our cabin, about the size of a church pew, was frequently half full of water, and our fare of salt pork, varied by salt codfish, was eaten thrice a day on the floor. Night brought me no relief. My bunk was too wide—I believe the captain and his mate slept in it when there were no passengers—and I floundered from side to side like a live trout in a pannier. My bones ached and my hips were black and blue. On one occasion I dragged my trunks into bed, and wedged myself into a small coffin-like space. I'll never try that dodge again. I slept for five minutes—enduring in my dreams many, many centuries of torture—and awoke with six cubic feet of luggage on my stomach. To these grievances I may add another. The skipper had on board two ferocious British bulldogs, whose partiality for human calves made me exceedingly timid and nervous. I tried, unsuccessfully, to poison them. They watched me so intently in the morning, as I slowly performed the very difficult acrobatic feat of emerging from the schooner's bunk, that I sometimes lay in agonizing doubt for an hour before I dared get up. When we took our black pilot off Morant Point, the female animal, who was called "Elizabeth," advanced as quietly as though she were going to a legitimate meal, and, without a growl or note of warning, carved a large slice from the poor man's leg. It was the first time, the skipper apologetically observed, that "Elizabeth" ever tasted African flesh.

Under these circumstances the sight of any land would have filled my soul with joy. But Jamaica land! Except in Switzerland, I never saw such hills before; never, out of the tropics, such verdure. The rising sun rained upon the island a flood of glory, and the clouds that crept up the sides of the lordly summit of the Blue Mountain ridge, or rested lazily upon a thousand lesser peaks, were tinted with a wondrous touch. I was fascinated and ensnared. No temptation could have drawn me from Jamaica now. I hastily dispatched my forty-fifth meal of salt pork, when again summoned to partake of that inevitable dish, and returned forthwith to the deck. We were now becalmed; we had sailed away from the breeze.

It is not given to us to know whence any wind cometh or whither it goeth; but Jamaica winds, of all others, are the most incomprehensible. They blow steadily to a certain point, but further they are not to be coaxed. We came up to Port Morant at what the skipper called a "howling pace." After we passed that Æolian limit we could not compass half a knot an hour. Not a hundred yards astern I could see white crests upon the waves: the schooner, for the first time in my experience, was rolling on an unrippled sea. Our pilot—from his station on the house-top, which he had mounted to escape the tender mercies of "Elizabeth"—nursed his wound in sulky silence, and declared, after repeated questionings, that the breeze we had just left behind us would not reach Kingston for two months. It was a sea-breeze: our hopes lay in a land-breeze.

Puff! puff! puff! There she comes. (Hooray!) No, she doesn't. (Hang it!) Irritating us again with a make-believe. The man at the wheel whistled more vehemently than ever, but to no purpose; the sails swung heavily as before; and a mid-day sun made the tar fizzle in the rigging. Having swallowed my forty-sixth square lump of salt pork, I emerged from a stifling cabin to a more broiling atmosphere on deck. But a single spot of shade to be seen—and there, one had the certain prospect of being dashed to pieces by a restless mainsail boom. The coveted land-breeze flirted round us, filled our topsails for a moment, and then vanished as mysteriously as it came. The schooner turned her nose to every point in the compass, but could not sniff a breath of air. To scud for a thousand miles before a West Indian hurricane would, I thought, be preferable to a frightful stagnation like this. My head reeled with the heat, and by the time the sun was ready to set I felt that I was done to a turn for a cannibal. "Elizabeth," having shown unmistakable symptoms of hydrophobia, had to be chained up.

It is a consolation to know that suspense, however painful, has its limits. The breeze crept stealthily upon us in the darkness, and about midnight we anchored on the top of Port Royal's old cathedral spire. I speak of that Port Royal which, two centuries ago, was destroyed by one of the most terrible earthquakes on record, whose houses and churches still lie buried in the waters that swept over them. The sunken houses of Port Royal, on a fine clear day, can be distinguished beneath the surface of the ocean, and a buoy has been attached to one of the church spires. Thus it happened that our schooner, like many another vessel before, came to anchor on the very pinnacle of a steeple.

American divers are, or were when this was written, seeking for Port Royal's buried treasures. Hitherto they have recovered nothing but bricks, and these mementos of a fearful event in their island's history the Jamaica people are eager to purchase for six cents each. Bricks, it must be confessed, are not very suggestive; and these bricks so closely resemble ordinary bricks that I do not give a photographic fac-simile. But opposite the harbor of modern Port Royal there is a stone which revives, more vividly than bricks can, the Tragedy of the Ancient City. "Here lieth"—says an inscription on an unpretending monument—"the body of Louis Caldý, Esquire, a native of Montpelier, in France, which country he left on account of the Revocation. He was swallowed up by an earthquake which occurred at this place in 1692; but, by the great providence of God, was, by a second shock, flung into the sea, where he continued swimming until rescued by a boat, and lived 40 years afterward."

Port Royal was once the commercial emporium of the West Indies; it is now a naval and hospital station. It was rebuilt after the earthquake of 1692; but, having been destroyed again by a fire in 1702, devastated by a hurricane in 1722, and depopulated by an epidemic that immediately followed, the seat of commerce was removed to Kingston; and if Jamaican commerce, sick and prostrate, can be said to have any seat at all, in Kingston it still is.

Port Royal is situated at the extremity of a tongue of land, and is about six miles distant from Kingston. There is a ferry between the two towns. No, my New York friend, not such ferry-boats as ply between the metropolis and its suburbs; but a ferry-boat propelled by a couple of negroes, and carrying two, or, in cases of emergency, three passengers. I availed myself of this mode of conveyance; for the breeze was not expected to arrive this day before half past eleven o'clock, and our schooner had to wait for it on top of the old church steeple. Long before she left her anchorage I was standing on a very dilapidated wharf in the city of Kingston. It was not a pleasant locality. The surrounding beach lots were filthy, the miasma was offensive, and the sun raging. I began to think of schooner-life with something like regret. I looked wildly about for relief, and moved toward the awning of an American brig, lying providentially at an adjoining dock.

The first creole of Kingston whom I saw, and whom at this time I can distinctly remember, was a woman. I would speak of her with chivalrous gallantry, and as one of the loveliest of her sex, if my description were not accompanied by a faithful likeness. Of her dress and appearance I leave the reader to form his own opinions; I will only say, in a parenthesis, that the red kerchief with which her lovely head is adorned is part of the West Indian national costume. It is also proper to add that the personage in white is a policeman, and not the writer of this sketch.

SPRUCE-BEER SELLERS.

"Mr. Gentleman, my lub," exclaimed a voice in drawling but still most seductive accents. I turned and beheld the lady balancing a bottle on her head with the skill of a necromancer.

"Come here, my darlin'."

I approached cautiously, prepared, if necessary, to defend myself.

"Would 'em like a glass o' spruce?"

This was the explanation of the terms of endearment. They are part of the stock in trade of street peddlers. I was thirsty, but dared not try the spruce, and so I stated. She was eloquent in persuasion; but I had the fear of cholera-morbus before my eyes, and my powers of resistance were adamant.

"Well, my lub, hab you shirts for de wash?"

No; I had no shirts; and as I moved off, I could hear the lady telling herself, after the fashion of the country, that "anoder worthless feller had come to Jamaica."

I reached the brig without a coup de soleil, and was followed by a crowd of ragged ebony youths offering their services. I came to a parley under the friendly awning, and asked for a guide to take me to some respectable lodging-house. It was a difficult business to negotiate; for I knew that if I favored one the others would follow me through the town, hurling after me the whole dictionaries of negro slang. I objected to a moral pillory like this; and by great good luck succeeded in escaping a penalty that most strangers are compelled to bear. I held up a sixpence to the covetous gaze of the Arabs, and then flung it into the sea. Out went the coin full twenty yards, and—splash!

splash! splash!—over the quarter-deck of the brig some twenty or thirty dusky forms, rags and all, plunged headlong into the water. I could see them below the surface swimming about like sharks—rising every now and then with a handful of mud which they eagerly scrutinized. At last the victor appeared with the sixpence in his mouth. Now the fight commenced in earnest. I watched the combatants until, entangled in one dark mass, they sunk like a rock: then I beat a hasty retreat.

"Will any of them be drowned?" said I, to the youth who had cunningly remained to accompany me.

"He, he! massa! 'Em niggers can't drown." And this is really the truth. They are amphibious animals.

My sable cicerone, known as Lightfoot, was an excellent specimen of the Kingston Arab—respectful to those who gave him a good job and good pay, but insolent to all others. He brought up a gentleman's trunk one day from the steamer, and was offered a sixpence for his trouble. Lightfoot made no violent demonstration of disgust or disappointment. His feelings were under perfect control. He assumed a theatrical air, and, by various manœuvres, attracted the notice of by-standers.

"What does dat mean?" he exclaimed, with an air of ineffable contempt, holding out the image and superscription of Her Britannic Majesty in the palm of his right hand.

"That is to pay you," answered the traveler, timidly.

"Oh, tank you," returned Lightfoot, with dignity; and turning round, he handed the coin to a scrubby urchin at his heels. The traveler was crushed. I believe he afterward tried to appease the rascal's wrath by giving him a dollar.

But Lightfoot, as I said, is no bad representative of his class—a class of good-for-nothing idlers that loiter in the streets of Kingston and other Jamaica towns. Their ages are between fifteen and twenty-five; they detest regular employment, and hang about strangers for accidental jobs. None of them, probably, ever wore coat or boots in their lives. They are smart in a certain sense, and quick to perform a service. Though they are incorrigible thieves and liars, they can be trusted with a bank bill or a valuable parcel. But they will steal a shilling from loose coin in your drawer, help themselves to your cigars, and abstract a shirt which, in negro logic, is “too old for buckra to wear.” Lying is a habit that they never put off unless it be by accident. They attach themselves particularly to American strangers, for they have visions of rich harvests reaped from California passengers when steamers, running between Aspinwall and New York, stopped at Kingston to coal. They sometimes pretend to be Americans, and are cunningly familiar with the town in which, to excite an interest in their favor, they swear they were born. They are terrible and most persevering bores—watching a stranger by day and night, and pouncing upon him directly he emerges from his hotel. A dozen of these Arabs will scramble to hold your horse's head, or run your errand, and all will demand payment for the service and will abuse you scurvily if you don't grant it. Occasionally they give proof of their remarkable physical capacity. Lightfoot carried my two trunks to the lodging-house in King Street, a friend having first piled the enormous load upon his head. The walk, without any encumbrance, was enough for me, for at every step we sank ankle-deep in sand. I should have died of heat if I had not stopped and purchased an umbrella. The proprietor of the store, who was ready to sell a bottle of rum, a hat, or an almanac, as well as an umbrella, eyed me askance, and added three shillings to the price of the article. To take strangers in is a time-honored Jamaican custom.

Novelty of any kind can be endured, and the novelty of Kingston may, by ingenious management, be made to last three days. After that period has elapsed the stranger is reduced to despair. He will then meditate escape, and if he can not accomplish this the chances are that he will end his days in a lunatic asylum.

Kingston contains 40,000 inhabitants. Long, long ago, as every one knows, it was the first city in the West Indies; it was the great dépôt of trade between Europe and the Spanish Main; its merchants were princes, and its aristocracy rivaled, in their magnificence and munificence, the nobility of the mother land. Now Kingston is a shattered hulk lying high and dry upon the rocks of misfortune. Its splendor and comeliness have disappeared. Commercial capital and agricultural capital have been withdrawn. Credit was lost overboard before the ship stranded. Sensible men, who were able to escape, abandoned the wreck in season, and those who, willingly or unwillingly, remained, seem to be very hard up. I saw the whole of Kingston one morning before breakfast, and I did not meet a white man in my perambulations. The city is the filthiest that I ever dwelt in. Its Board of Health is composed of turkey buzzards; all the garbage that they fail to carry off is left to rot beneath a blazing sun. Carrion crows are the only scavengers I ever saw at work in the streets of Kingston. Situated on an inclined plane, and with every facility for drainage, the city has no drains, and water stagnates every where. Naturally one of the healthiest places in the West Indies, it is never free from epidemic fevers. Its hospitals, badly built and badly managed, are a lamentable indication of the prostration of public spirit, enterprise, and philanthropy.

Kingston is not lighted even with oil lamps. The streets, as I have already stated, are covered with the sand that is washed down from the mountains in rainy weather. At that period of the year the thoroughfares can be crossed in boats. At other times they are obstructed by stones and bricks that the floods left there ages ago. There are no trottoirs, but before each door a dilapidated stone platform, ragged and uneven, prevents one walking in the shade of the houses. A pedestrian is in danger of breaking his legs if he attempt to navigate among these excrescences. It would be safer to walk in a quarry of broken rocks. There is but one word to be said in Kingston's favor: it is well laid out. But one would willingly dispense with rectangular streets for a little more cleanliness, for a pavement to walk upon, for a tree to ward off the rays of a terrible sun. Even the square, in the centre of the city, is innocent of a speck of green. It is a Zahara, on a small scale, of mountains and valleys of sand. The dust in dry weather is alarming. It penetrates your skin, fills your ears, eyes, and boots, and makes mush of your coffee. I have known a dinner service, plates and dishes, to be completely entombed while the meal was being cooked. But to be out of doors and encounter one of those rolling clouds of sand! Allah il Allah! Imitate the Arab of the desert, and put your head between your knees: otherwise you must perish.

Then the houses. One gets into bed in this land of earthquakes with solemn convictions of the uncertainty of life. A huge crack that traversed the ceiling of my room lent an unction to my nocturnal devotions. It would take such a very little shock, I thought, to widen that crack for bricks, stones, and what not to fall through; and one brick, nay, half a brick, is enough to mash the human cranium. But I mean to speak now more particularly of the outside appearance of the houses. Antiquaries and other curious folk, in search of the last stage of dilapidation, should go by all means to Kingston. They will find its edifices of a composite order of architecture—roofed in mosaic and walled up with strange (pardon me, Madam, for the expression!) make-shifts. In the upper part of the town there are domiciles that may have been pretentious a hundred years ago. But they are strangely at variance with modern notions of comfort and propriety. Most of them are surrounded by a decayed brick wall, ornamented at the apex with broken bottles, wine glasses, and decanters. These fragments are possibly meant to commemorate the good old times when Champagne and Burgundy occupied the place of rum and water. A door in this wall creaks on rusty hinges as it is opened; steam-power alone could turn the key in the lock. It is, consequently, never turned. Before you now is the residence of one of the old aristocracy. You hardly fancy that it is put to present use; you examine it as you would an antique relic. The very stone looks worn away by ocean tides of misfortune. Nothing that time has destroyed within forty years has been replaced. That brick, half buried in the ground, fell years and years ago from the angle beneath the roof. You have no doubt of the fact. There is the hole filled with moss; and immediately below is the brick of the same size and shape. There are fifty such apertures, tenanted by lizards and scorpions. The roof is like a patched quilt, and is mended by the square inch where the rain enters. There is not a speck of paint to be seen on the wood-work, not a vestige of ornament any where. If the building were not so ugly and uncouth, you might contemplate it as you would some medieval habitation. But there is no interest about it, except such bare and unsatisfactory interest as ruin and decay can give. These are the houses in which the better class of Kingstonians live. They are the "feature" of the city. After this description of two and three story edifices, the one-story stone houses and wooden huts of the lower classes may be imagined. Those who have ever noticed the sentry-box, erected opposite the Astor House, New York, for the accommodation of the overseer of the Fourth Avenue Railroad in wintry weather, will have some idea of the majority of negro dwellings in Kingston. They may be a little larger than the box to which I have likened them, but they do not seem to be better built. The public buildings and churches, though not actual ruins like so many of the houses, have, with a few exceptions, an old and weather-beaten appearance. Only the stores, on, I think, two streets, appear to be kept in moderate repair, and they are not to be compared with the stores of a third-rate European or American town. A general coup d'œil of Kingston, if such could be obtained, would create the impression that the city had been steadily bombarded for a month. It would be the most rational and natural explanation of its condition. All its ruins may be visited, and all its "sights" seen, in an hour's walk before breakfast. There is nothing then left to examine or study but the manners and customs of the inhabitants; and queer enough they seem till their novelty wears off.

A punctual creature, like myself, soon becomes exasperated in Kingston. A breakfast ordered at nine is sometimes ready at eight, but oftener at ten. So with all the duties of life in the exercise of which your comfort depends on any other human being than yourself. Punctuality in business or pleasure is unknown. I advise the unfortunate wretch doomed to live in Kingston to fling this virtue to the winds, for, sooner or later, in very despair, he will be compelled to cast himself upon the current of events and accept with gratitude whatever turns up. I did this at last. If mosquitoes discovered the holes in my bed-curtains, as they were certain to do, I endured their attacks with Christian fortitude, though they left me in the morning covered with bleeding wounds. I found it wasting words to ask that the holes in my curtains might be mended. If my boots were not cleaned or my bath was not ready, I waited patiently until the gentleman engaged for these services was at liberty to perform them. If I desired to ride, and had ordered dinner early for that purpose, I did not murmur when the meal appeared two hours after time. I bore the loss of my ride with a calm philosophy that, before this Jamaica experience, I should have deemed unattainable. Complaint was useless; violence was worse than useless. It would have been very possible to smash chairs, tables, and glass-ware; but for such an act of retributive vengeance one would have been mulcted in heavy damages by a black judge. A plea of compensation would not be allowed.

No creole of Kingston or Jamaica has any conception of the value of time. A stranger must persuade himself that his time is of no account whatever either to himself or to any one else. He must acquire the habit of indulging this conviction; it must, in fact, be a practical conviction, or his mind will never be at ease. I asked permission one day to look at a volume of public documents, and the official in charge told me to call again, as the book was not in his possession. I called again every day for a week, and was on each occasion assured that "the next day" I could see it. I went into the country for a month, and when I returned I called again. I called every day for another week, and I received every day the same answer. I wanted to see if it were possible to wear out the Jamaica stone by continual droppings. It was utterly impossible. I then asked timidly where the book was? It was in the room occupied by the official. Somebody who lived in the next street had the key of the case. Being informed of this, I found it easy enough to get the key; and in five minutes the volume was looked over and returned.

The habits of the Kingstonian differ from those of the European or American. White creoles, or foreigners who are old residents of Jamaica, look delicate and attenuated. They seem to lack physical strength as well as life and vigor. Even in speaking they drawl out their words as though it was too violent an effort to utter sound. A gentleman is seldom seen walking; if he is, he is pointed out contemptuously by the negroes as "a walking buckra." Horse exercise is à la mode, and a clerk on two hundred a year will ride home to his lodgings, in the upper part of the town. No one rich enough to wear a coat would be seen carrying a parcel in the street. The handsomest white women in Kingston are Jewesses. Nearly the entire trade of the town is monopolized by Jews; and I have seen them, though not frequently, of all shades—quinteron, quarteron, mulatto, and even black. The creole white ladies are pretty; their features are regular; their eyes are splendid. But their figures want the inviting charm of robustness and roundness. They are very indolent, and show few signs of life, except when a dance is on the tapis; then they go mad. I have seen the most languid Letitia Dieaway dance for six mortal hours, with the thermometer at ninety degrees Fahrenheit. People of every class, sex, and age in Jamaica are insane upon the subject of dancing. Quadrilles are spoken of contemptuously; but waltzes, schottisches, and polkas are pronounced glorious. If a few people meet by chance at a friend's house, a fiddler—and such a fiddler!—is immediately called in. He will then be heard scraping away all night. A husband and wife will sometimes amuse themselves by dancing together alone. I have seen men of seventy whirling round at a 2.40 pace, and a gentleman with a cork leg performing the same feat. In their physique the light-colored creole women of Jamaica are superior to their fairer countrywomen. Their animal spirits are more buoyant; their figures are more robust. In many all traces of African descent have disappeared, and those who are acquainted with their family history alone know that Anglo-Saxon blood, unmixed, does not course in their veins.

It is the habit in Jamaica, as in all tropical countries, to rise early in the morning. Most people get up before sunrise. After the inevitable cup of coffee, the husband goes to his office, and the wife attends to her household duties. Breakfast, served at ten o'clock, is a serious meal, at which beer is the beverage of males, and tea that of the weaker sex. Between breakfast and dinner the ladies are invisible. They are seldom seen in the streets; and a brute who would intrude upon their solitude, or rudely interrupt their siestas, would merit incarceration for life. During these hours—that is, from 11 A.M. till 5 P.M.—the heat of Kingston is intolerable. The dinner-hour varies from five to seven, according to fashion and taste; and at nine the inhabitants generally retire. This last rule is not observed when it interferes with the three popular amusements of Kingston—dancing, flirting, or whist. Now I am partial to a rubber, and can enjoy myself thoroughly when my partner is of the male gender, and does not revoke. I can also spend a pleasant evening with a pretty girl on a moonlit balcony—especially if she does not object (as what Jamaica girl will?) to the position, when she can not have the motion of the waltz. But I write down dancing in tropical heat as a cut beyond Eli. I once essayed it, and disgraced myself. I was moved to make the experiment by the demon Jealousy, who persuaded me that, peradventure, I might be able to dance, as no man knew what he could do till he tried. So I tried. The lovely Dulcinea had been in the arms of a British officer for two terrible hours. They both were quite dank from the exercise, and clung to each other—involuntarily, as I do believe. The face of the military hero was redder than his coat, while rivers of perspiration ran from his brow, and untwisted the points of his mustache. Dulcinea's hoops saved her from looking like a lady after a bath. I solicited and obtained her hand; but whether it was the clamminess of that member, the heat of the atmosphere, or the motion of the dance that overpowered me, I know not. At the third turn I felt the peculiar sensation that precedes insensibility. Then a blank. When I awoke the British officer was giving me rum and water—a drink that I detest. Apropos of rum: a person going to Jamaica must acquire the habit of liking it. There is nothing else to imbibe—nothing else, certainly, that is good. Long drinks, short drinks, punch, bitters, cocktails, and stone-fences are made of rum. Every one offers a visitor rum and water, and a visitor can not refuse to drink without insulting his host. Iced rum and water, or, when the Boston vessel is not up to time, lukewarm rum and water—that is the idea.

It afforded me some amusement, while the novelty lasted, to sit on the balcony of my hotel and watch the passers-by. That hotel itself is a curiosity in its way. It is one hundred and fifty years old, and looks as dilapidated as other buildings in Kingston. Its interior arrangements, however, are more creditable to the proprietress than its outward appearance. The floors, for instance, are black as ebony, and shine with polish; the plates are clean; and the beds are free from scorpions and chigoes. In the parlor, a large, airy room, there are several pieces of antique furniture—hair sofas, as hard as rocks; a lounge that I never saw on its legs; and chairs that nearly broke my back when I tried to sit upon them. Several books, printed in the last century, were probably meant to be ornamental. The side-board was covered, and no doubt is still covered, with the glass of the establishment. I had tender feelings for a splendid punch-bowl, of antique manufacture; for though plain rum and water is nauseous to the uninitiated, rum-punch, well concocted, is one of the elixirs of life. From this parlor and its mosquito tenants I was glad to escape as soon as sunset and an evening breeze made the balcony endurable; and I will add that, in these far niente moments, the punch-bowl and a cigar made me more charitably disposed toward my Jamaica fellow-mortals than I would have been without such agreeable companions. Practical charity, I begin to think, depends very largely on eating and drinking. After a good dinner, nine men out of ten will put a benignant hand in the pocket and pull out half a dollar for the beggar; after a bad dinner, if the hand travel pocketward at all, it is to button it up.

I have a vivid recollection of the bewildering spectacle that King Street presented when I first saw that leading thoroughfare from the point of observation just mentioned. It was Christmas season, and peoples' minds were running riot on balls and festivities, dancing and merry-making. Crowds of the poorer class were passing to and fro—some in rags and tatters, others decked out in fantastic attire. A negro woman has not a particle of mauvaise honte; she spends all the money she gets in gaudy ribbons and kerchiefs; and the more color she has about her head the higher she holds it. She never imagines for a moment that she is the subject of ridicule. As the people pass they talk and jabber incessantly, and in a dialect that I find it impossible to comprehend. It is a pure Jamaica patois—that is, if purity and corruption can co-exist. A negro invariably converses with himself, if he has no one else to address; and he speaks all the louder if he fancies that his observations attract notice. He then makes violent efforts to crack jokes, and raise a laugh at his own expense, or that of any of his friends. In many respects he is irresistibly droll, and appears the more so to one unaccustomed to his ways. Some of the more aristocratic of their class take the omnibus—a species of covered van, that wanders about Kingston without any fixed principles—starting at no given point, and arriving at no certain end. The fare in these vehicles is sixpence, but where from or where to I was never able to learn, though I repeatedly inquired. The sound of a horn and a cry of “The mail! the mail!” directed my attention to a ragged, barefooted negro, mounted on one mule, and dragging another behind him. This was the royal mail. The cortège came up the street at an express pace, tilted against the omnibus, and experienced a momentary discomfiture. A dark lady in the bus, whose bonnet was flattened by the collision, called the mail-rider a “dirty nigger,” and that public functionary returned the compliment with interest from under the mule’s belly. For a moment there was some prospect of a row; but the mail-rider, accustomed doubtless to such contretemps, speedily remounted, blew his horn ferociously, and galloped with desperation through the crowd.

Night falls quickly in the tropics, and after six o’clock there is no light to lighten the multitude that still passes up and down King Street. The noise of their talking is occasionally varied by snatches of “Lucy Neal,” or “Ole Virginny,” or notes from an accordeon or jews-harp. The howling of a child and the crack of a whip prove that some “stern parient” does not spare the rod even in the street. Above all this tumult, the shrill screech of girls vending sundry articles of food can be distinctly heard. One keeps up, without intermission, the cry of “Ba-pea-nut-ire!” which, being interpreted, means, “I am here selling pea-nuts.” Another screams, “Pep’mint, sug’r-candee, goin’ fast!” A man with a lantern on his head shouts, in stentorian bass, "Cre-e-e-me!" and sells, for ice-cream, an infernal decoction that would inevitably give any white man instantaneous colic.

Many of the people were wending their way to the market, and I went too. It was with some difficulty, and not without frequent admonitions of "Don't fall, my love!" that I waded through the sand and avoided the rocks that lay in the street. While crossing the square I fell into a pit, and was picked up by three pea-nut girls, each of whom wanted sixpence for her trouble. I escaped from their embraces, and ran into the arms of a white man, who was sauntering leisurely along. He addressed me in French, then in Spanish; and condescending at last to talk in English, recounted some passages in his adventurous life. I felt interested.

"By-the-way," said he, suddenly turning the conversation, "have you a threepence about you?"

"Sorry to say I haven't."

"Perhaps, then, you have a spare cigar?"

"Regret that I left my case at home."

"Ah! very unfortunate. Good-night."

"Good-night."

The market-place is a feature of Kingston—let no visitor fail to see it. If any thing can give us an idea of the confusion of tongues at Babel, it is this. Some fifty or sixty women squat upon the ground, with piles of fruit and vegetables before them. They do not wait patiently for purchasers, but address themselves vehemently to the throng, and extol the superior quality of their merchandise. Yet, with all its savage peculiarities, the scene is picturesque and attractive. A ruddy glare from a score of torches checkers the crowd with patches of fitful light—illuminating, here and there, a group of dusky creoles, and leaving the rest in a blacker shade than night itself. The Jamaica negroes, of both sexes, are not generally ill-featured. I do not know whether their ancestors were Eboes, Mandingoes, or Koromantynese; but it is certain that the creole is very unlike the newly-imported African. Occasionally you will meet with a flat-nosed, thick-lipped negro in Jamaica, but not frequently. Their eyes are brilliant, and their teeth are white as pearls. An American negro can be detected at once by his looks. He is not so well-favored as the West Indian. The lithe, active, upright figure of the female is perfected by the habit of carrying head-loads. Any one of the groups in this market crowd, seen by torchlight, is quite an artistic study. The easy attitude of all: the men in their white shirts and trowsers; the women dressed also in white, and with the inevitable kerchief twisted, not ungracefully, round their heads. I have seen tamer pictures. Then the marvelous piles of fruit! How they are all sold is a mystery that I could not fathom. Such quantities of cocoas, pines, oranges, mangoes, grenadillas, sapodilloes, and vegetables of all descriptions—comparatively valueless in Kingston, but worth a mint if they could be taken to a Northern market.—Fruit, indeed, is about the only thing that one can buy cheap in Jamaica. All other necessities and luxuries are enormously high. New York prices prevail, though New York comforts are, of course, out of the question.

I had the honor, while in Kingston, of living next door to his late Majesty the Ex-Emperor of GROUP IN THE MARKET-PLACE.

WEST INDIAN SOLDIERS.

Hayti, now plain Monsieur Soulouque. The view from my bedroom window was limited, in fact, to the imperial yard, and I was forced to become rather unpleasantly familiar with the little domestic economies of the exiled family. If I except the unmerciful castigation of a child twice a-day, I must confess that I saw nothing about the monarch, his wife, his children, or his suite to indicate the cruelty that has made the name of Soulouque so prominent in Haytien history. The Emperor himself is a portly gentleman, with a coal-black complexion, and a rather stupid expression of countenance. His age may be sixty-five; and from the fact that he moved with difficulty, I judged that he either had the gout or was threatened with that aristocratic affliction. His principal occupation was, and probably still is, card-playing; and people say that his old soul is greatly rejoiced whenever he wins a shilling. Undoubtedly he is not the rich man that some suppose him to be—nor the shrewd man either. There is the leer of small cunning only in his eye. He may have had the wit to fill his pockets before he left his country for his country's good; but I doubt whether, in the days of his prosperity, he had the sagacity to invest half a million in the English funds, as people say he did. He is a silly, vain, ignorant fellow; and, as Emperor of Hayti, was nothing more than the tool of designing men, who made him do what they liked, by telling him that he was one of the most enlightened sovereigns of the age, and that his dynasty would surely last forever. He soon disgusted the people of Jamaica with his mean ways, uncouth pretensions, and pitiable vanity. I saw his Majesty one day backing out of the purchase of a horse, which the owner had brought fifty miles for his accommodation. He tried various dodges to get rid of the bargain, and found fault with the head, tail, and feet of the animal. At last he disputed about its age; and, to settle the point, brought out a foot-rule, to prove, as he said, from the length of its leg, the year in which it was born. The horse-dealer vanished in a cloud of indignation and disgust.

When Soulouque arrived in Kingston he was terribly scared by the crowds of people who dogged his footsteps. They, poor creatures, were only excited at the idea of having a black king among them. He saw in every one who noticed him an instrument of Haytien vengeance. On these occasions he would hurry home, or rush for protection into some friendly dwelling. With that drollery which is a striking feature of the negro character, and with unerring instinct, the idle scamps of Kingston seized the ludicrous points of Soulouque's position. To them, a king of their own color seemed the absurdest possible creation, and they chased him about the streets as boys chase a dog with a watering-pot tied to his tail. The old gentleman had no peace until the novelty of his position wore off. He changed his lodging from a two-story to a one-story ruin; and though, in public, he still appears in superfine cloth and unexceptionable boots and gloves, I fancy that this fashionable attire is specially reserved for state occasions.

ENTERING HORSES FOR THE RACES.

The Ex-Empress washes her lord's linen; and as washing is an expensive luxury in Jamaica, Madame has the reputation of being an economical housewife. I pitied the Princesses when I saw them sweeping out their stone-paved yard, or preparing yams for their parents' meal; but I felt no ambition to re-enact the fairy legend and be its hero. The Princesses were very black and—very untidy. They sometimes omitted to wear boots, and the backs of their dresses—ladies, don't blush!—were seldom laced. It is greatly to be feared that the Royal family will never regain their lost honors. Monsieur Geffard feels secure in his Presidency. He lately gave permission to some of Souloque's banished officers to return home; and I enjoyed the felicity of being fellow-passenger to Jacmel with the wife and family of General D—. The lady's baggage alone included 33 trunks, 12 band-boxes, 8 carpet-bags, a parrot, a puppy-dog, and a monkey. These people measure their importance and social dignity by the extent of their baggage, and, according to this rule, Mrs. General D— had not lost caste in exile. She had not lost flesh either, I should say, for she weighed, at the very least, 400 pounds avoirdupois when she appeared on deck, in all the colors of the rainbow, after a prolonged fit of sea-sickness. I muttered a prayer for the safety of the men who conveyed her and her baggage ashore in a boat that seemed altogether too contemptible for such a cargo.

I said, if I remember right, that there were only three amusements in Kingston—dancing, flirting, and whist. I wish now to correct or modify the statement. There are two perennial enjoyments of an exciting character—the elections and the races. The former is monopolized by those who have votes to sell, and those who are looking for votes to buy. As property in one case and money in the other are indispensable requisites, this amusement is limited to a favored few. For several weeks before election the negro freeholder is in a state of mental distraction. Both Smith and Jones, the rival candidates, have sworn to him, on their sacred honors, that his welfare and interests alone have tempted them to forsake the pleasures of private life for the toil and trouble of a public career. Mr. Quashee scratches his head and does not quite believe the argument; but his doubts are dispelled when the agent of Smith exhibits superior energy, and visiting his constituent in his own home, gives unequivocal proof of friendship.

"Hi!" says Quashee to his friend Julius the same evening, "me vote for Smitte; Massa Brown say so; him fus-rate buckra—treat 'em like a king!"

And this is the way the elections go in Kingston. The planters are too proud to canvass after the popular fashion, and the Legislature is filled with men who make legislation the sole business of their lives.

The races, or "The Kingston Meeting," as it is called, is the crowning event of the year, and takes place in December. Men, women, and children, who can walk or drive to the course, are sure to be present. Nothing else is talked of for a fortnight previous. "Just in time for the races," is the remark of every one to the newly-arrived stranger: "how lucky!" "Very," answers the stranger, politely. As the time approaches the excitement of the negro population exceeds all bounds. Every woman purchases some piece of finery, and every man a new hat, to wear on the occasion. They all have stakes on their favorite horses, varying from a cent to a shilling. They know the name of every animal going to run—their pedigree, their capacity, their owners, their riders. When the long-expected morning at last appears, shops are closed and business is suspended. No one would dream of demanding payment for a note that came due on Race-day. About noon streams of people may be seen traveling to the course, half a mile out of town. A stand has been erected for those who can afford and are willing to pay for indiscriminate shelter. First-class nabobs keep their carriages, and the oi polloi keep their feet.

The latter, some ten or twenty thousand in number, are certainly a strange and motley crowd. As in dense bodies they rush to and fro to catch the various points of the race, their black faces, white dresses, and lively decorations form curious contrasts. The animals competing for the "Queen's plate," the "Garrison cup," or the "Jamaica spoon" are not likely to call forth the admiration of foreigners. The horses may have an unexceptionable pedigree, but they do not look in very high condition. Their negro riders flaunt the faded colors of their masters, and use the spur (bound to their naked feet) with great liberality. Three races per diem will keep this large assemblage of persons exposed to a blazing sun during three entire afternoons. Miserabile dictu! They do not know the meaning of the word time. For many succeeding days the inhabitants talk of nothing but the winning nags, which, more frequently than not, are the property of the same individual, for race-horse breeding is a luxury in Jamaica that few can afford to enjoy. In the "good old days" it was different. The Jamaica aristocracy could then afford to breed fast horses, and many of them did so. A planter of the olden type once declared, before a committee of the House of Commons, that he could not reckon his income; but being pressed by earnest gentlemen to name a figure, he said that his profits might be about three hundred thousand pounds sterling a year! "That was a comfortable income," says the modern Jamaica planter, as he helps his friends to salt fish and rum-and-water. It is all he can do. The spirit of hospitality is still there; but, Ichabod! the glory thereof has departed.

Oh, the heat, discomfort, and weariness of Kingston after a week's residence! They accumulate hourly at compound interest. I stood them for eight days and was utterly prostrated. An awful thunder-storm and two earthquake shocks were insufficient to rouse me. I can not imagine, to this day, how I regained enough energy to move, for moving implied packing up. A traveler who has never packed up with the thermometer at 90°, has never had his temper really tried. Now I am utterly unable to pack up systematically. After I have labored for an hour, and locked my trunk with a groan of relief, I invariably discover that some indispensable article of dress has to be fished up again. In Jamaica, moreover, you are sure to miss shirts, socks, and handkerchiefs when the time of departure comes. That is the moment of tribulation selected by hardened wretches to rob you. I do not know how it is with other people, but the loss of my linen worries me for a whole day, and destroys my appetite. It puts me in a fever now to think of the excruciatingly hot morning on which I started for Spanish Town, the seat of the Jamaican Government. The distance, some eight or ten miles, is accomplished by railway—the only little bit of creole enterprise that Jamaica can show. The train left half an hour after time, as a matter of course. Idiot that I was, I nearly brought on a rush of blood to the head by dreaming I was too late—as though any man can be too late for any thing in Jamaica! I paid my fare at the box-office, forgot in my haste to take a ticket, and was fined four shillings for the omission. Well, off we went; but ten minutes after we started we were obliged to halt for fuel. The wood was not split, and that job had to be performed before we could budge. I was surprised that the passengers were not invited to lend a hand, as I have frequently seen them helping to roll the cars on the track. The confusion of tongues, the delay, and the heat combined to make me delirious; but Heaven is merciful, and I ultimately reached my destination in safety.

Fifty years ago the population of Spanish Town was estimated at 5000 souls, and it still stands at the same figure. It is composed of long, narrow streets, and ragged houses. Facing each other on a small square, in a central location, are two large buildings, in good repair it is true, but of a sickly yellow color, and without any architectural ornamentation. One is the Governor's residence; the other is the House of Assembly. Here, too, is a statue in honor of Admiral Rodney, who, on the 12th of April, 1782, destroyed the French fleet off Dominica. The enemy was on its way to form a junction with the Spanish fleet. United, they would have mustered sixty sail of the line, and their operations would, in the first instance, have been directed against Jamaica. The inhabitants, therefore, had good cause to honor their deliverer, and raise a costly monument to his memory.

When the Legislature is in session Spanish Town is by no means lively, but when members have gone home it is an utterly dead city. It might be mistaken for an ancient Roman cemetery. Its population is composed of Government hangers-on, or of those who supply board and lodging, food and raiment, to Government hangers-on, with a fair sprinkling of beggars and gentlemen who live by their wits. It was the point whence I started on an extended tour through the interior of the island. On the subject of that tour I have little to say. It was, my pocket tells me, a very expensive tour; but, on the other hand, my common sense persuades me that the escape from Kingston life was cheaply purchased at any price. Traveling in the country parts of Jamaica, including horse and carriage hire, servants, and hotel bills, costs about fifteen dollars a day. It might be done for twelve; but the roads being abominable, the chances are that cheap horses or a cheap buggy would break down and leave one to perish in the mountains. A stranger must make up his mind to be cheated at every inn. Remonstrance is worse than useless; it merely breeds disputation, which, in a tropical country, will be avoided by sensible men. It is cheaper to wear a smiling face, and pay the bill like a man, without examining the items.

I am not going to describe Jamaica: it is too much of a subject for me; and then, descriptions are always stupid. Every one knows that the scenery, like that of most Caribbean islands, is mountainous, grand, and picturesque. The Blue Mountain Peak—the loftiest in Jamaica—is 8000 feet above the level of the sea, and travelers are sometimes insane enough to ascend it. They find up there nothing but mist, though they always expect to see the coast of Cuba, eighty miles distant, on the strength of a legend that an indistinct haze, pronounced to be the Queen of the Antilles, was once detected from the Peak on a very clear day. A very unusual day it must have been, for when on the Jamaica mountains I never could see the sun, much less the island of Cuba. It is quite cold on the tops of these hills, and a fire, even at Newcastle, where the troops are stationed, is a luxury during the months of January and December. Every one, I believe, further knows that Jamaica is naturally very rich and fertile. Its original name of Xamayca, the land of wood and water, is eminently appropriate. The island is intersected by over two hundred streams and rivers; its forests are celebrated throughout the world for their dyes and cabinet woods; its soil yields every variety of tropical fruit and vegetable. Perhaps a tenth part of the island is in cultivation, and that, I need hardly say, is a rude and imperfect cultivation. Coffee, ginger, and pimento—the last in very large quantities—are raised on the mountains; cane pieces, embracing altogether some 20,000 acres, are to be found in the valleys and on the level lands. It is estimated that, in Jamaica, there are four million of acres capable of being planted in cane and coffee. Every one, I take it for granted, has read accounts of the island's agricultural and commercial depression; and these accounts can scarcely be exaggerated when it appears as a fact, about which there is no dispute, that two-thirds of the coffee properties and one-half of the sugar estates have been abandoned by their owners within half a century. The soil of Jamaica is so rich, that two years after an estate is thrown out of cultivation it is covered with bush, and scarcely to be distinguished from wild land. A deserted plantation house, choked up with rank weeds and vegetation, is too common a sight to attract much attention.

The island now contains some eight or ten minor towns, with populations varying from ten to one thousand; but the description given of Kingston may be taken as a description of each and all. Some of them—as, for example, Port Maria, where Columbus first essayed to land in 1494; St. Anne's Bay, or Don Christopher's Cove, where the illustrious discoverer was wrecked in 1502; and the site of Sevilla d'Oro, the ancient Spanish capital, and once the centre of Castilian splendor—are historic spots, and as such are visited by travelers. But I confess that I am a Galileo about these matters. I do not feel the slightest interest in the stone on which some great filibuster lunched, nor in the spot where self-satisfied hidalgos and dark-eyed señoritas loved and languished, three hundred years ago. I have never coveted the nose of a heathen deity, however celebrated, nor bullets from a battlefield, however well contested, as mementos of my travels. I would rather visit towns, whose hotels are famous for their beef-steaks and XXX, than the most interesting spot in the world, and be dieted on the Romance of a Past Age. A live dog is any day better than a dead lion; and Jamaica has many of the characteristics of a dead lion. One can not enjoy scenery, be it ever so beautiful, or trace the footsteps even of a Columbus, upon such feed as salt fish and yams. On the whole, I think I can recommend Jamaica to those who are ambitious of ending their days in a lunatic asylum. One may get accustomed to the melancholy stupor of its town existence, or to the despairing solitude of its rural vegetation, but the chance of surviving the acclimating process is slender. It will be found too terrible an ordeal for any one accustomed to think and to act. I escaped; but I certainly should not like to run the risk again.

No. 10 BLANK STREET.

A GENTLEMAN CAN BE ACCOMMODATED WITH a pleasant suit of rooms, at No. 10 Blank Street. The house contains all the modern improvements. References required.

THE advertisement seemed to me to promise well. I was tired of my present home. For five years I had occupied the same rooms, and sat in the same seat at table. The penny postman was not better known on his beat than I on my way to dinner. I did not object to boarding-houses. I was willing to eat baked beans of a Sunday morning, but I wished to partake of them in a new locality. Blank Street leads out of Beacon, therefore it must be genteel. Probably a suit of rooms there would be expensive, but I could afford to indulge myself a little. I was thirty-five, alone in the world, very well off, and doing a business which promised a speedy fortune. It was time I should begin to take life a little more on the sunny side.

I went to No. 10 Blank Street on my way down town. The landlady, Mrs. Lee, was a widow; handsome, stylish, apparently not more than thirty. I heard, afterward, that she would never see forty again; but as my informant was a boarder to whom she had been under the frequent necessity of sending her "small bill" a second time, it was doubtless a malicious slander. She was a very attractive-looking person, and I was at home with her at once. I had no sooner told her my name and my business than she seemed to feel well acquainted with me. She bowed and smiled.

"I shall be most happy to accommodate you, Mr. Prescott. This way, if you please."

Her black silk rustled before me up two flights of stairs. Her full, light curls shook with a coquettish grace as she turned her head. The rooms were delightful—spacious and handsomely furnished. The terms were a little exorbitant—at least I should have thought so had I been dealing with a man of business; but surely one would willingly pay a trifle extra to sit at the same table with Mrs. Lee. Her family, she assured me, was of the most select description; some three or four single gentlemen of high standing, and as many gentlemen with their wives. To be sure, she had been obliged to fill her attics with cheap boarders, as she couldn't afford to keep any vacant room; but they were very quiet, and, she trusted, no annoyance to any one.

I went there, bag and baggage, the next morning. I moved my pictures; I loved Art in a modest, half-diffident fashion, and I had some fine prints and a few choice oils. When I had hung them to my satisfaction, and put the bust of Clytie, the dreamy face I loved so well, on my mantle, I looked about my parlor with serene self-satisfaction.

I met Mrs. Lee's family at dinner. Some of the gentlemen were business acquaintances of mine. The ladies seemed pleasant and companionable, and "all went merry as a marriage bell." Mrs. Lee did the honors of her establishment so gracefully that I was more charmed with her than ever. I pitied the dead Thaddeus—I had seen his name in the family Bible—because he had been obliged to resign so much youth and beauty, for she was but a young thing, she told me, when she was left to depend upon herself. The very winds, she said, had never been allowed to touch her roughly. Mr. Lee had worshiped her as the Hindoo does his idol—I thought it an idolatry at once pardonable and pleasant—but he died suddenly, and in some way she was defrauded of all his property, and had been obliged to take care of herself ever since. But then, she said, smiling with the tears still in her eyes, every one had been so kind to her—she had found friends every where. Who could help being ready to befriend one so lovely and so winning? I thought, as I listened to her.

Do not imagine all this confidence was bestowed on me at our first meeting. It came out gradually, when I had got in the habit of lounging for half an hour after dinner, or an hour in the evening, in the "family parlor," of which she and I were often the sole occupants. I certainly had no matrimonial intentions toward Mrs. Lee. I liked my freedom, and I intended to remain a bachelor; still, I was interested in my landlady, and congratulated myself daily on having found a home where my buckwheats were always hot, and my cup of happiness and of tea alike sweet and full.

"What a happy man your husband should have been!" I said to Mrs. Lee, as I watched, admiringly, her nimble fingers—she had insisted on mending my gloves. I was but expressing a frequent thought of mine. I saw no call for my landlady to blush, though it was not unbecoming. I had surely meant nothing sentimental, but she received my remark with a flutter of pretty, playful embarrassment.

"I hope he was," she sighed; "I trust I made him so, and yet I did not love him as he loved me. He was a great deal older than I, and I think I was too young then to know what love was. I believe our affection is truer and fonder when we have seen more of life, and learned what a precious thing it really is to have some one to care for and protect us. But what am I saying? I am confiding in you strangely. Your gloves are done."

She hurried out of the room. It was my turn to be embarrassed. Had I said any thing to move Mrs. Lee's sensibilities in so remarkable a manner? I thought not. Perhaps the memory of the dead Thaddeus, and his love, had been too much for her. I felt uncomfortable, and I betook myself to my own room. I always left my door open; it was one of my old bachelor ways—it seemed more social. As I went up stairs I saw a girl standing before it, looking, apparently with absorbed attention, at my Clytie. Her form was slight and girlish. I could not see her face, but her dress was of a cheap material, and simply fashioned.

"One of the attic boarders," I thought; "or perhaps a seamstress bringing home some work."

When I approached her she turned and glanced at me with a confused and distressed air.

"Forgive me, Sir," she faltered. "I was taking a liberty, I know; but that face is so beautiful."

"So are you," I longed to retort, but I did not. I had had enough of complimenting for one day. Her face was singularly lovely. She had a low, broad forehead—the very forehead of the immortal Clytie. Her eyes were large and blue, but full of the saddest, most wistful expression I ever met. Her face was very youthful—she couldn't have been more than sixteen—and her full, red lips had something of the look of a grieved child. I had seen and felt all this in the instant my eyes met hers. I bowed courteously.

"Not at all a liberty! I am rewarded for leaving my door open if it has afforded you any pleasure. I wish you would step in a moment, and look at my pictures. If you fancy the Clytie, I am sure you would like some of them."

There was a singular absence of all prudery or affectation about the child. I suppose she saw in me simply a middle-aged man—for so I must have seemed to her youth—of honest face; and she bestowed on me at once a trust that was the most delicate of flattery. She came in, unhesitatingly, and lingered for a few moments, while I told her about the pictures. I could see the fibre of her mind by the expression of her countenance and the tone of her remarks as she looked at them. She had large ideality, strong love for beauty, which had probably been starved all her life. It was such a pleasure to see the light grow and deepen in her great eyes, as she stood with that wistful face, those parted lips, that I wished the resources of the Louvre had been at my command. When she had seen them all, she thanked me in that simple, child-like way of hers.

"You have given me a great pleasure, Sir. I must go now; but I shall have something to think of which will make many a day's work easier."

"Do you live here, Miss—?"

"Hastings," she supplied. "My name is Nora Hastings. Yes, Sir, I live here—up stairs. I breakfast and dine earlier than you do, and I sit at the corner table; so it is not strange you have not seen me, though of course I had seen Mr. Prescott, the new boarder. Good-evening, Sir."

She moved from me up stairs as she spoke. It was not quite sunset, in the long summer day, and, as she went up, the rays struck through a side-window, and kindled some golden lights in her brown, wavy hair; and somehow my boyish fancies of Jacob's ladder, and the angels going up and down it, came into my mind, and I went into my room, saying to myself, "Heaven bless the child!"

I flatter myself that I made use of a degree of diplomacy which would have done credit to the Chevalier Wykoff in questioning the chamber-maid, next morning. I had her in to dust my books, under my personal supervision, and I drew her into conversation about several of the boarders. At length I asked, "Was there any one in the house I could get to do some sewing for me, did she think? Had I not heard of a Miss Hastings, who was a seamstress?"

"Perhaps so; but Miss Hastings did not do such work as gentlemen wanted"—with a hearty Irish laugh. "She finished off dresses, and trimmed them, and made mantillas. Most likely this was not what I wished to have done!"

"Most likely it wasn't. But perhaps the young lady was not always busy. If she were out of work, she might like to do what I did want in her spare time."

Ellen thought she did not have any spare time. She made every thing look so beautifully that the ladies kept her always busy.

"And she's the rale lady hersel'," broke out the warm-hearted Hibernian, in a gush of irrepressible panegyric. "She's so afraid of making any trouble, though sure I'd work my fingers to the bone to spare those white hands of hers. When I was sick, and like to die with the fever, who but she took me into her room and nursed me, and sat up with me nights, after working hard all day; and when she thought I was asleep I heard her prayin' for me! Her prayers wasn't out o' the prayer-book, but I know the saints heard 'em."

She stopped and wiped her eyes on the corner of her calico apron. Man though I was I could have wept with her easily. It went to my very heart to think of the poor young thing doing patiently and secretly such works of mercy. But I was not surprised. I had read the true, earnest nature, the power of self-sacrifice, in her eyes. God bless and God keep her! I said it to myself every time I thought of her, and those times were not few.

That day I purchased a Clytie, the fac-simile of my own. At night I took it home with me, and I wrote, to go with it, these words:

"Will Miss Hastings permit her fellow-boarder to offer her a gift, the acceptance of which will confer much pleasure? Her admiration of the Clytie was so hearty and genuine that, he thinks, to possess it may contribute slightly to her happiness."

I rang for Ellen, and begged her to take the bust and the little note up stairs. Presently she came back, bringing with her a few lines written in pencil:

"I accept your gift, as I am sure it was meant. You have designed to give pleasure to one who possesses few resources for amusement, and be sure that you have succeeded. I thank you more than I can say."

She had received it, as I was sure she would, with a simple dignity and gratitude which, had my motives been evil, would have repelled me far more effectually than any sarcastic refusal. I respected all women. It was a part of my early training at the hands of the best of mothers; but already I revered that young sewing-girl more than any woman I had ever seen.

Mrs. Lee puzzled me not a little when we met, as we usually did, in the parlor after tea. One or two of the other boarders were there at first, but presently they went out and we were alone. It seemed to me that her manner toward me was far more like that of a young girl to whom I had been making love, than like a landlady's simple courtesy toward her inmate.

"I am not sure that I had better stay here with you," she began. "You do beguile me, as you did last night, into saying such unwarrantable things, revealing all my heart to you."

I was utterly confounded. What had I been doing? I bethought myself of Mrs. Bardell's suit against the respected President of the Pickwick Club, and trembled in my patent-leathers. Mr. Weller's advice to Samivel came into my mind, and I answered, a little stiffly,

"I had not meant to force your confidence, dear Madame, and I did not know that you had ever said any thing to me which the whole world might not properly hear."

Perhaps she thought she had been progressing too fast. She smiled, shook her long, fair curls, and rustled the folds of her black silk. She said I was "a naughty man, a very naughty man, to take up things so. Of course she had not said any thing to me of consequence; only it was just possible some people might think it a little queer that she had confessed not to have loved Mr. Lee quite as adoringly as he had loved her. But why need she trouble herself when she knew it would go no farther?"

"Of course it would not," I answered. "Any thing that she did me the honor to confide to me was sacred."

Then there was a pause, and I felt very awkward. It would be difficult to say any thing more, I thought, but Mrs. Lee did not find it so. Verily the tact of women is wonderful! In five minutes we had gone back two days, and were talking together on our old terms of pleasant, easy familiarity. I was somewhat more absent-minded than formerly, perhaps, for many of my thoughts were with the little girl in the attic.

It was three days after I had sent her the Clytie before I saw her again. Then I met her on the stairs. It was eight o'clock, or past, in the evening. I was going out, after my customary chat with Mrs. Lee in the parlor, and I met her coming in. Her face was very pale, and she stepped wearily. She smiled a little when she saw me, and, stopping, held out her hand.

"You were very kind, Mr. Prescott, and I am more grateful than I can say."

"I only wish," I responded, eagerly, "that I could, that you would let me contribute to your pleasures now and then. You look tired, and I can't bear to see a young girl like you wearing herself out."

"It can't be helped, Sir. I'm only too thankful that I have something to do. I need nothing; all my wants are supplied. It is pleasant to feel that I have a friend; and I look on you as one, though I have no claim on you."

"Would to Heaven you had a claim on me!" I thought, as I watched her toiling so wearily up the stairs. Would that she were my sister, my niece, any thing that would give me a right to take her work out of her hands, and prescribe for her change of air and scene, rest, and a little pleasure! Then I fell to thinking, as I strolled across the common, what a sad, strange tyrant Custom is. Society would let me do what I pleased for my second cousins—would smile on me if I sent clothes to the Sandwich Islanders, or arithmetics to the Hottentots—but would by no means let me lift the burdens of this poor girl, who was my neighbor, with one of my fingers! I cried out against the absurdity of such a decree. Why must I pile up useless wealth and she suffer? But for her sake I must submit to laws I could not change; for her own sake I must not seek to help her.

As I came home, though, I did indulge myself so far as to buy a tea-rose in full bloom and a pot of heliotrope. They stood in my room overnight, and the next morning I sent Ellen to her with them, and the request that she would take care of them for me. I had taken it on trust that she loved flowers, and I was not disappointed when Ellen came back and told me Miss Nora was so overjoyed to get them that she almost cried.

I happened to meet her that day as I went up from dinner.

"I have to thank you again," she said, earnestly. "I am grateful. The flowers will be such company for me."

I asked her then if she would find time, the next afternoon, to go and see some pictures with me. It was when the English collection was at the Athenæum, and there was one painting of "Hinda" which I longed to have her see. It was the face of one who waited and watched, and somehow I had associated it with hers. She could not refuse, she said; it would be such a rare pleasure she must make time somehow. While we were talking Mrs. Lee came through the hall. She nodded to me, but she cast on my companion a look of singular distrust and dislike. I noticed it then, and remembered it afterward.

She spoke to me that evening about Nora Hastings. She had observed me talking with her, she said, and would I tell her if I was going to marry her? I might think it a very strange question, one which she had no right to ask, but, if I chose to answer it, she would convince me that she had good reasons.

I had no cause for hesitation. The thought of marrying Nora Hastings had never occurred to me, and I told her so frankly. I related to her the beginning of our acquaintance, and its slight progress, including my invitation for the next day. Then I waited for her reply.

"I hardly know what to say, Mr. Prescott," she began, in her soft, insinuating voice, shaking gently her head, with its long fair curls.

"I am sure it would be kinder to say nothing, and it's not at all necessary, since you do not think of making her Mrs. Prescott."

"But what if I had been intending to marry her, Madame?" I spoke a little sternly, perhaps, for I had satisfied her curiosity, and I was determined she should make the explanations at which she had hinted. I think she was unwilling to refuse me, still she spoke with hesitation.

"It is nothing; at least if any other gentleman in my family had been going to marry her, I should have said it was nothing and kept silence; but I have looked on you as my personal friend, and I should have told you that I considered her an artful, designing girl, who had tried to entrap several of my best boarders into marrying her, and had failed hitherto."

I half wonder that this did not shake my confidence in Nora, but it did not for an instant. Her face, her pure, noble face, was her best advocate. It rose before me then, and I replied, unflinchingly,

"I am sure, Mrs. Lee, that you must be mistaken. As little as I know Miss Hastings, I would be ready to answer for every act of her life; though she has a frankness and simplicity of manner which might possibly mislead some. I am certain that you do her injustice."

"Let us hope that I do," she said, with a smile. "It has ceased to be of interest to me, now that I know she is not likely to affect the happiness of one whom I consider my friend."

She diverted the conversation into other channels; but I believe I had been a little vexed by her pertinacity in reminding me that I had assured her I was not going to marry Nora Hastings. I had told her the simple truth when I said that the idea of such a marriage had never occurred to me. But now that she had put it into my head, it did occur to me again and again. I took such an interest in Nora as I had never taken in any one before. Perhaps I could not win her; but if I could—I paused, and strange, sweet thoughts drifted through my mind, of what it would be to be loved and watched and waited for by such youth and beauty; to have her altogether my own. How she would love her husband, I mused—she with no other near tie in the world! My dreams that night were rosier than any of the hopes of my by-gone youth.

We had a couple of pleasant hours the next afternoon, looking together at the pictures. Now that I had begun to think of Nora as one who might some day make my world, I saw new charms in her every hour. It was a pleasure to show her works of art. She had seen so few, and she enjoyed them so intensely, and appreciated them with such a fine, inborn taste.

It was not the last afternoon we spent together. Oftenest we went to see some new bust or picture; but once or twice I persuaded her to let me drive her out into the country, and new life seemed to bound in her pulses, and youthful brightness and hope to tinge her pale face, as the trees shook down their odorous blossoms upon her head, and the wind kissed her cheek, and lifted the hair from her brow. I had begun to think of her as mine, and to dream fond dreams of how I would cherish her.

I went home one evening, when I had known her two months. I had intended to send for her, as I did sometimes, and ask her to join me in a little walk. I went into my room, and presently Ellen tapped on the door. I opened it, and she placed a little note in my hand. She had been crying, and she said, as she gave me the paper,

"That 'll tell you about it, I suppose, Sir. Miss Nora's an angel and nothing else, and I've given the mistress notice. I'm going next week. I won't stay where they've treated her so, poor darlin'!"

I tore open the note, and bade Ellen wait for a moment while I read it. The handwriting was hurried and irregular; the words went to my heart:

"Mrs. Lee tells me she has let my room to a person who will pay more. I am obliged to go to-day. She intimates that I have lowered myself in your estimation by my forwardness, and that I have lost the respect of the boarders. This may be so, alas! I fear it is. I could bear all else, but to have lost your respect is terrible. You were very kind to me, and it was so sweet to have a friend. Do not think any worse of me than you can help. If I have been forward and presuming, it was because I knew so little of life. I shall remember your goodness, and be grateful to you forever.

NORA HASTINGS."

My poor, wronged, innocent darling! If I had never loved her before I should have loved her then, and longed to shelter her from a cold world in my heart.

"Where has she gone?" I asked, turning to Ellen. "She does not tell me."

"She has gone to Mrs. Miles's, on Derne Street. The lady had given her a great deal of work, and been very kind to her, and when Miss Nora found she couldn't stay here she went to her with her trouble, and so Mrs. Miles said she should stay there till she could look about for a new place."

So there were still some kind hearts in the world, I thought, gratefully, who could show pity to the orphan and the friendless. God bless them all! But she, my poor little love, should never need to seek another boarding-house if she could only love me, and let me care for her.

"I am going to see her," I said to Ellen, as she seemed to wait for my comments.

"Bless you, Sir! The very sight of you will do her good. She took with her the white head you gave her, and the two flower-pots. I wish you could see how she's tended them flowers. They never had a dry leaf; and to-day she cried over 'em enough to water 'em."

I found Mrs. Miles's without difficulty. I asked for Miss Hastings at the door, and presently she came to me in the little reception-room where I had been shown. She looked as if she had almost wept herself blind, poor child.

"You do not despise me, Mr. Prescott, or you would not have come to see me?" Her voice trembled.

"Despise you! Nora, I love you with all the power of loving which God has given me. I have come to ask you to be my wife. You hold my fate in your own hands. Will you make me happy or wretched?"

No matter about her answer. She told me all my heart craved to hear. Looking into her truthful eyes, I knew that she was mine, my young, innocent love!

After a while I sent for Mrs. Miles to come to us. I recognized in her a lady whom I had sometimes met in society, and for whom I entertained a sincere admiration. I told her, in brief, the history of my acquaintance with Miss Hastings, and that I desired to make her my wife with as little delay as possible. Did she think the needful arrangements could be effected in a week?

They should be, she said. Nora should be married from her house, and a week would be time enough in which to provide all that was immediately necessary. So it was settled.

The next day I gave Mrs. Lee notice that I should vacate my rooms at the end of the month. I never exchanged one word with her on the subject of Nora's sudden ejection from her house. She had an undoubted right to let her rooms as she pleased. I sent her my wedding-cards—it was my only revenge.

Three years have passed since, and Nora, as bride and wife, has been to me all that I hoped, and more.

HOW CHARLIE CAME HOME.

OF all the easy ways of doing business Mr. Carston had the easiest. Some one else always did it for him. Contrary to the received maxim, that if you wish a thing done well you must do it yourself, it was generally performed in a much better style than possible through any personal attendance on his part. For Mr. Carston was accounted by his acquaintance to be a simpleton of the first water. The somebody else who always did what was to be done was Mr. Carston's only son and heir, Charlie Carston, who shared his father's weakness only in such an inferior degree that all the neighbors thought it an extremely wise thing when, returning on one occasion, he saw the course of affairs, and decided upon remaining within the walls of the paternal mansion, and opposing a steady front against the invading waste and ruin. As to Mr. Carston's being a simpleton, opinions, which are as various as tastes, differed. However, he proved the validity of the title to the satisfaction of his acquaintance early in life and by divers devices. In the first place, being heir to an estate, he broke the brief entail allowed by our laws to share it with some cousins in the third degree, who had as good a right to it as he had, except that they hadn't got it. After that, studying medicine, and having a most lucrative practice offered him, he threw up the whole affair because convinced that the science of physic was too empiric for an honest man to pursue. He finished his absurdity by becoming a lawyer: not, he said, that the former trade exceeded the latter in villainy and charlatanry, but law in the abstract, pure law, the law of nations, was worthy of life-long study; and thus absorbed, he condescended to perform the little actions required by his neighbors in this profession, to carry on various severe and trying lawsuits, to worry and vex himself within an inch of his life, and all without ever drawing the attention of any one to a slip of paper whereon he stood as debtor to John Carston, Jun. Furthermore, to prove his total incapacity for every thing in this sphere, Mr. Carston, when attaining middle age, had taken to himself a wife; and what was more aggravating under the circumstances—a young wife; and what crowned all—a city wife. Now for Mr. Carston to bring home a little, pale, thin-slipped, and finger-ringed child to be mistress of what ought to be (and unhappily was not) the finest farm in Wiltshire County was too much for human endurance. That she beheld in her husband one of the Olympian deities was no extenuation of the weakness, in his neighbors' eyes. And when they further added to their offense by adding one more to the population of the planet—these two people, little more than babies themselves—and the young mother grew ever paler, and as her son entered this life slipped away herself into another, the whole community voted in a body (or would have done so if called on to express their feelings) that it served him right.

These are the facts in Mr. Carston's case. Add to them a perpetually varying and increasing margin of minor details—such as his indulgence of Charlie till that young man became, before he knew the glory of buttons, the pest of the village—his bestowal of an item of his wealth on every beggar that thought fit to darken his door—his frequent reconciliation of his neighbors where a decent lawyer would have pitted them against each other—his payment of subscriptions and abandonment of politics—and his total inability to see his own advantage—and you have as fine an instance of imbecility as one might hope ever to see in a tax-payer. It was really provoking to be obliged to look on and contemplate the ruin of such a place as Mr. Carston's might have been; and his neighbors finally refused to look on; they interfered, and assisted, and instituted a thorough system of—Heaven forbid that I say sponging! but then what shall I say? There was yet one incident unmentioned in the category of Mr. Carston's outrages on common sense, where we must join the general cry: Mr. Carston was domineered over by a woman. He ate his bread in trembling, made no murmur over a picked-up dinner on Monday, nor over a cold one on Sunday. For at that stage of his widowed life when Master Charlie was safe from all tyranny within jacket and trowsers and the walls of a distant school, Mr. Carston allowed himself a housekeeper, and if there was a tyrant on the face of the earth that housekeeper was she. Mrs. Heads entered the house with a rule measure in her eye, which she at once applied to every object: the chairs were instantly regulated thereby, the tables squared, the pictures rehung, beautiful antique escritoirs and cabinets were dispatched to the attic as "clutter," a plumb-line was the motto of all her proceedings, and, in her own expressive language, every maid that came under her thumb was obliged to toe the mark. Her voice, sonorous if not sweet, was heard as early as the cocks crowed, and only subsided with the nine o'clock evening bells; and under her vigorous administration, against which he was unable to make an impeachment, the neighbors declared that Mr. Carston dared not call his soul his own. But do not imagine that this berated man was altogether vicious. Indeed he had one virtuous act to be recorded in his favor—the only evidence of a sane and whole mind. He had once quarreled. It was during the great Jackson excitements, when every body took one side or the other, and he and an old intimate, Mr. Burleigh, held opposite views. The debates waxed high, till principles were forgotten in personals, and Mr. Carston found it impossible ever to forgive his friend's difference of opinion, and at the same time relinquished the frivolous pursuit of government as exemplified through federal politics. Mr. Burleigh was of no such implacable stuff. He would long ago have shaken hands over their feud, if he had ever found opportunity; but since the day of their difficulty some chance had prevented their encounter.

When Charlie Carston came home from his study of the law he at once entered a little vigorous opposition to Mrs. Heads's authority, which he meant to follow up with as stout a rebellion. But that dauntless dame, by a low diet of all manner of uneatables—by a perpetual system of house-cleanings—by limp wrist-bands and unglazed collars, and by a frequent and judicious letting alone, soon reduced her truculent patient to very reasonable terms; after which, so long as he submitted to the sway of her sceptre, he found his linen resplendent, his dinners sumptuous, and his physical well-being unrivaled. But Charlie's moral state under the Heads dynasty was deplorable—one long-continued and unbroken protest. He protested against the rising before the sun, and the breakfasts by candle-light; he protested against the enforced slumber at primitive hours, though Mrs. Heads might declare that when the birds went to roost it was a call of Nature for man and beast to do the same; he protested against the perpetual alarm, no repast in peace, no nap unbroken; he protested against the shrill sounds of Mrs. Heads' voice, in its ceaseless aspiration; he protested against the niggardliness of the menage; he protested against the want of any hospitality—against the espionage over himself—against the power that did not allow his father one suit till the other was threadbare—against his father's submission thereto—against Mrs. Heads herself. But all Charlie's protestation amounted to nothing at all; Mrs. Heads pursued the even tenor of her way with serene imperturbability.

It had been decided that Charlie should take the whole business of the farm off his father's hands, and share with him the profits; that he should now and then enter the office for any writing that might be necessary; and by this arrangement much good might be done, and his father would thenceforth have all the more time to attend to his great work on the Arbitrament of Nations. Mrs. Heads had stoutly opposed all this at first; but for once Charlie was too much for her, and she contented herself with taking a firmer footing in the house, and with being yet more unmerciful to man, maid, and master. She knew very well that Mr. Carston would not dismiss her, for he had a vague idea that a housekeeper without views of matrimony was a rara avis; beyond this, he did not wish the trouble of making a new selection, and seeing a new face; moreover, he had an indefinite idea that she had nowhere else to bestow herself. Charlie knew better; he was aware that Mrs. Heads had a snug little place in an adjoining county, which she rented reasonably, and that, with her thirteen years' wages comfortably laid away, she was by no means an object of charity. But men never know how to right themselves under feminine bondage, unless by turning tyrant too, and this it is unpleasant for a gentleman to do. Consequently Master Charles became a person of one idea. It was his fixed determination that Mrs. Heads should leave the house. It was Mrs. Heads's fixed determination that he should. Which of the two contending forces won the day we shall see; but meantime it was absolutely necessary that Mr. Carston should have a housekeeper.

Charlie had taken the reins into his own hands, and been actual master for some six months; he was looking forward to an abundant harvest; all went right out of doors, and he was in excellent spirits. The fences had been rebuilt, the neighbors' cattle politely refused admittance, the fallows put down to crops, the worn-out fields turned fallow, and a large piece of dairy-land added by purchase. This dairy-land had been the occasion of an outburst from Mrs. Heads that would have made a fainter heart than Charlie's quail. Not another milk-pan should Lindy, the dairy-maid, set; not another pint of cream should she skim; not another pound of butter should she make. There were cheeses, and to spare, in the house, and not one should go out to market—not one! She was not going to slave herself to death to feed a worthless set of city trash—not she! Them as wanted the cheese and butter extra might make it themselves. But in spite of Mrs. Heads's objection, thus expressed, as her skirts flashed from door to door, and her elbows suggested to Charlie the old and juvenile game of "honey-jars," the land was added, cattle of celebrated breed imported, and (without any labor to Mrs. Heads, except that she had an additional maid to scold) the produce of the farm dairy was sought for far and wide. Then there were several acres of hill and stony pasture, which had long been put to no other use than that of a general blue-berrying region; this region Charlie proposed to populate with sheep. Mrs. Heads's ire flashed higher than ever. Another pretty piece of business! Did he suppose she was going to have a hundred more fleeces, two or three hundred additional pounds of wool heaped on the yearly store in the attic? Did he suppose the women had nothing to do but pick wool and spin yarn from morning till night for him? If he did, he was mightily mistaken. Not a reel should turn in the house, not a hank should be wound. If there was a sound she hated, it was the buzz of a spinning-wheel; she heard it enough, and she would hear it no more! It was high time of day, if she was to be marched about by a chit of a boy just out of pinafores; if she was, she'd like to know it. She believed Charles Carston was a natural fool, eating himself out of house and home with a parcel of sheep. Charlie's intimation that sheep required little outlay beyond salt and turnips, and that she would have no trouble from the wool, as it would be sold in the raw state, was merely whistling down the wind. Having once expressed her opinion she was bound to maintain it. If another sheep came on the farm she'd poison it! Charlie laughed, and ordered his horse thereat, for to-day was the great State agricultural fair to be held in the adjoining shire town of Wiltingshell, and he thought it likely that he might obtain the very animals he desired. If there were any thing in which excelled this young gentleman, who, just from college and law school, found such satisfaction in making "two blades of grass grow where one grew before," it was horsemanship. He reminded you that the Centaurs might not have been fabulous; and as he flashed by on his superb bay, with the light in his broad blue eyes, and the sun playing in his bright brown curls, I can not say how many of the buxom farmers' lasses, jogging along in the backs of the wagons to the fair that morning, incontinently lost their hearts to the possessor of that merry smile and cheery voice. To be sure the farmers' wives might wonder how so gay a face came out from Mrs. Heads's shadow, and where all these fine doings which he had set on foot were to end; but the lasses were sure nothing of his arrangements would turn out ill, whatever the arrangements of Providence might do. And for some mysterious reason farmers, and wives, and daughters, in spite of misgivings or mislikings, answered his smile as he passed, and confessed that he held a share in every one's affection, and that it was a miracle how such a lad could be the son of Mr. Carston, who was the greatest simpleton, and so forth, and so forth. In the fair that day people scarcely behaved better, and among the throng he melted his way like a sunbeam. He talked with the fathers, praised the mothers, "treated" the daughters, and went on his conquering way till he had completed his business in an entirely satisfactory manner. Meeting Ned Haughton, the two then sauntered out on the common, where there were to be fire-works and fire-balloons at nightfall, and where a group of young ladies, residents of the town, gay and rosy, already stood.

"Who is that with Ned Haughton?" asked Maria Brown, a blonde. "Do you know, Sophy?"

"It is Charlie Carston," said Sophy Burleigh, the prettiest and most roguish brunette in Christendom.

"Squire Carston's son?" asked Rachel Green. "How did you know him, Sophy?"

"By a natural antipathy," replied Sophy. "You know our fathers are sworn enemies."

"And you mean to reverse the rule?" asked her sister Anne.

"Mr. Carston, Miss Brown," said Ned Haughton, now joining them. "Miss Burleigh, Mr. Carston; Miss Anne Burleigh. Miss White, Miss Green, Miss Gray, Mr. Carston. Mr. Ephraim Smith, Mr. John Smith."

After which ordeal Charlie proceeded at once to extract as much honey as possible from this cluster of flowers. As they finally wound away processionally from the common, he found himself by Sophy Burleigh's side—very naturally, since he had placed himself there—and they paused at the door of her residence, where Haughton and Miss Anne were already awaiting them.

"Come in, Ned," asked Miss Sophy; "come in to tea, and bring Mr. Carston. Father 'll be glad to see you, and Anne won't have to prink before the glass till you come again this evening. Come! you see that latter consideration makes it a work of charity!"

"For shame, Sophy!" cried Anne. "Ned had as lief I would prink as not. But won't you stay?" And she laid her little delicately-gloved hand on his arm. Ned detained the hand, as he had a right to do, while declining.

"Mr. Carston," said Sophy, pointing at the other pair, "isn't that aggravating to a forlorn young woman of twenty, to see her younger sister, whom she has been accustomed to snub, actually taking precedence? What can one do?"

"Go and do likewise," said Charlie, laughing at her comic distress.

"But the Lothario?"

"At your service?" he asked, gayly, extending his hand and raising his brows.

"Now, remember you have committed yourself!" she cried.

"Sophy! Sophy!" said Anne, "Mr. Carston won't know what to make of you."

"If Mr. Carston don't know," replied Sophy, with sudden gravity, "it is of no consequence whether he does or not."

At this Mr. Carston bowed.

"You see how it is, Mr. Carston," continued she. "She is already on the guard lest I—"

"Sophy!" cried her mother, from behind the lattice, seeing only Ned, "ask Edward in; and remember your lemon creams have got to be made for tea."

"Won't you come in?" asked Sophy then, with a little pout of her red lip, and not looking at either of them. "'Lemon cream' means that I'm spoiling my complexion out here in the sun. As for Anne, that's no matter, because her market's made!" and in another moment she had vanished. Miss Anne went in with a slower air, and the gentlemen, descending the stone steps, pursued their way.

In the evening Ned returned to walk out with his affianced, and secure a station that commanded a view of the entertainment; and of course Charlie accompanied him, and took charge of Miss Sophia. They found the same party from which they had separated in the afternoon, and very shortly were as merry as ever, with Sophy's reckless quips ringing over all. When the band suddenly crashed upon the gay crowd with one harmonious peal that wound up in music through the stars and darkness, a little hush fell upon Sophy's gayety, and Charlie saw, by the light of the lanterns below, where they were preparing the balloons, her eyes flashing and cheeks flushing in answer to the inspiring strain. The tune ceasing, she was scarcely so lively as before, and seemed to be singing it over in her thought, when all at once it burst out again, and a tiny flake of light, like a burning soap-bubble, went soaring up the air and sailing before the wind. As if burning? But it was. Some mismanagement had directed things, and in an instant the little wonder fell in flames, dropping and scattering its fiery fragments among the crowd. Charlie saw one coming; he put out his hand to snatch it away, but not before it had touched Sophy, and her thin muslins had caught and flashed up beneath it. He carried a thick shawl on his arm, which Mrs. Burleigh had given them lest the grass should be damp; and as every one else instantly drew away, and she threw herself on the ground, he tore it open, threw it about her, and crushed out the fire before it had time to commit real injury. None of the party wishing any more entertainment of that kind, they at once turned about for home, Charlie more than partly carrying Sophy, who was faint from excitement and from her recent effort at self-command. Of course there was nothing to do at the door but to enter; and then, while Sophy went to change the remnant of her dress, he detailed the adventure to Mrs. Burleigh, Ned and Anne heightening it till she might have believed that he had saved every damsel in town from utter conflagration.

"But your own hands must be burned," said Sophy, stealing in and standing behind him, with a totally different manner—one subdued and half-timid—for, just as her former appearance of unreserve and boldness had been a safeguard, so now she had put that off, and there was something charmingly confidential in her tone.

"Oh no," said he; "at least, not to signify."

She had already taken it; then, leaving him, had run for sweet-oil and bandages, and, returned, was dressing the member as nobody else but Florence Nightingale could have dreamed of doing. That completed, she dropped upon it a delicate perfume, and contemplated her performance.

"Does it ache badly?" she asked.

"Such a privilege is well worth the little pain," he replied, gallantly. "I shall burn my hand often, Miss Sophy, if you will promise to be always so kind."

"Well," said Sophy.

"Why, wife," said Mr. Burleigh, entering, "not out? And none of you young folk either? You don't know what you've lost. We've had a fine balloon—two or three of them—and a scene! You'd have enjoyed that, Sophy. A young woman was badly injured, I am afraid."

"We've had a private fire-balloon," said Sophy, "and the young woman has recovered from her injuries, thank you. But the young woman's frock, papa!—that lovely organdie!"

At this Mr. Burleigh's amazement, consternation, and confusion reached such a height that he sank into a chair, and it was only after repeated trials that he could compress the identity of the young woman and of Sophy into one.

"It is remarkable!" he said, "and providential, and—and—I beg your pardon, my love, you did not tell me the name of Mr.—Mr.—"

"Carston, Sir," said Charlie. "My father is John Carston, and I begin to have a suspicion that you are—"

"That scoundrel Burleigh! Exactly. And so you're my old friend's son? Perhaps you have wiped out for me all his old scores, Sir. I feel sure that, having conferred such an obligation upon us as you have done to-night, your father will not refuse to increase it by abandoning all ill-will."

Charlie said nothing for a moment; for he would as soon have thought of battling Mount Caucasus as his father's silent, but, he felt sure, implacable animosity. "At all events, Sir," said he then, "I am not to be counted as one with my father in every thing. You will not refuse me the pleasure that I see opening before me in your acquaintance."

"I should regret Mr. Carston's displeasure," said the other, "but you can judge thereof better than I. For yourself, young man, you are welcome, always most welcome, to my house and to all who are in it." And the grateful father held Sophy on his knee, and wiped his spectacles as if he made his daily bread by polishing lenses.

The evening thus opened passed off most memorably. Sophy tried to sing; but her voice trembled and abandoned her, and she came and sat down by Charlie on the little sofa. Anne and Ned were uproarious with fun. Mr. Burleigh proposed egg-nog; but the two servants were out, and nobody knew how to make it but Sophy, and Sophy doubted if she could break an egg with her shaking fingers; and then, ceremony being discarded, they all withdrew to the dining-room, Mr. Ephraim Smith joining them, and after much whisking and beating and stirring of eggs, sugar, and old Otard, they all drank to Charlie, and Charlie drank to them, bade them good-night, found his horse, mounted, and rode home with his head in a strange state, which he found it impossible to analyze, and he could not declare whether it were the egg-nog, or the gas-light, or the fire, or what. We incline to the opinion that it was "what;" for above and across and all round there came, with spasmodic frequency, twinges of the most decided jealousy of Mr. Ephraim Smith.

"A pretty time o' night you come home on, Master Charles!" exclaimed Mrs. Heads at the breakfast-table next morning. Charlie not replying, the attack was renewed. "Yes, a pretty time o' night to come gallopin' inter the back-yard enough to wake the dead, and me just dozing off! And it's a sin and a shame, that it is! for any young man to be out carousing the streets to that hour, when decent folks is abed and asleep, and keepin' his elders and betters a setting up for him. A pretty time o' night!"

"I choose my own time, Mrs. Heads."

"Yes, I dare say you choose your own time! It never was so before you come. A waking up your poor father that 'd never had a wink o' sleep a wondering about you, and it striking eleven! Instead o' bein' a blessin' to his old age! I don't know what you think of it; I declare it's disgraceful, and the Lord alone knows what you'll come to! For my part, I'd as lief live I don't know where as only to git six hours' sleep out of the twenty-four!"

Charlie wished she did live in that locality, but kept a discreet silence.

"Well, did you get your sheep?" she asked at length, after the maid brought in the breakfast-tray.

"Yes, ma'am," said Charlie.

"The whole hundred?"

"Every one of them."

"I s'pose you mind what I said?"

"You say too much, Mrs. Heads, for me to remember it all."

"I dare say. Some folkses heads never could, any way, hold more'n one idee, and that rattled. I said I'd poison them!"

"I should advise you to try it."

Mrs. Heads stared at so unheard-of a catastrophe as this challenge.

"I can't wait for my father," continued Charlie; "I must go to the timbers, and will thank you for my breakfast at once."

"Indeed! It's never ben the custom in this house to sit down to table without the master, and it ain't a goin' to be begun now for the first time!"

Charlie flashed his eye at her, and replied, in his unruffled voice, "You will take your seat, Mrs. Heads, with no more words."

This open defiance smote her unawares. She was not prepared for it, hesitated a second, and then tossed back her cap-ribbons and proceeded to pour out coffee. But in her heart she vowed revenge, and made an installment of it from the hot-water jug.

Charlie touched the bell.

"Is there no coffee, Jane?" said he.

"Yes, Sir, there be—a plenty," replied Jane.

"Another pot, then, and don't spare it," he added, while Mrs. Heads, with one hand on the water-jug and her head half turned to contemplate Jane, gazed as Bomba might have done at tidings of insurrection; for here was Charles Carston actually giving orders in her house, and Jane obeying them. But relief! Here, too, was Mr. Carston. Charles never showed his father disrespect. Now she'd see!

The brown stream went pouring undiluted upon the cream in Mr. Carston's cup, and made the room redolent.

"Is your coffee the right strength, Sir?" asked Mrs. Heads, with unusual meekness.

"Very nice coffee, Mrs. Heads, nicer than usual."

"I am glad to hear you say so, Sir, I'm sure; for here's Mr. Charles says he won't drink slops."

"Keep truth on your side, Mrs. Heads," said Charlie.

"And has taken Jane from her scourin' to make him a fresh pot, when it's very pertickler that she should hurry, for we was put off in our wash, and—"

"You couldn't have complained of this coffee, Charlie?" said his father.

"No, Sir, not at all," said Charlie, turning over the leaves of the "Law Reporter" as it lay beside him on the table.

"I'm sure! Well, if ever! I do believe he's lost his wits. Didn't complain of this coffee?" and Mrs. Heads's perturbation preventing further utterance, she applied her napkin to her eyes.

"Why, Charles," said his father, "what can you have done?"

"Faugh!" exclaimed Charlie, giving a brief glance at the sobbing heroine of the urn.

"I'm sure as I've lived in this house fifteen year come Thanksgiving, and done my duty well, and been a mother to him, and more, and made of him as ef he was my own, and now to be spurned like a worm and trod on and hev my best feelins thrown back in my teeth as ef they warn't no account—;" and Mrs. Heads shook her cap-strings violently to avoid spotting them, and dredged her steak with a sprinkle of tears.

"Charles, really, I think you should explain or apologize," said Mr. Carston, in his severest form of reproof.

"Yes, Mr. Carston, you never've let me be put upon, so fur as you could help it; neither did Mr. Heads," said the weeping widow. "He always said, 'Tilda, dear, don't you be put upon,' and I won't! Your father don't approve of your conduct at all, Master Charles, 's you can see—what'll you have, Sir? Is it the sugar? Oh, is your cup out?—and no more does he like your rampaging the streets and spending your evenings nobody knows where at all, as you did last night, and keeping respectable people out of their beds till nigh upon cock-crowing."

"Where were you, my son?" asked Mr. Carston, alarmed at this statement.

"I was in town, Sir; you know they had quite a gala night with illuminations and music."

"Indeed. I hadn't heard of it."

"And not much of it did you see, Mr. Charles. That I can tell you, Sir" (turning to Mr. Carston); "for Sam Stover was in the town too, and saw your whole proceedings."

"I spent the evening with Ned Haughton, Sir, at the house of one of his friends, whose second daughter he intends to marry."

"Ah? It must be a fine family if Ned chooses there."

"You'd better tell the name," said Mrs. Heads, with a beaming face.

"Pray, Mrs. Heads, allow me—"

"Ah, here comes Jane," said Charlie. "Thank you, Jane. This 'll do nicely."

"I'll give you your bitters, Miss," muttered Mrs. Heads; "not another night shall you sleep under this roof."

"You'll do nothing of the kind, Mrs. Heads," said Charlie. "Jane is a good girl, and shall continue here so long as she remains so."

"Do you hear that, Sir?" cried Mrs. Heads. "A setting up of my help against my very face!"

"Mrs. Heads is mistress of the servants, Charlie," said his father, in perplexity. "I desire that you will not interfere further. I request it of you."

"Well, father, I shall not interfere. Only it is, I think, a peculiar state of affairs that allows the dismissal of a valuable domestic because she has obliged your son. However, the thing can proceed. I shall have no more altercation with your servants. Don't be alarmed, Jane, I will secure you a situation," for he remembered hearing Mrs. Burleigh's wish for a good cook, since she was about losing her own.

Jane dropped him a courtesy, and with the broadest of countenances went out.

"Servants!" cried Mrs. Heads, who had been smiling in triumph over the refractory son, but at utterance of the obnoxious word had become petrified in unqualified amazement. "And hev I lived till this? To be called names at by my own employer's son! Me that has been a mother to him, and always put spermacetti in the starch. Goodness lud alive! what's that?" as a crash of crockery resounded from within. "The hussy's broke my caudle-cup I dare be bound!" and as her cap-strings whisked through the door, Mrs. Heads's voice was heard in the pantry, pealing like a reveille to wake the dead indeed.

Charlie rode over to the timbers, and that done, returned home, made a different toilet, and rode into town again and straight to Mrs. Burleigh's. He found that lady and her daughters at home, and deep in sewing, for Miss Sophy thought of spending the winter at the West, and the quantity of snowy drapery incidental to the outfit was enough to swathe the mummies of a dozen first-class Egyptian princesses.

Charlie apologized for his intrusion, and at once requested Mrs. Burleigh to receive Jane into her kitchen till he should be able to take her again, and this involving a little explanation, out came the whole story of Mrs. Heads; and her wrongs and grievances were placed before them till the pleasant room rung with peals of laughter.

"It's all very well to laugh," said Charlie, with mock vexation, "but it's not so pleasant to endure. You would find it agreeable to be able to lay down a letter and take it up unread, a book with the place marked by your pencil-case and return not to find the one hidden and the other minus, a garment and be sure it would not be given to the next beggar. And the worst of it all is, that my father's too good to see how bad she is, and there's no redress in heaven or earth or 'all that's in the miz.'"

Mrs. Burleigh's heart was open in a trice, she gave him permission to send Jane in immediately, and she begged him to come himself as often as he could, for he should be entirely at home, and the girls should regard him as they would a brother. All this was very pleasant, and bore ample testimony to Charlie's power not only of making friends but of keeping them.

Nor did Jane's entrance into the Burleigh household do him any injury; for if Jane had one weakness developed more largely than another, it was the adoration of the young master; and never was she weary of holding forth in his praise, and I am not certain that Sophy declined more than once to put a leading question, as she herself crimped her ruffles or made puddings. In return, whenever Jane met Charlie she assured him anew of her satisfaction with her situation, and that such nice young ladies were never seen before or since the flood.

The autumn had nearly passed, and Master Charlie had not neglected his opportunities, but had allowed the light of his countenance to irradiate the Burleigh parlor as often as thrice a week and had thrown in the Sundays. Somehow, Sophy's visit to the West was delayed, she thought she would rather spend the spring there. Mrs. Heads was not always able to keep a guard over Charlie, and his father was not yet aware of his new friendships. Meanwhile, the crops had exceeded expectation, and Charlie's year was pronounced on all hands to be a great success. Never for a moment had Mrs. Heads relinquished her hostility, for she saw no sign of defeat or discomfiture in the enemy's quarters. There was no persecution in her plentiful arsenal which did not fall on Charlie, and in her determination that it should reach the son she was not always sure to spare the father. It became a more devout maxim of Charlie's than ever that tyrannicide was no murder.

It was one afternoon, near the middle of October, that Charlie galloped up the avenue and threw the reins to the waiting Sam Stover. Mrs. Heads, scolding Lindy because the churning had been made so late, and because the butter had not come, was resonantly vociferous, and to avoid her he went into the room, which had always been used as Mr. Carston's office.

"Well, father," said he, taking off his gloves,

"I've seen the carpenters; they say a week's work is all the little building will require now before it would be fit for the abode of a chief-justice. I declare, I shall rejoice when I see the office-sign put up at the foot of the avenue rather than here. It has always been a pet whim of mine, turning this room into a library, and I'm glad you proposed it. By-the-way, the house at the pasture-lands has been empty a year, and all my advertising brings no tenant. It's a shame, for a little outlay would make the house quite a pretty affair."

"Ah!"—Mr. Carston began slowly, but was interrupted before he had extended his remark by Mrs. Heads.

"If I may make so bold, Sir, as to enter the office without knocking," said the humble creature, "I should like the money to pay off Lindy. I've given her warning. The time that girl is a fetchin' the butter, and the imperence she gives me, is too much for human flesh, and the sooner she's off the better."

"How much, Mrs. Heads?"

"Well, Sir, I ain't paid her fur about six months."

"Why not?" asked Charlie.

"I don't know what that is to you, Master Charles. Me an' your father's compertunt to manage our own bizness. I ain't paid her because there's no doin' any thing with her when she's got money in her pocket, and I thought best to keep it a hangin' over her head, that I'd pay her in a lump, and be quit of her."

Now Lindy had been Charlie's chief bulwark against Mrs. Heads's growing encroachments and hatreds, and to lose her was to lose his castle.

"Well, Mrs. Heads," said Mr. Carston. "How much?"

"Lemme see, Sir. Twice twelve is twenty-two—no, bless me, I might a known how many two dozen is with all them eggs lost by her letting the crottle-crowns lay away. Twenty-four; and twice twenty-four is—" and after a vigorous counting on her fingers Mrs. Heads announced the sum of fifty dollars to be due to Lindy. "And it's a living shame she should carry away so much to onceast, when her betters ain't got the tithe of it!"

Mr. Carston opened his pocket-book and turned it over. "I haven't quite the sum left," he said. "I have just paid off the masons about the new office. I could give her a check, but I suppose she would rather see the Wiltingshell bills. Charlie, what have you?"

"Quite enough to pay Lindy, Sir; but I will make her the gift of it rather than lose her."

"I dare say," muttered Mrs. Heads.

"She has proved invaluable to me, Sir, in the dairy, and trained the new maid well."

"I don't care what she's done, going she is; and I'd have you to know, Master Charles, once for all, that I'm mistress in this house or else I'll leave it, and take my turn on the town with them that's been brought up to expect less."

"Pray, Charlie, don't vex Mrs. Heads."

"I've no idea of such a thing. But there is no reason why I should lose all authority in your house, nor why a second maid should be dismissed, whose sole fault is a regard for my wishes."

"I never had no trouble with my maids, to speak of, till Master Charles came home; and now, what with his overseeing, and interfering, and gallivanting—though I've taken pains to get 'em as old and as ill-favored as I could—I can't keep one in the house."

"Mrs. Heads!" cried Charlie, with a flashing eye, "alter the tone of your statements, or leave the room!"

Mrs. Heads trembled for a moment. "Well, Sir!" said she then to Mr. Carston.

Mr. Carston turned to his son, with a little indecision.

"I will go and pay the servant myself, Sir," said Charlie, "but I will not dismiss her; and I will suffer the dismissal of no one, in future, without being myself aware of and approving the circumstances."

Mr. Carston, for once, knew that his son was right, and acquiesced as Charlie left the room. When the latter returned, Mrs. Heads had taken a seat, and holding the corner of her apron ready for tears, was haranguing an imaginary auditory in a lively manner.

"Fifteen year—yes, fifteen year—I've lived in this 'ere house, an' never hed no pertickler cause o' complaint till that boy come home; and he's done nothin' but put upon me, and put upon me ever sence. The wash is dretful now, let alone the i'ning; and the mendin' all falls on me; an' he's about gone mad on hens, and they all lay away, and eat up my marigold-seeds, an' the chickens die in heaps; and there'll be all the wool in the spring, an' nobody knows how menny lambs that the ewes won't tech 'll be brought in round the kitchen-fire."

And at this deplorable spectacle Mrs. Heads's speech was fairly drowned in tears; but she revived as the necessity of further remark presented itself to memory.

"Yes; the extry work he's brought about is out of conscience. It seems as ef every thin' perspired to make me trouble. I'm never safe as to when comperny's comin'; he's bringin' some of his fellers out from town all cherryin' and berryin' season, and soilin' and spottin' all my best table-coverin's; and there's all the dairy-work to boot. And he's taken to spadn' up the orchard, so that I've got to do my bleachin' on a fence; an' never can hev Sam Stover one minute at the dasher; and I never git no thanks for all my pains at that, let it be never so much. And now's come this. I won't let one of the girls go down that lane to touch a thing in your new office, Square Carston, ef the dust gets kneedeep—that I won't!—and pretty you'll look potterin' roun' 'ith a broom in your hand! This room turned into a libry, heh? and all the big new book-cases to oil and dust, and tables, and chairs, and desks, and goodness knows what not. I won't stand it; it's a little too bad, I vum!"

And here Mrs. Heads threatened to collapse again in tears; tears, not at any prospect of work—she knew how to avoid that—but tears at her previous defeat; tears at Charlie's unwonted triumph. But she was happily diverted.

"You needn't stan' there a grinnin', Charles Carston," she recommenced, "like Bill Bar-ridge's monkey! Maybe ef your father knowed all your fine goings-on you'd laugh the other side your mouth. You'd better tell him how often you go to Burleigh's, an' what fine things you hear said about your father there!"

Mr. Carston, who had, one must confess, a difficult course to steer, and who generally endeavored to take no notice of Mrs. Heads's insinuations, was thrown entirely off his guard.

"Burleigh!" he exclaimed.

"Yes, Sir, Thomas Burleigh's. And that's where he's been every week this summer; and it's a blessed wonder that he hesn't finished insulting his father by bringin' 'em here under his very-nose."

"Charles, is this true?"

"Quite true, Sir. I made the acquaintance of the Burleighs last June, and they are my very good friends."

"You will be so kind as to regard my wishes more carefully in future. You will not enter Mr. Burleigh's house again."

Charles was silent, while Mrs. Heads nodded in an unbounded flush of victory.

"Do you hear, my son? I am awaiting your promise."

"It is not an easy promise to give, Sir. However, I will promise thus far, that if I find my absence occasions no trouble I will make it perpetual."

"You have honor, I believe," said his father, more coldly than he had ever spoken to him before; "I can trust you."

"You have no right, Sir, to demand such a sacrifice of me, and as I make it, I make it voluntarily."

"I should prefer that you would make it unconditionally."

"Very well, Sir. I promise, then, that I will not visit at Mr. Burleigh's without previously acquainting you with my intention."

Hereupon Charlie took down a volume of Reports, probably to see if there could be any equal to his own hard case, and Mrs. Heads, triumphant and smiling, withdrew.

Charlie went supperless to sleep that night, because his supper was prepared in a style that bade defiance to his gastronomical powers; and he might have gone breakfastless to work on the next morning, but that Lindy's good graces contrived to elude their august tormentor, and placed a smoking omelet beside his plate before she could be forbidden. His father asked him no questions concerning the Burleighs, on account of Mrs. Heads's presence perhaps, and he took away any opportunity afterward, by riding off to arrange about taking out stumpage for the township which his father owned in Vermont, and to procure, if possible, a tenant for the pasturelands. "A good son, a good son," thought Mr. Carston to himself as his son's lithe figure went swinging away under the arching boughs of the avenue; "I'll drive into Wiltingshell and inquire about his doings a little. And a lonely life he leads, few enjoyments, no home, no companions; I wonder if I have done wrong—" But war, as an arbiter between States, involves surely the same error as ancient trial by battle; and Mr. Carston's thoughts were already far away and deep in his great work, which by no means drew near completion.

Meanwhile affairs did not progress in the smoothest manner at the Burleighs.

"You will have to abandon the purple silk, Sophy," said her mother, as they were all sewing busily again on Sophy's long-abandoned outfit; for her father had declared that as Sophy had lost her spirits she must previously have lost her health, and must accordingly hasten to the West and get well.

"Why, mother!" said Anne.

"Never mind," replied Sophy; "I shall do very well with what I have already. Indeed, I have too much. I don't care."

"I wish you did care," said Anne. "I hate to see you so torpid and indifferent."

"Your father is sorry, I'm sure," said the mother; "but he is very much straitened. He has spoken about moving to a smaller house, and has asked me to dismiss the girls. But Jane says she won't go."

"It's very odd," said Sophy. "I saw something was the matter with father. Mother, I don't want to go out West. Let us put all this sewing away."

"Sophy!" cried her father from below: and she went down to encounter a great basket of ruddy peaches sent with Charlie Carston's compliments; for Charlie had selected the most luscious and rare, and told his father of their intended destination.

"If Charlie Carston came here as he used, Sophy's spirits would be just what they always were," said Anne to her mother in Sophy's absence. "I wonder why he left so abruptly. Ned says he hardly ever sees him now."

"One of their servants told Jane that his father forbade him to come here. I am very glad he is so dutiful; but I miss him myself almost as much as Sophy can."

"I suppose it was regard for Mr. Carston that prevented his ever telling Sophy he liked her, for I know he does as well as I want to. He never means to say a word to her without his father's approbation. Spooney! If I were Sophy I wouldn't care. I always hated Oswald, and despised Corinne for loving him."

At this point Sophy returned, bringing up the basket with Jane's help, and filling that damsel's apron for reward with things the like of whose rosy cheeks she declared she hadn't seen "sence she lived onter the dear old place with the blessed boy himself yonder."

"I presume these peaches have an extra sun-beam in them, Sophy," said her mother, with a faint smile. "It is well we have some friends left."

"I'm sure we've friends enough, mother," said Anne.

"My dear, I do not know how long they will remain so; and if I don't know that, I oughtn't to call them friends."

"Mother," said Sophy, "is father in difficulty?"

"He has failed," said her mother, looking out of the window; "and Heaven only knows where he will find a roof to cover his head when it's all over;" and the tears fell so fast on her needle that they shook off in a spray from its shining head.

"Your needle's crying, mother," said Sophy; "and I suppose that's what they have eyes for." She came and put her arms about her mother's neck. "Never mind, little mother," said she; "we're all well, and that's one thing: we all love each other, and that's four things, if not twelve; because there's four of us, and we've each got three things to love. Anne can be married all the sooner, and I'll get a school immediately in Illinois—I guess I can—and send home enough to pay the rent of a nice little house for you and father; and Jane can live with you yet, and I'll come back in the vacations, and Anne will live almost next door, and I don't see but we'll be as happy as ever."

"Bless you, Sophy! You're no Job's comforter," said her mother. "But there, I must go to your father. He wants to know what day will be best for the sheriff to come on the inventory. Your piano will have to go, girls."

"Well, we can hire a hand-organ," said Sophy.

"How can you be so cheerful, Sophy?" asked Anne, after their mother's departure.

"Why, you wouldn't have me cry and make her feel all the worse, would you?" said Sophy. "She feels for us more than she does for herself; and if we are cheery, she will be so too, by-and-by. Oh dear!" and she sung a few bars of "There'll never be peace till Jamie comes home."

"Say Charlie for Jamie," said Anne, lightly.

"There'll never be peace till the weather changes!" exclaimed Sophy, quickly and vehemently, rising and throwing up the window and leaning out. "So I've got to go out and die of the chills, have I? And bid farewell to the dear old street and all the rows of stone steps, and all the little image-boys, and, and—" And here Sophy unconsciously burst into a triumphant "Who'll be king but Charlie?"

On the afternoon of this day Charlie said to his father, in Mrs. Heads's absence, "I am going to call on Mr. Burleigh to-day. He has failed—I believe that's what they call it—after his long and prosperous career, through the rascality of others. He has, however, paid every thing, and left himself destitute. Though I can not befriend, I will not desert him."

"Charlie," said his father, at tea-time, "the pasture-lands seem no very profitable affair to me. I have deeded it to you, and registered the paper in Wiltingshell; I went there this afternoon myself."

"Indeed, father. You are very kind; but, but is it true?"

"Entirely so," said his father. "The pasture-lands are yours."

"To do as I please with?"

"Just as you please with."

"My dear father," said Charlie, going and putting both hands on Mr. Carston's shoulders, "I never can thank you enough. You are the kindest and best of fathers. And of course you know what I mean to do with them."

His father endeavored to look innocent ignorance, but failed signally.

"Well, if ever!" ejaculated Mrs. Heads, in a preliminary manner, after wiping her mouth; but Charlie cut short her intended exposition by rushing from the room, mounting Lucifer, who still stood saddled at the door, and dashing away.

The Burleighs had just left their melancholy and almost untouched tea-table when the ringing hoofs of Lucifer suddenly ceased their galloping, close at hand, and Jane, appearing with a bright face, said Mr. Burleigh was wanted. After a brief conversation with his guest, that gentleman re-entered and requested his wife's presence. Shortly afterward the two returned with Mr. Charlie Carston, and, almost immediately upon their greeting, Ned Haughton followed, who, while shaking Charlie's hand, and declaring that he had not seen him for a century, at the same time broached his errand. There was to be a party down river in boats by moonlight, with music, the very last of the season—had just that moment thought of it—the night was so unusually warm at this time of the year that it must be improved. The girls should go, and Charlie too, now he was here. Of course bonnets and shawls were in immediate requisition, and, without waiting to hear the recent subject of their wonder explained, they departed, and of course Sophy fell to the lot of Charlie Carston.

One of the pleasant things of life is sailing down a moonlit harbor, the half-guessed banks retreating and widening and flattening, the tide swelling with great shining breadths, the dark mysterious shipping lining the wharves, and the forest of masts flickering in silver points of light, the crests of foam breaking at the very mouth, and the salt fresh air cool and rich and freighted with all imaginings; behind one the pursuing music stealing in broken strains, and before one the prospect of dancing and supper. As they skimmed away, they four, with the other boats alongside, Anne and Sophy remembered that they should come home when the moon was down, and then they would have quiet enough; and with the elasticity of youth they abandoned themselves to all gayety and recklessness, while their jests and laughs flew like sea-gulls from boat to boat. At length their keels grated on the sand, and stepping out, they wound their way up to the house or along the beach as fancy pleased.

Charlie did not find the entertainment so full of pleasure as had been promised: for one thing he was a little too fastidious to chime with the occasion; for another, his mind was continually debating between two points, of which the first, his allegiance to his father, grew momentarily weaker. As to Sophy, she had too often joined such affairs not to know how to make the best of them; besides, she was going away, and she might never join another, and Charlie was here, and she would not be unthankful, but take the goods the gods provided, and remain content with the present, fleeting though it was. They indulged themselves on these occasions in a great many harmless little freaks, and when Charlie had left the long room of the revel, and was strolling alone along the beach, he was not surprised to see Sophy and a half dozen others come dancing out, and in the low moonlight wind gayly along the edge of the surf. She had tricked herself as the others had done in all manner of seaweeds and tangles and shells; but she tore them off now, and went lightly along with one of the pine-knot torches in her hand, peering down the gulfs among the rocks, singing as she went, and throwing up great sparkles and bright gleams upon her companions. They seemed, with their fantastic adornments, their pranks and joyousness, like a party of sirens or sweet sea-creatures escaped from the depths to the sands for some midnight round of sport. All at once she quenched the torch in a wave, dropped it, came toward Charlie, and hanging on his arm strolled forward.

"Where now?" asked Anne.

"Out on the rocks," Sophy said.

"Why, the tide is coming in—it's not safe. We shall have seen the last of you, Mr. Charlie; and are you going to take Sophy too?"

"Oh, he thinks it is pleasanter to drown in company," said Ned, adding himself to the group.

"What do you say, Sophy?" asked Charlie.

"I don't object to the company," said Sophy. "Besides, it is evident that you entice me to the rocks, and if I drown I can throw the blame on you."

"Very well, then; nobody else need object:" and they proceeded.

Pacing along the beach in silence, they stepped out at last on the long projecting ledge that had made the wreck of many a ship within sight of home, and when reaching its last point sat down to rest among the huge crevices.

"I shouldn't wonder if Anne were right," exclaimed Sophy, at length breaking the hush that had been undisturbed by any thing except the solemn beat and dash of the waves. "The tide is coming in. If it should cut off our return! For it can!"

"I have never been here before," said Charlie. "Can there be any real danger?"

"Yes, I believe there might be, a little later; I don't believe there is yet. Are you afraid?"

Charlie laughed. "I should be sorry to occasion you trouble. For myself—"

"You don't care for the biggest billow that could break over Eddystone Light-house?" And she laughed back, but at the same time stood up to see if by any chance the water had poured in over the lower portion of the ledge between them and shore. He saw her standing in the last red beam of the moon as it sank below the horizon: then there was left the sacred dark and the boom of the tide, and her figure dimly shaped and motionless as the rock.

"Charlie!" she cried at last, in a hoarse voice, bounding forward and catching his arm. "It has come in! the gully is full, the great hollow brimming! it is rising; we are cut off from land. O God! we are lost!" And as she spoke the spray of a great wave that angrily lashed the ledge fell heavy in her hair.

He stepped forward, and searched the dark eagerly.

"That can not be," he said, lightly; but in another moment he felt the water round his feet. He turned instantly without a word and stretched his arms toward her. She sprang into them, he folded them about her, and leaped to the highest jag of the rock.

"Well," he said, after a moment, "if this is death, it is not so bitter as I thought it would be. You fear, love?"

"I can not fear now," she whispered, with her face beside his own.

"If I have ever thought of dying," he continued, as one might talk in a dream, "it has been as an old man, worn out, heaped with pain. I could not have dreamed of the bliss of dying, young and strong, with your arms about me, your breath upon me, your soul flowing into eternity one with mine, as no other souls have ever joined."

She was silent, and clung to him. There was only the loud, heavy beat of wave on wave, the thunder of the surf, the wild, desolate, despairing music of the sea. He turned her face up to his in the darkness that seemed only deepened by the starlight, bent and pressed his lips to hers in one long kiss that might have taken their last breath in its fervor.

"It is as if we were both dead!" he thought.

Suddenly there went up a blue light from the distant sand, and in the great glare they could see the anxious party, half in boats, half on shore, and all bent eagerly toward the ledge where the two figures stood, strong and alone, like etchings on the thus illumined sky. No sound could be heard in the wide cry of the waves; only as another light flashed up a boat was seen darting forward and leaping like a living thing with daring skill among the breakers, in its course toward them. They waited with their lives in their hands. The world was possible to them again; all this joy it might yet be theirs to drain. They were so young—they loved—if it should be that they yet lived—

"Yare!" cried Ned Haughton, close beneath them, as a third flame soared through the shrinking sky, and in a second Charlie had dropped her into his arms. She waited with her eyes fixed above; another figure as suddenly stood beside her, the incoming wave dashed them up against the great rock, but they lightened the blow with their protecting oars, and, retreating, it bore them out, tossed for a minute, and then bounding over on another as it leaped through the cavernous ledge, they were safe. A few moments of rowing in grateful silence, and then the stir and the faces of the beach.

"A model way of committing suicide!" said Ned Haughton, cheerily then, as again they made the long, smooth moving with pushing prow "and quenched its speed in the slushy sand." "I should recommend it to the Parisians next November. Sorry to have frustrated you; but though the Indian takes his horse with him to Paradise, unless you are a Mahomedan you can't take your houri."

The whole party thereon went in to supper.

But to Sophy it was all a dream. Her recent gayety was lost; though she sat smiling, she did not seem to hear the jokes and laughter; she trifled with her viands, but ate nothing; her eye perpetually followed Charlie, where, flushed and brilliant and blithe, he sat opposite, and under a running fire of raillery drew the attention from her—a dangerous light sparkling in his eye, and his restless lips sending off a shower of bon-mots. Nor was it any different as they floated slowly home with the tide—for the wind had fallen—as she sat half-reclining in the boat, with the shadowy form beside her, and the arm around her; she wondered if it were not some dreadful nightmare, into which had broken this gleam of a life stranger, richer, more delicious than her own. It was so far from her actual that she wondered if at that time she had not really died with him and been transported to this once visionary and ideal world. She wondered, too, if it would all end here; if she should ever see him again; how she should dare meet him by daylight, till they stepped from the boat, and he went in with her at her father's door.

Mrs. Burleigh had sat up for the girls, and had been talking over their affairs with her husband. For he had at once accepted Charlie's proposition to occupy the pasture-lands—an excellent dairy farm—in the spring; meanwhile the settlement of his business would keep him in town till that time; and if he or his wife had ever held one wish more strongly than another, it had been to leave the perplexities of trade for such a life as this offered them. This subject was continued with animation as the four younger people returned; and while Anne and Sophy listened with wondering faces—amazement heaping itself on amazement for the latter—Charlie recounted the advantages of the place, the income it should afford, and the pains that should be taken in the repairs which were to be made during the winter.

"Because, you know," he said, "when Sophy and I come to visit you every week, we shall want to come to the most delightful home in the world."

The whole family stood aghast, and Sophy hid her head in confusion (and a sofa-cushion).

"I thought there never was so much smoke without some fire!" cried Ned, seizing Charlie's hand. "Well, Mr. Burleigh, what have you to say to this novel proposition for a son-in-law that would be? And as for Sophy, it seems to have taken her as much by surprise as any one else?"

"I shall ask you, Madam, to give me your daughter," said Charlie, taking Mrs. Burleigh's hand; "and to spare her soon enough for me to be sincere in my Thanksgiving."

At this, of course, there was a great deal of consultation and conversation, and Mrs. Burleigh finally mentioned the time when they should go to their new home. But at Charlie's evident indignation at such delay, Anne whispered a sentence to her mother, and her mother shaking her head thereat, nothing would do but the whisper must be repeated aloud, when it appeared that Anne thought Sophy's Western outfit would do nicely for a wedding trousseau. The others—that is, Mr. Burleigh, Ned, and Charlie—had no doubt that it would do nicely. And when Charlie again mounted Lucifer for home a little form, strangely and enchantingly timid, and somewhat changed from its old jesting, followed him to the door, came out, and mounted his boot-toe for a parting kiss. Now Thanksgiving was that day fortnight.

That night had been the last of the Indian summer; cold, raw winds set in at once, winter gave his warning, and snow fell. It made now no difference to Charlie what course soever Mrs. Heads chose to pursue; he walked with his head in the clouds and his feet on the earth, and had the strangest amount of business to attend to in town that had ever fallen to his share. The office at the foot of the avenue was at once finished; the library arranged in sumptuous style; new carpets, and upholstery, and pictures were incessantly dumped down in the front entry; strange women, whom Mrs. Heads had never once seen, came and went, and had things all their own way; and while the usual commotion of the season went on in kitchen and pantry, the house became, in her expressive phrase, as fine as a fiddle.

One day Mrs. Heads sat down to the breakfast-table, which wore a more ample array than usual; for on Thanksgiving morning it was out of her power to starve her master's son, or add greatly to his discomfort. She looked out of the windows as she spread her merinos about her, and gave a gratified nod at the sheep-fields.

Mr. Carston had already taken his second cup of coffee, and Mrs. Heads had forthwith diluted the remainder, when Charlie entered, with cheeks rosy from the frost, but not with the most smiling of countenances.

"You are not very prudent, Mrs. Heads," said he. "This last outrage is a little too much. It seems that it is not enough to drive me away from home for any comfort that I may desire, but you level your blows to destroy me. I have not lost my memory."

"I should like to know what your memory's got to do with me!" was the rejoinder, with a snapping eye. "If you remembered all I've done for you, first and last, it 'uld take you a considerable time, I reckon!"

"I remember that you threatened to poison the sheep; and when I find a score of them stark and stiff, I put two and two together."

"You may put four and four together for all of me!" cried the lady, with a blazing face. "If you ain't got enough gumption to take car' o' your sheep, and pervent the frost from killing 'em, you needn't be laying murder at innocent folks doors—that you needn't."

"I hope it was the frost," said Charlie, coolly, for nothing could cloud him long to-day; "and as I intend no post-mortem, I give you the benefit of the doubt, Mrs. Heads; especially as your reckoning is yet to come."

"I don't know, Square Carston, with what kind o' face you can set by and let that boy pepper his talk to me. It's what none ever done in decent houses. You've no sort o' authority; and it's no wonder the neighbors says you're a born simpleton. I declare to man I don't believe they're so far gone wrong as—"

"A little more cream, Mrs. Heads, if you please."

"Ef it warn't Thanksgiving, I'd give you a piece o' my mind, Square—"

"As it is, I will take a piece of your pie, Ma'am," said Mr. Carston, with unusual facetiousness. "You make the best chicken-pie I ever tasted."

"It's all the cropple-crowns are good for," replied the dame, thrown off her guard by any compliment, but instantly resuming her weapons.

"Yes, I'd give you a piece o' my mind as to your suffering it—you setting like a mumchance, and that cretur coming in, this morning of all the blessed mornings in the year, and a-accusin' me of killing his sheep, that have eat lambkill or died of cold, for all I know. Imperence!"

And Mrs. Heads's swelling nostril and ardent eye emphasized the force of her remark.

"I'll thank you to pass the roll, Mrs. Heads," said Charlie.

"No, you won't thank me for any thin' o' the kind, for I'll pass you nothin'. Ef you want it, you may reach it. I was born to wait on your betters, I'd have you know. It's ben about as much as I could stan' all the work you've put me to this last for'night. My back's most given out, and my wrists used up so, that I ain't the breath to cool my broth. I don't really s'pose there's a slave on all the plantations harder driv and put to it than I be. Ef I didn't know it was a Christian land where widders are walked over so, I shouldn't believe it ef one was to tell me. It's all grist and no toll here. When poor Mr. Heads was alive, he always said, 'Tilda dear, don't you be put upon—don't you, on no account, ever be put upon.'"

And overcome again by the remembrance, Mrs. Heads shed tears into her coffee. Her cup was very bitter.

"It ain't so much the work," she continued, in an aggrieved and broken tone. "It's the thanklessness and the contrariness. Ef you git Sophy Burleigh to marry you, after all your fussin', I can tell you one thing, young man—she'll make you gee!"

Charlie's laugh infected the household; even his father smiled, and Sam and Lindy were heard from the kitchen in a distant cachinnation.

"There!" cried Mrs. Heads, with a portentous sniff at the sound. "There's that minx you've saddled onter me a gigglin' and sparrin' in the kitchen; and I'll be bound she's let the six-hour pudden stick to the pot! Yes, ef that pudden's a burnin', it's a burnin' shame!"

And Mrs. Heads whisked through the door to scold the pudding whole again.

"Father," said Charlie, taking advantage of the opportunity, "it's not the custom to make Thanksgiving presents, but I am going to bring you one from town to-day; and I hope you'll like it, and value it, and make it welcome, and—and—"

Mr. Carston smiled.

"Father," recommenced Charlie, "I—"

But just at that momentous point of utterance Mrs. Heads returned, and Charlie never finished his speech.

"Yes," resumed Mrs. Heads, taking up the conversation where it had been broken short by her olfactory apparatus; "yes, it's enough to give all your frens a fit o' sickness to see you a makin' up to a girl 'ith nothin' but a black eye to rekermend her. Fur my part, I never regretted that I warn't sech an amazin' pictur', nor that I made my Christian profession young. 'Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised.'"

And the implied object of praise nodded as if there were nothing more to be said.

"Mrs. Heads," said Charlie, about an hour later, looking into the dining-room, where that lady sat with her feet comfortably propped upon the andirons, "a new coat came home for me last week; it was hanging in my wardrobe; have you seen it?"

"Law, Master Charles!" said Mrs. Heads, facing about with her hands on her knees, and with surprising affability, "I hev'n't seen that, as I know; but you told me to give Sam Stover a coat out of your cluset, and I did day before yesterday; and he has wore it. It couldn't a ben that, though, could it?"

Charlie said nothing, but retired. He made no murmur at finding withdrawn a certain ring which had been made to his order and handed to him on the day before, but which he had left on his toilet-table overnight. He knew complaint was of no service; the ring would have been dropped on the floor, of course, and swept out; and when he was unable to find a single hemstitch among his linen, he said nothing again, but quietly substituted one of his father's instead.

As the sleigh dashed up to the steps Mrs.

Heads opened the parlor-door and thrust out her head.

"I want the sleigh, Master Charles," said she.

"So do I, Madam," was the rejoinder; "and I am sorry that to-day I can not relinquish it in your favor."

"But I've got to go into town!"

"My case exactly! And on Thanksgiving Day, you?"

"Yes, on Thanksgiving Day. And what's that to you?"

"Nothing at all," said Charlie, buttoning his glove and opening the door.

"But you're never going off in this style?" cried Mrs. Heads, in amazement. "I told Sam to get the sleigh ready for me an hour ago. You can't!"

Charlie proceeded to arrange the leopard-skins, and Mrs. Heads followed him to the door, ringing a voluble treble.

"I declare for it," she cried, "I never was treated so before nor sence! There you go, Charles Carston, and I wonder how you'll come home; yes, how—you'll—come—home! Riding round the country on the day that's next thing to the blessed Lord's Day itself, and nobody knowing where you'll go, nor what you'll go through with, nor what company you keep till your senses you lose; dressed out as ef 'twas a weddin'; and me, thet wanted to attend divine worship— Yes, I wonder in what state you'll come home! No blessin' follers sech doin's. I wonder how you'll come home!"

And Mrs. Heads re-entered and slammed the door in a state of fierce excitement.

Charlie gathered up the reins and tucked in the robes.

"Sam shall drive you where you please, after dinner, Mrs. Heads," cried he. "Good-morning!" and was gone, with ringing bells and a sharp tramp of hoofs on crusted snow.

The town bells could be faintly heard from the farm at the hour of noon, and as Mr. Carston paused then a moment before his door three sleighs dashed up the drive. From the first leaped Mr. Burleigh, active as youth, and grasping Mr. Carston's hand,

"Well, old friend," said he, "shall we settle our feud and seal a pact?"

Mr. Carston, of too cool a temperament for impulse, hesitated only a moment, then returned the amicable pressure as warmly as if twenty years of hostility could be forgotten in an instant.

"And you will invite me to share your Thanksgiving dinner?" continued Mr. Burleigh. "For me, I have much to be thankful for."

"And I have no less," said Mr. Carston, as with a smile and a father's tenderness he turned to kiss the blushing Sophy, who now stood before him.

The servants had all flocked into the hall, and Mrs. Heads herself opening the dining-room door at the unwonted bustle, joined the astonished group.

"Mrs. Heads," said Charlie, "you can have the sleigh now, and Sam shall drive you wherever you please to go, as I promised. I am happy to give you a year's salary as warning," and he handed her an envelope; "we do not need your services longer. My father has a new housekeeper. You wondered in what state I would return? I have returned in the state of matrimony. How I would come home? I have come home with a wife."

THE NEW ROUTE THROUGH CHIRIQUI.

BY THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.

THERE were jagged rocks, up through the slippery grooves of which, worn by itself, the sea went splashing. Thousands of brown gulls and thousands of pelicans, surfeited and drowsy, clung to them—now and then opening an eye or flapping a wing—otherwise showing little or no concern for the balls which our rifles dropped about them. There were clusters of islands—lands with steep white cliffs and thick-set lofty trees, and here and there a cane-built hut, palm-branches fanning it and burnished children frolicking in front of it—and there were lonesome sandy nooks, high up into which deserted canoes were drawn, and over the beach of which the volumed surf rolled calmly in, leaving sheets of thin silvery froth to mark its inroads, as it receded to roll in again. At times from some little bay—the smooth rocks walling one side of which were richly tufted with glossy shrubs, the leaves of which were green and gold and crimson, while those, opposite them, were broken into arches and seemed a pile of feudal ruins—a rough-hewn bungo, laden deep with pearl-shells, sail set and coppered faces gleaming from the gunwale, would slip out, and all a-beam slide by us. Then, as the calm sea darkened—and as the trees and cliffs, the loftiest and most striking of them, softened into one great shadow, and the scene, so tranquil in its beauteousness and grandeur all day long, seemed to settle down still more and grow entranced—high in the dim heavens, with its cloven ridge touching the few pale stars there, and these trembling as the black crest touched them, the volcano of Chiriqui loomed up. Far off, but all the gloomier and all the grander for the distance from us at which it towered, that vast mountain—where, according to Indian tales, the angry spirits and demons of a lost race dwell—seemed, every instant we gazed at it, to grow vaster still. Of all the great mountains bounding the wide plains of Chiriqui, that alone was visible. Every soaring rival seemed to have shrunk away before it.

Still rippling through those quiet waters—still slipping past those palm-crowned islands—still giving the booming breakers a wide berth and rounding many a scowling point—still, with the faintest breath whispering against our torn and discolored sails—with more or less to thwart or puzzle us, making our way through a glowing, and then a clouded labyrinth of lakes and woods, over beds of pearl and past reefs of coral, in the midst of a hundred mingled perfumes—still, from sunrise to sundown at the work, sluggishly nearing that huge volcano, and, if it be not harsh to tell the truth just here, despite of all the sweetness and richness of the picture, growing wearied and verging on vexation—the schooner we were in dropped anchor in the Boca Chica, one of the mouths of the river Pedrigal, our destination being the city of David, two hundred miles and more to the North of Panama.

It was an aged schooner that brought us there—built in Newburyport for the rice and rosin trade—having long kept up a thriving connection between Boston and the Carolinas—having sprung an irreparable leak, been sold, and then miraculously brought round the Horn—she was twenty-eight years old. In the days of her youth she was known as the Sibyl. Under her new masters, in the ebb of her industrious life, she was known as the Fruta Dorada—a name which seemed to indicate that her Spanish-American owners valued her decayed timbers as though they were as precious as the auriferous trees of the Hesperides. The sails had been so frequently patched, very little of the original canvas remained. She was porous all over. The sailors pumped her every three hours, and then never thought of pumping her dry within three or four feet. The rigging in every direction was constantly snapping. Blocks and ring-bolts, cleets, thimbles, main-topsail sheets, bob-stays and shank-painter, all were woefully out of repair. Rust and worms had fed on them luxuriously for months. A twelve-penny nail, driven into the mizen-mast, six feet from the deck, kept the bell for a while in suspense. The bit of spun-yarn, however, which kept it up there, breaking one day, the bell, striking all hours, came with a crash to the deck. It was never replaced. From that out a wooden clapper was used. Cockroaches, spiders, ants, three or five scorpions at least—all of a first-class description, and, with the exception of the latter, all utterly fearless and incessantly busy—had the principal cabin to themselves. No one could sleep there—no one could sit there. The plagues held undisputed possession. Besides, it was a musty little cavern, and one might have died of suffocation in it, if he had not been crawled or stung to death. It answered the purposes of a storeroom, or steward's pantry, well enough, but that's all it was good for. The sugar, the rice, the mustard, the coffee, the vinegar and onions, the claret, the knives and forks, the pliant spoons, the tumblers, the red cabbage, the cork-screw, the lemon-squeezer, the ladle of a lost soup-tureen—all the appliances of our breakfast and dinner table were stowed away there, underneath or along the bunks, and both sides of the ladder which descended into it from the quarter-deck. It was furnished, moreover, with a looking-glass the size of the Ace of Clubs, peering into which a gentleman had the advantage of seeing more faces than one, and of ascertaining many of the mutations which the human countenance, without incurring any torture or permanent mischief, is enabled to undergo. To stand up to this glass, correct the slightest irregularity or effect the slightest improvement of feature, was a triumph which all the ingenuity and nerve the Fruta Dorada could boast of, this trip at all events, completely failed to achieve.

It was in this infirm schooner we had come from Punta Arenas, in the Gulf of Nicoya. For nine wearisome, blistering, deadening days, were we imprisoned in her. A slack breeze, a seething sun—at times a fierce shower which left the deck and rigging steaming for an hour after it had ceased—these were the consolations of that captivity. Reconciling us all the more to it, there were the grand mountains of Costa Rica ever within sight—oftentimes within pistol-shot—glittering in their dark-green and purple glory, from the rising to the setting of each sun, and at night deepening with their majestic forms the darkness of the sky. Pictures of shadowy deep ravines—great leafy branches overarching them, their walls trickling with moisture, and a full stream, cold and bright, bounding over rocks, plunging into green transparent basins which the sunshine veined with gold, and then with a smooth swiftness widening off between two strips of sand and pebbles—the fragrance of flowers and the notes of birds, the most beautiful and wonderful on earth, pervading all—such were the appeasing pictures which those mountains ceaselessly suggested. Dwelling on them—filling them up with bright-eyed friends and all the accessories of an Arcadian feast—it is not difficult to conceive the rapt pleasure with which our detention on board the Fruta Dorada filled us.

Steaming past with an accelerated speed, it seemed to us, as if in derision of our slow and awkward pace—for we were dawdling about and wabbling up and down in the most ignoble style imaginable, as the heartless Levite, scorning our distress, swept by—the Panama Railroad Company's steamer, the Guatemala, which we had left in Punta Arenas the night before, furnished us with an additional reason for congratulating ourselves on the age and comfort of our craft. Lest we might omit to do so with all the heartiness and zeal to which the Fruta Dorada was entitled, the gay Captain of the Guatemala called out to us to know what we had for dinner, while the solid Doctor put other interrogatories of an equally friendly, soothing, and exhilarating nature. In half an hour there was a small black cloud ahead, and that was all that remained to us of the Guatemala. The next night she was in the Bay of Panama, and we had not made a knot from the point at which she passed us.

The dullness of our sailing, however, was in great measure compensated by the variety of character which the company on board presented. The Captain was a Frenchman, a native of Marseilles. Frolicsome, good-natured, active, profuse with his claret and absinthe, running over with song and anecdote, voluble on all subjects, festive at all hours, and a finished comedian—he was the brightest star of the luminous group on board the Fruta Dorada. In this group was included the owner of the schooner.

A Panamanian by birth, he was studded with pimples, had very feeble pink eyes, and in every feature revealed an exuberant condition of scrofulous taint. Solemn to the gravest excess, he spoke little, smiled none, drank deeply, and profoundly slept. He slept all night. Were it not that he had to open his eyes in the sunlight, now and then, to imbibe and eat a little, he would have slept all day. He slept in the principal cabin—in the midst of the cockroaches, the spiders, the ants and scorpions—an astounding fact, demonstrative of his imperviousness to intense heat and venom. Solemn as he was, however, on more than one occasion he proved himself amiable, and of his honesty in matters of business, the Captain told us, there was the brightest of evidence. His father and mother are old residents of David. Foremost of the wealthiest people there, they own and inhabit a two-storied house, pushing a prosperous custom with English calicoes and cottons, French wines, and Dr. Barth's electric oil.

Besides the Captain, there was another Frenchman on board. Escaping from Paris, early in 1852, the Vigilance Committee of Louis Napoleon being keen on his track, he waved his adieu to France from the breakwater of Ostend, crossed over to the land of Alfred and Shakspeare, and thence steamed to Jamaica. Dissatisfied with the liberty vouchsafed to that opulent island—eager for new worlds to conquer—the proscribed Republican made for the Boca del Toro, crossed the Cordilleras, and, finally, dropped down into David, where, in course of time, he married into a family having fifty head of cattle. Mottled and slim as she is, he adores his wife as the perfection of beauty. She, in return, adores her husband as the superlative of all that is graceful, chivalrous, and most fascinating. It is a charming delusion. They, also, have a two-storied house, and, no doubt, as sparkling testimonies of their superior respectability, have broken glass chandeliers swaying from the naked beams of their somewhat vacant and airy parlors. The adored husband is engaged in the pearl-trade—makes frequent trips up and down the coast in search of the lustrous shell—and, with great gentleness and suavity of manner, combines a strong love for commercial speculation with the neatest dexterity in clenching a bargain.

The most remarkable of the group—though the accomplished gentleman may have been somewhat less brilliant, perhaps, than the Captain of the Fruta Dorada—was a retired Colonel of the Indiana militia. A tall, thin, rigid gentleman, with a frosty bald head and a tight red skin drawn over his face, he stood straight and high and stiff as a flag-staff, whenever the superiority of his favorite profession was questioned. A lawyer of five-and-twenty years' standing, in constant requisition and flaming repute in all cases of divorce, afflicted with a raging ardor for political distinction, and ever ready to spread himself with eagle's wings and talons upon every question of the day, nevertheless he preferred the Camp to the Court-House, and a campaign garnished with bullets to one the issue of which was quietly lodged in the Ballot-Box. His fingers were surprisingly slender and long, and, whether he described a charming scene or denounced an enemy, he seemed to claw the air with more or less eagerness for a feast of blood. Fluent as a tropical stream in the month of October, he never ceased speaking of the time when he commanded the Catawba Grenadiers of Terre Haute—the time when he was elected Major of Brigade and had a shaving-box and pair of spurs presented him by the Common Council of Fort Wayne—the day when in his shirt-sleeves and worsted slippers, at the head of the New Albany Fusileers, he tore his way through miles of cacti to the bastions of Chapultepec—the evening when specially invited by the President of Peru to a grand ball and supper, in recognition of his eminent rank and exploits, he had to apologize for not bringing his Colonel's uniform along with him, informing his Excellency that he made it a point to travel as Sir Charles Napier advised the officers of the East India army to do—that is, with a towel only, a tooth-brush, a bit of soap, and an old pair of boots:

These references of his to the salient points of his splendid military career—recurring every half hour or so—became somewhat irksome to us the second or third day out. But, then, he was so genial, so accomplished, so vivacious and fresh—spoke with so gallant a temerity the strangest of tongues, under the impression it was the purest of Spanish—bowed so dutifully whenever the faintest compliment was paid him—displayed his long fingers with such flexible significance in his controversies and polite conversations—altogether bore himself with such assiduous magnificence and nicety on the smallest occasion, that, in a resigned though tortured audience, he secured a privilege, which, had he been less accomplished and splendid, would have been briskly denied him. Judged by his own representations, he was one of the most distinguished men of the United States. The annals and newspapers of his native State, however, are wholly uncommunicative concerning him. So, too, are the several histories of the Mexican war. Nevertheless we have no disposition to question his celebrity, but, admitting it fully, must be permitted to express our regret, that such men do so much without their leaving the smallest record, or the world knowing the least about them.

An apothecary from Leon, in Nicaragua, was the least celestial star of the group. Squint-eyed, knocker-kneed, with a broad baggy face the color of treacle, two teeth alone visible in the front of his head, and these set together in the upper gum, long and sharp as a rabbit's—he was the damaged picture of a fallen star. Bound for the Huaccas of Chiriqui, he wore a very short coarse trowsers of Guatemalan manufacture, a pair of untanned shoes with murderous soles, and a frowzy red silk sash about his loins—his luggage consisting of a soiled pocket-handkerchief stuffed with sausages, hard-boiled eggs, cheese and garlic, and a brass-hooped box of patent medicines. Morose, dogged, beetle-browed, he opened his lips to no one the nine dreary days we were on that trip, but, the live-long day, sat upon a water-cask, musing and frowning to himself, beating one untanned shoe against the other, at times cleaning a lancet or a forceps, greedily swallowing a morsel out of the provisional handkerchief, or at full length, with his shaggy head upon a scroll of ox-hide, fried himself in the forecabin, and took to the basest snoring.

The morning after the Fruta Dorada had dropped anchor in the Boca Chica, just at sunrise, the passengers, with the exception of the apothecary from Leon, left the schooner and proceeded up the river to the village of Boca Chica. The Captain of the schooner, with two of his men, one of them a lively round-limbed Chilean, accompanied them.

A calm, soft, clear morning—the dew dropping in large diamonds from the trees which overhung the river—the pale sky reddening as the sun came up from behind the Cordilleras—white birds on the wing, darting from the water into the dense rich foliage on the banks as we swept toward them, the swift powerful stream eddying and gurgling among roots and rocks, or bearing mercilessly seaward some noble tree which it had plucked down miles above—most of the beauty of the previous evening was here revived. True it is, we missed the islands, the sparkling beaches, the shady nooks, the pearl-laden bungos, the steep cliffs worn into feudal ruins, the dusky crowds of gulls and pelicans clinging to the slippery rocks, up the wave-worn grooves of which the sea went splashing. But the birds in those vine-laced trees, darkly bending overhead, were brighter far than poor gull or pelican could be, and the forest, to the right and left of the hurrying river, showed us aisles and arches, porticoes and columns, statelier and richer far than any ever wrought from stone. And there—in the midst of oranges and mangos, the fragrance of which was borne upon the fresh bright waters of the Pedrigal far out to sea—was a swarm of huts, with the shy Naiads of the river gliding in and out of them in their white chemisettes, and a pack of hungry hounds yelping and frothing on the bank, as though some bronzed Diana had been surprised, and the Colonel from Indiana had been the rash Actæon. Besides all which, there was the Volcano of Chiriqui towering sternly and darkly in the sweet light of the morning—the peaks, into which its huge crest is broken, looking blacker than they did at twilight—the unknown forest, with which it is matted from base to summit, looking as though it were a wilderness of purple heather—and the gorges and abysses into which its enormous slopes are rent, and down through which the steadiest looks with an aching eye, closing up in the hazy distance, giving one at the Boca Chica a vague idea, if any, of its terrors and sublimities.

Beyond the volcano, round and tapering as the spire of a great cathedral, and loftier by thousands of feet than that of St. Gudule and Strasbourg, the peak of the Boqueté, nineteen leagues to the northeast, shone like a pile of bronze. So, too, did the peaks overlooking the old Provincial road to the Atlantic, and the summits of the San Juan Mountains. Nearer to us were the lesser mountains which intercept the road to Panama—mountains fashioned into striking and wondrous shapes—into churches, roofs of houses, hulls of ships, keel uppermost—and the largest of which is overrun with the fieriest and deadliest vipers—reptiles which do not wait to be attacked or injured accidentally, but glide forth and strike fiercely the instant a strange foot approaches. Between us and the mountains were the plains of Chiriqui—immense pasturages over which thousands of cattle rove, and the healthfulness and fertility of which are owing to the abundant waters that break the soil.

Having breakfasted at the village of Boca Chica, we started further up the Pedrigal, on our way to David, parting in the friendliest manner with Phillipe Jean Molyneux, the Captain of the Fruta Dorada, to which frail craft, notwithstanding her multiplied infirmities and age, we drank in bowls of the tarest claret many a golden cruise!

It was at the house of a Spaniard, a citizen of the United States, we breakfasted. From the same gentleman we hired a bungo for the river-trip to David.

Five-and-twenty feet in length, two feet deep and three feet broad, painted black and white, furnished with a light canvas awning at the stern—under which awning a bullock's hide, the hairy side uppermost, was stretched for carpeting—four lithe, mirthful, musical young fellows swept this bungo up, at the rate of four miles an hour, against the stream. The oars they used were long tough poles—eighteen feet in length and from two to three inches thick—to which a blade, something like a shingle, but broader a good deal at the lower end than at the upper, was nailed. As they rose from the thwarts and gave the stroke, a strange, wild, mournful but ringing whoop broke from them; and thus rising to the stroke, bringing their bending oars with a long strong sweep through the swift current, that peculiar cry of theirs, at measured intervals, echoed far and wide beyond the river, from noon to close on sundown.

The same trees, the same birds, the same rich verdure and gorgeousness of foliage we had seen at the Boca Chica in the morning, were visible all day long. The same great mountains we had gazed upon at dawn, were ever present in the wide sunny scene. The same swift powerful river, to which we had descended from the schooner, bore us onward to the city. For seven glaring hours there was no change, unless, indeed, the setting of a leg-of-mutton sail, whenever we came to where the river widened and the breeze from the sea had play, may be set down as something new.

At last, about half past six in the afternoon, we reached our destination. This was an umbrageous tree of prodigious girth, the limbs of which were laden with epiphytes and the gaudiest macaws, and up the bare roots of which we had to climb from the bungo, to reach the top of the bank, five feet above. David lay four miles off. We had to tramp to it across a plain crowded with cattle. There were neither mules, nor carts, nor cargueros to be had for hire. So the young Frenchman led the way, carrying a bundle, an umbrella, and a broad flat paste-board box containing a white muslin frock, embellished with pink satin bows, for his little boy—the heir-presumptive to the fractured chandeliers and a moiety of the fifty head of cattle. The Colonel from Indiana brought up the rear, painfully dragging his legs and a ragged old carpet-bag after him—one of his war-boots, owing to the state of his corns, being slung over his shoulder, while an enameled slipper, shabbily cracked, flapped on the sole of his most sensitive foot.

As the evening darkened, his tall spare figure, flickering in the star-light half a mile behind, reminded us of the forlorn schoolmaster of Sleepy Hollow. The dramatic effect of the apparition was powerfully heightened by all the mules, colts, and staid gray asses of the plain herding toward it, following it inquisitively, whisking their tails and pricking their ears in its wake, and, finally, when their curiosity appeared to have been satisfied, flinging up their hoofs with a simultaneous snort, and vanishing in a whirlwind of derision from it.

A few yards from the tree at which we disembarked, we came to the hacienda of Don José Obuldia, recently the Governor of the State of Panama. All the cattle within sight were his. The wealthiest man in the State, he is at the same time one of the most urbane, liberal, and enlightened. Half-way across the plain we were overtaken by his mandador or steward, mounted on a sprightly little horse. For the consideration of one dollar, this good Samaritan undertook to relieve us of our carpet-bags, fire-arms, the Colonel's impedimenta, including the discarded war-boot, and convey them to David for us. Thus relieved, an hour's trudging and stumbling brought us to the outskirts of the city, and, ten minutes more, we were in the Hotel Francesca, cooling ourselves with copious draughts of Benicarlos and lemonade. Twenty minutes after that again, we were seated at an excellent supper, and, in due time, the neatest and whitest beds received our wearied frames. It was late next morning when we left them. The sun was showering down a blinding light on David as we went forth to view the city.

Planted in a corner of the great plain of Chiriqui—having wide though rugged streets, well-built houses for the most part, several of them two stories high, and these furnished with balconies and piazzas, the faces of the houses being variously colored—having tall cocoa-nut trees, here and there, with a graceful languor swaying above the plantain—thatched or red-tiled roofs, and that vast volcano ever overlooking it—the city of David, spite of all the blistering and warping it has got from its exposed position, is an attractive picture. It is at first sight at all events. And on Sundays, when the Señoritas flash upon the scene in all the effulgence of crisped and snowy muslin, beaming jewelry and flowery sunshades, and the snug French Consul displays the tri-color over his bright green balcony in the principal thoroughfare of the city, and all the young Caballeros in glossy suits saunter or dash about—some on foot and others in silver-bowed and embroidered saddles—the picture is quite brilliant. Not until one has been a week or two condemned to loiter through its broiling streets—for the city is exposed to the fiercest sun on every side—not until one has found that his aching feet can stand no longer the ruts, the stones, the broken tiles and other snares with which those streets abound, and finds, moreover, that among the inhabitants of the place, buzzards and corpulent negroes and strolling pigs preponderate—not until then does one begin to criticise, in a doubtful spirit, the hues and outlines of the first impression.

The Plaza is an ample square, tufted with burned grass, having on one side the Hotel Francesca, a blank adobe wall, and the Botica Francesca, where a filibuster of French birth—a spry young gentleman who sports a white burnouse and a profound mustache—dispenses calomel and Brandreth's pills. On another side there are four or five two-storied houses, one of which is in a slimy state of disintegration, and has two naked children perpetually oozing in and out of the door-way. A German butcher owns another; Mr. Haws, of Panama, the clean and freshly-painted one at the farthest end. But, at present, this handsome house is in a state of deep repose, the doors being padlocked and the windows shuttered. The Parochial Church stands in the middle of the Plaza. Built of adobe—and the dusky bricks never having had a spattering of whitewash, while the worm-eaten beams, supporting the roof, project like wooden legs a foot and a half beyond the eaves—the uncouth structure has none of those architectural incentives to piety which men of austere creeds are sometimes moved to rebuke. The chamber in which the Provincial Legislature of Chiriqui used to sit, previous to the recent subdivision of New Granada into States and the absorption of the Provinces, must have been just as poor as the Church.

The French flag has been mentioned. France is the only foreign Power that has a representative in this remote Department of New Granada. Many Germans have settled here, but the French exceed them. They constitute the most influential portion of the foreign population of David, confining themselves, however, to the little city, while the Germans disperse themselves over the neighborhood, bridge the rivers, climb the mountains, penetrate and hew down the forest, advance and plant their new homes in the regions of the palm and cedar, proving themselves better emigrants, more adventurous and aspiring, than their brethren of Burgundy and Champagne. As for the United States, they are completely in the back-ground here. Texas, I believe, has sent one of her citizens, and New Hampshire another, and Connecticut a third—but at this point, for the present, the contributive enterprise of our great Republic to Chiriqui ceases.

Nevertheless there is much to tempt it here. From the shores of the Pacific, to the slopes of the Cordilleras, the soil is fertile to excess. While it affords pasturage for countless herds, it yields all the intertropical grains, fruits, vegetables and esculent roots, in marvelous abundance. The sugar is the best on the coast. It has a finer grain than the sugar of Louisiana. The tobacco is superior to that of San Salvador. Cotton might be cultivated to any extent. Rice is produced in astonishing quantities, and this, not on lands artificially inundated as in Bengal and South Carolina, but on a surface simply irrigated by rains, two and three crops being had in the year. Perfectly free from swamps and stagnant waters, the land from the sea to the mountains, a distance of five-and-thirty miles at the narrowest interval, is sound and wholesome. The sun is powerful, indeed, and there are few trees on those vast plains to shelter one, but no rank matter exists for it to work upon. The climate, therefore, is pure and healthful—so healthful, that at Dolega, about thirteen miles from David, and situated very nearly in the centre of the plains, people are said to die of sheer old age, and of that alone. Mr. Power, the genial and accomplished editor of the Panama Star and Herald, eloquently enumerates these and other characteristics of Chiriqui, in a memorable article which appeared in that paper, the 9th of July, 1853. In this article, having stated that the few foreigners, who had visited that part of the coast during the two previous years, had taken so much pains to develop the advantageous position and internal wealth of the country, that it was already attracting too much attention to be neglected in the future, Mr. Power gives it as his conviction, that “had the same knowledge, relative to the Province, been acquired four years before, Chiriqui would this day have been the leading route between the two oceans, instead of Panama.”

At present, however, notwithstanding the extraordinary facilities it presents for immigration and interoceanic transit—the Atlantic and Pacific ports, terminating the route, being pronounced by Mr. Power, who is a practiced engineer as well as a clear and conscientious writer, to be superior in safety and convenience to any on the coast—Chiriqui is little known to the commercial world. Half a dozen schooners—every one of them just as crippled and precarious as the Fruta Dorada—more than suffice for its trade along the coast. They bring a few casks of rum—and excellent rum it is, that, especially, manufactured by Messrs. Wagner and Campbell —to Panama, Bonaventura, and one or two Peruvian ports. They bring pearl-shells hither and thither—sometimes to Panama—sometimes to Punta Arenas—and once or twice a year they take a cargo of hides down to the first-named place. Pigs and horned cattle, too, are exported in small quantities. The latter, however, are driven in considerable numbers, in the months of March and April, overland to Panama.

With these exceptions, Chiriqui may be said to have no foreign trade whatever. The Panama Railroad Company, when they first started them, made the Boca Chica a port of call for their Central American steamers. But after two or three trips the experiment was pronounced a failure, and now the handsome Guatemala passes up the coast in all the pride of a fortunate career, leaving the boundless pasturages, the sugar-fields, the palm-groves, the great forests of oak and sandal-wood, and teak and caoutchouc, and all the luscious and all the solid wealth of Chiriqui, idly sleeping in the azure or golden mist ten leagues away. The discovery of those strange relics in the old Indian graves, in the month of August, 1859, gave the country for a short time a vivifying impulse: Hundreds of foreigners poured in. The merchants of David quadrupled their purchases. Monsieur Quelquejeu, of the Hotel Francesca, enlarged his establishment—built a row of neat and commodious sleeping-rooms—laid in a prodigal supply of wines and all sorts of liquors, making every arrangement which an agreeable and enterprising host could devise for the accommodation of his expected guests, and they were counted with a military arithmetic nothing short of a battalion. The Guatemala herself, punctual and inflexible as she is, was unable to resist the impulse, and in she went with a score of plunderers for the graves. But the huaccas soon gave out. Gold-hunting among the ancient dead of Chiriqui, in a month or so, was declared to be a lottery in which there were ninety-nine blanks to every prize, and to secure that one prize much labor and suffering had to be endured. One by one the foreigners drew off. The natives only, it seemed, could stand the work.

And so the precious soil, sown with golden bats and alligators, with golden birds and scorpions, with golden obscenities and gods, was abandoned to the children of the soil. They are reaping the fitful harvest still. To their patient toil, scantily clothed and nourished as they are, but enduring and persistent, and proof against the rains and heats, those undeciphered graves are to this day yielding up their treasure. The Guatemala made but one trip to aid the spoliation. A second would have been worse than profitless. As he surveys his vacant rooms and undiminished stock of cobwebbed bottles, Monsieur Quelquejeu wrings his hands, and with the wildest maledictions averts his eyes from those costly evidences of his infatuation. Pick-axes, India-rubber leggings, red flannel shirts, frying-pans, tin dishes, hatchets and revolvers, all the accessories of a California mining-camp are to be found in the principal stores of David, and would be sold by auction, at any moment, were two solvent purchasers within hail.

Had the huaccas been more prolific, Chiriqui, in half a year, would have become one of the busiest and wealthiest countries within the tropics. As it is, the gates of the Cordilleras have to be driven in, the country has to be thrown wide open to the world, the noble harbors, between which it lies, have to be united by an iron pathway, before it can hope to receive a useful and powerful accession to its population, and grow glad in the full exposition of the riches with which it has been so sumptuously blessed.

Ten days after his arrival in David, the writer of this narrative set out for the Boca del Toro. For a week he had been busy procuring information, guides, mules, and provisions. The trip between the oceans being seldom made—four or five times a year at most—it is necessary to make inquiries as to the state of the rivers, etc., and, moreover, it takes some time to secure the services of competent guides. Neither are mules so easy to be had in Chiriqui. Horses abound—quick, hardy, showy little fellows—but their more demure kindred are scarce, and for hire or sale command a high figure. Two hundred dollars is an average price for a serviceable mule.

The expedition, at last, set out. Three Indian guides led the way on foot, costumed in blue and white cotton shirts, with white cotton handkerchiefs bandaging their heads, and large javas—wicker-work baskets—slung upon their backs. In these they carried the provisions, the cooking utensils, the blankets, and every thing else that was considered essential for the road. Each had a load of seventy-five or eighty pounds. There was José, a boy of splendid shape, immense strength, and mysterious silence. There was Camillo, a noisy scape-grace, sinewy and gigantic, good-natured, officious, reckless, jovial, enraptured with song and absorbed in liquor. There was Eduardo, a quiet, gentle, patient, indefatigable fellow, the most civilized and refined of the three.

José, however, was the surest guide. His memory and keen instinct never failed him. On more than one occasion, when the track was lost under the fallen leaves or a fresh growth of prickly shrubs and Indian plantain, or when the marks of the machetta on the blazed trees were difficult to be made out, this powerful creature—whose limbs one would fancy were the texture as they were the color of cast iron—used to unsling his java, and gliding into the depths of the forest, disappear, perhaps, for an hour. His appearance as he returned to us—his step, his attitude, his look—would make a glorious painting. With the right hand uplifted, the forefinger pointing to the sky, his naked feet gliding through the florid dense foliage over roots and stones, as though they were shadows only, his dark brown features flashing with happiness and triumph—at such times he looked like some young conqueror bearing tidings of freedom to a race in chains!

Besides the Indian guides, there was Don Carlos Wagner, a most hospitable and hearty German gentleman, who had in the friendliest manner offered to accompany the writer as far as the Boqueté. Don Carlos has been nine years a resident of Chiriqui—lives, two miles outside David, on a fine farm, to which he has given the name of Buena Vista—and by precept and example has done much to excite an intelligent industry throughout the country. He is, of course, particularly interested in the success of his countrymen who have made it their home, and is ever ready to encourage and befriend them. They, in return, look up to him with confidence and very grateful feelings, regarding him as their oracle and leader in the Battle of Life they have crossed the seas and continents to fight, and upon which, not forty centuries, but all the cycles of creation, from the summit of the volcano of Chiriqui, look down.

The brave old Indiana Colonel, too, was in the cavalcade, wearing a blood-red shirt and a green bough in his hat, which, being of straw and having seen a world of service, was chipped and tarnished. And so was the Captain of the Fruta Dorada—not chipped and tarnished, indeed, but in the best condition and cricket-like spirits—astride of a pony, four hands high, and draped in a Peruvian poncho colored like the rainbow. Mr. William Campbell, the brother-in-law of Don Carlos Wagner, undertook, not only to accompany the gentleman from Costa Rica as far as the Boqueté, but made up his mind, with all the chivalry of a Highland Scotsman, to be his escort to the shores of the Atlantic. For such a journey—through mountains so wild and lonesome, in such appalling rains as fall there, over rivers such as thunder through those solitudes, in the midst of the dismaying perplexities to which such dark tracts of forest oftentimes give rise—day after day advancing through the undisturbed domain of the wild beast and reptile, between dawn and sundown ascending and descending thousands of feet with torn hands and swollen ankles, lying down for the night under a roof of woven palm-branches, with Indian followers snoring and steaming to the right and left of you, and a pile of green logs crackling and sputtering, and sluggishly rolling up a smothering cloud of smoke, through which the bat and fire-fly never cease to flit—for such a journey, than William Campbell, of Gualaca, no cheerier nor brighter escort could be had.

The first thirteen miles of the journey were easy work. No road, indeed, could possibly be easier. From David to Dolega it is a perfectly level plain, broken only by the rivers bearing the same names. In the rainy season these rivers are dangerous to ford, but in the dry season, though their beds are full of deep pools and heaped with boulders, they are passed on horseback without the slightest difficulty. Thousands of cattle clouded the plain, and, here and there, shaded by noble mangos, orange-trees, the sweet lemon and maranone, were farm-houses shaped like old hay-ricks, and looking just as bleached and wilted. Here and there, too, was a trapicke, creaking and groaning as the ponderous oxen walked their slow rounds, and the crushed sugar-cane spirted into the basin of cemented clay underneath the cylinders. At these mills and farm-houses there were curious groups—groups with beaming faces and airy garments—eying us wonderingly as we saluted them and rode on. Two or three times we were offered fruit, agua dulce, small plates of honey, and brimful cups of a stronger distillation. But the sun was too fiery for such draughts, and we still rode on, cooling our parched lips with a slice of pine-apple only, or a bowl of the agua dulce.

A mile outside Dolega the party stopped at the house of Don Roberto Sces, the discoverer of the golden relics in the Indian graves of Chiriqui. All the way from David we had ridden through thousands of these disemboweled and ransacked graves, and in every direction, for leagues and leagues, from Terraba and Boruca to Santiago de Veragua, we might have seen tens of thousands more.

A calm, noiseless, smiling little gentleman is Don Roberto. Bending his wiry frame and stroking his scant gray beard—his small white teeth shining through his opened lips and his small black eyes bubbling with light and pleasure—in bare feet, and with head uncovered, he invited us to dismount. In acknowledgment of so much graciousness we complied. But rich as he is—Don Roberto has taken $20,000 from the graves, and can lay his hand any day, they say, on $20,000 more—his house suggests the idea of mendicancy and misery rather than that of good luck and comfort. In a dark corner of it, stretched upon an ox-hide, his eldest son was lying wretchedly sick with fever. The Colonel—professing a knowledge of pharmacy, as well as of law, theology and arms—undertook at once to prescribe for him. He would have bled him profusely on the spot had not the rest of the party protested.

Seven miles further on, we stopped to dine at the house of a lemon-colored gentleman who had congestion of the liver, and who, stripped to the waist, was plucking a fowl as we rode up. His wife—a pretty, sprightly, olive-complexioned girl, with two pearl-beaded and brass-rimmed combs in her luxuriant black hair—was seated upon a block of guapinol at the door, busy on a shirt for her nude lord, at the same eventful moment. But as we dismounted, and the guides, having unlunged their javas, led off the horses to the potrero, she laid aside her work, welcomed us to the house, offered us guavas and bananas right away, and then, finding we had stopped for dinner, set about putting the kitchen, that is the whole house, in order. In repulsive contrast, her husband kept his seat and held his tongue, still continuing to pluck the grizzly fowl between his knees, never lifting his head, even once, to welcome us. In the same dogged mood he remained all evening, taking to a red clay pipe when he had stripped the fowl and stowed away the feathers in a bag. He was jealous of that guileless hospitable young wife—so José told us—and wanted no strangers near the place. Never was there a liver so green with bile.

It was, however, a glorious feast we had that evening. While Isabellita tended the fire, put the water on, sliced the plantains, and warmed into a more sparkling prettiness every second that she tripped about the fire-place, Captain Molyneaux prepared the meats, superintended the cooking, tried his hand at a tasteful dish or two of vegetables, mixed the mustard and achieved a sauce—leaving the Colonel, in his blood-red shirt, to open the tins of salmon and green pease, and at his leisure compound the punch. Mr. Campbell looked after the horses, saw them watered, plentifully supplied with chopped sugar-cane, and safely paddocked for the night.

Five or six minutes' walk from the house, a beautiful little stream trickled through a deep, darksome, rugged bed. Great shadowy oaks overarched it, and burly rocks, belted with the tenderest green moss, formed basins underneath them, from which the most delicious water, fresh as the dews of a northern climate, gently overflowed. In one of these basins Don Carlos Wagner, having charge of the wine-department, sunk two bottles of pale sherry, and then stretching himself upon a sandy couch close by, with a heavy meerschaum between his lips, kept watch over the cooling vintage until dinner was announced. In this duty he was ably assisted by the gentleman who records these facts.

A long slow ride over an immense savanna thickly strewn with calcined rocks and other evidences of volcanic action—with a biting wind beating us breathless in the face as it swept down from the volcano—the guides breasting it manfully under their burdens—Captain Phillipe Jean Molyneaux, his distempered straw-hat tied close down about his ears with a flagrant yellow and scarlet handkerchief, complaining dismally of catarrh—Don Carlos Wagner deploring the absence of his great-coat and boots, the beaming Teuton having come along in the lightest plaid summer trim and pumps—the Colonel, reduced to a mere skeleton; freezing in the saddle, his eyes and teeth in hysterics—the roar of unseemly waters heard at times above the wind—cloud after cloud with torn edges flying across the face of the mountains—a comfortless, wild, raw, disordered morning—it was to all this gall and wormwood we awoke, at four o'clock A.M., six hours after that dinner had been disposed of.

Nearing the volcano—the mighty peaks which form its jagged crest, and the black ravines into which its forest-burdened slopes are rent, growing more and more distinct, and the tumult of rushing waters deepening in the troubled air—we came to a broad stone wall, very nearly six feet high. It was the boundary wall of the great cattle-range of Don Lorenzo Gallegos, the polite and well-informed Prefect of David, and next to Obaldia, the late Governor of the State, the wealthiest gentleman in Chiriqui. Passing it, we found ourselves at the brink of a ravine, a quarter of a mile in breadth, and fully 800 feet in depth. This was to the right of the gate-way through which we passed. The side of the ravine next us was precipitous and bare. The side opposite was densely wooded. Between them, in the bewildering depth below, the River Caldera raved and foamed, sweeping furiously through the chasm, as though, whirled away in an agony of vengeance, it were bent upon some terrible work of devastation. To the left, also, was another ravine, broad and deep, four or five hundred yards apart from that through which the Caldera tore its way, and in the abyss of which the Cocheo hoarsely thundered, as the whitened flood broke against enormous rocks and flashed in sheeted froth across them, volumes of glistening mist rising midway between the billows and the green ledge on which we stood. Niagara, with all the power and terrorism of its exhaustless waters, fails to impress one more thrillingly than those fierce rivers do in the inviolable depths of their ravines. Motionless, silent, breathless almost, standing by our patient horses, we looked down with strained and aching eyes, until the rivers seemed to grow more riotous and convulsed, the black depths to deepen, the glistening foam and mist to rise to our very feet, and the ground, on which we stood, to tremble and give way.

At noon, having ridden against that biting wind for eight long hours, most of the time over the same immense savanna, but, for the rest, through broken ground and varied scenes—now close to the great volcano, and then down-hill through little groves and shrubberies where the air was chill, the trees were so thickly interwoven, and such faint sunshine stole through them, and, last of all, along the base of the majestic cliffs that on one side, for two leagues fully, overlook the valley, at the head of which, commanding it to the furthest point, the peak of the Boqueté stands as a watch-tower for the eagle, and as a pillar of light to those who pass that way from sea to sea—at noon we reached the Culebra, and having spurred through its dangerous current, which is impassable in the rainy season and when a Norther blows, reached, at last, the ranch of Santa Maria, at the foot of the Cordilleras.

It was on a round high hill covered with long, wiry, whitish grass, the earth being thrown up here and there, and all about, wherever the huaccas had been broken into, while, far and wide, the noble herds of Lorenzo Gallegos were to be seen—above, below, close to us, and leagues away—the only living figures visible in the scene. The ranch itself was a doleful wreck, looking, for all the world, as though it were the roof of a hut which had plopped through the side-walls and settled permanently on the floor. Decayed and loose, it must have been a winterish homestead for the raw-boned Indian who owned it, and who, dressed in a velveteen waistcoat and shirt, the latter all smeared and frayed, complacently awaited our approach, being seated on what, the brevity of his garments considered, must have been to him an extremely cold stone.

Here, after a hearty breakfast and a round of enthusiastic toasts, the Captain of the Fruta Dorada, Don Carlos Wagner, and our heroic old friend, the Colonel, took leave of the party bound for the Atlantic.

It was an affecting separation. The historian of the party clasped the Colonel's hand, and shook it till it burned. The Colonel, in return, threw his head over the shoulder of the historian, and when he withdrew it, his eyes looked waterish and inflamed. Don Carlos, the big hospitable soul, to smother his melancholy, had recourse to the hamper which Eduardo carried, and there dried up. Phillipe Jean Molyneaux declared that his sun had set, hinted at suicide, vowed he should never forgive himself for not making arrangements to accompany the party the whole way across, beat his breast with a mea maxima culpa, was seized with a violent coughing, and, having got through with that, nearly gasped his last in a state of collapse.

In half an hour, these three sad gentlemen might have been seen slowly riding, homeward to Dolega, along the base of the lofty cliffs on the opposite side of the valley of the Boqueté, the Culebra swooping and roaring between them and the friends, who, from the top of the hill on which the ranch of Santa Maria stood, waved their hats to the solitary horsemen, and discharged their guns in a mournful farewell. In less than an hour, Don Francisco and his friend, Campbell, of Gualaca, were in the heart of the forest on the slope of the Cordilleras, the guides, in single file, speeding along in their bare feet and legs, José taking the lead, Eduardo following him in silence, while the exuberant Camillo danced under his load, whistled and sang, uttered mock lamentations over the mules and horses we had left at the ranch—for we had to foot it the rest of the way—and, in a word, abandoned himself, at the very outset itself, to a full swing of native good-humor and wit.

The first four hours, the path was exceedingly easy to travel. The trees were well marked. The ascents were gradual. The descents were neither steep nor slippery. One large tree alone lay across the track. There were neither protruding roots, nor trailing vines, nor any thing of the cacti growth to trip, strangle, or impale us. A walk through a richly-timbered avenue in some old-country demesne could not have been more pleasant. The day was dry though clouded, and even this latter circumstance was most propitious, since it enabled us, with little or no fatigue, to break ourselves in for rougher work. An hour before sundown we crossed a beautiful stream—a sparkling succession of fretful little cascades it was, the lower branches of the trees which darkened them, dipping into the waters by fits and starts, chafing them, then rebounding, and then striking them again before they had time to smooth themselves and look bright—and here, coming to a halt, we determined to build our ranch and locate for the night.

The ranch is quickly built. José and Eduardo unsling their heavy baskets. Setting them against two brawny trees, they leave them covered with the ox-hide they lashed over them when starting. Camillo does the same, disencumbering himself with a fiendish yawn, and, an instant after, airs his limbs in a frantic horn-pipe. The two former, machetta in hand, disappear for a little. The latter clears a plot of ground, sixteen feet by twelve, felling half a dozen young trees, kicking three or four sharp good-sized stones into the stream, bundling off all the dead leaves and rubbish, and, finally, running a narrow water-course, with an outlet to the stream, two inches deep all round the clearing. This done, with two or three pieces of charcoal he has brought along in his pannier, he lays the foundation for a fire; and having procured a supply of the driest dead wood at hand, arranges it outside the charcoal, filling up the intervals with splinters of fresh resinous wood. In ten minutes the fire is smoking. In twenty it is crackling. In thirty it is ablaze. In less than sixty there is an iron pot warming itself right over the red embers, and in this pot four pounds or more of jerked beef lie buried in three times as many pounds of rice.

In the mean while, José and Eduardo have been cutting uprights and rafters for the ranch, and peeling off narrow strips of bark to lash them together with. Down they come, at last, from the forest above the stream, dragging great sheaves of palm-branches after them. With these the ranch is thatched half a foot thick at least. Six forked uprights, the prongs uppermost to receive the cross-ties, are driven home six inches deep into the earth—two of those uprights, a foot and a half longer than the other four, planted midway at the gable-ends between the corner ones, give the roof a good drainage slant—the frame-work of the roof is laden with palm-branches, these being so arranged as to dovetail into and lap securely over one another—and in half an hour the ranch stands complete. An India-rubber blanket is spread upon the floor within. Other and warmer blankets are thrown over this again. Logs of wood, saddle-bags stuffed with socks and flannel drawers, all such things serve as pillows. Fowling-pieces, hunting knives, powder flasks and rifles swing from the rafters. Wet shoes and clothing are thrown off, and, when the cooking is all over, are tied to a cross-stick, three feet above the fire, to dry. The iron pot is emptied, the last pipe is smoked, the travelers stretch themselves in their blankets for the night, the faithful Indians fall asleep with their feet to the replenished fire, the forest grows quieter and quieter in the gathering darkness, and the first day of the strangers, in those solitary mountains, is at an end.

The next morning, an hour after daybreak, ascending through a cold, wet, dark and tangled path, the trees for the most part being indistinctly marked, they came upon a deserted ranch, entering which they found half a sack of flour, a tin case of lard, a brass bedchamber candle-stick, and an old boot containing two flasks of powder. A pair of linen drawers, smutched and torn, dangled from the roof. Camillo thought it a pity to leave so valuable an addition to a gentleman's wardrobe mouldering there, and so with an unruffled conscience walked off with them. Then our work began in earnest. The spur of the Cordilleras, on which we were, abruptly rose against us.

Looking up, it seemed a stupendous wall, horizontally pierced with trees, ten thousand feet in height. The sight of it, towering gloomily up there as far as the eye could reach, and then no summit visible, was enough to dismay the boldest heart. The thought struck us, it would take hours and hours, days, perhaps, to climb it. At nine o'clock we were masters of it.

Looking down through the drizzly clouds, and for miles over the sloping forest, we beheld the valley out of which we had come, and the vast plain we had traversed from David to the foot of the Boqueté. Beyond that again—separated darkly from it by what appeared to be a narrow belt of palm, but in reality by an unmeasured tract of that glorious tree—the golden Pacific seemed to pulsate in the sun. Nearer to us by ten leagues—jutting right overhead, indeed, so close did they appear—were the cloven heights of the volcano, ever the great central figure of the scene, reared in steep black masses against the cloudless sky. Turning toward the north—on the extreme verge of a whole world of mountains, all buried in what seemed to be an impenetrable forest, and barely discernible through the hazy atmosphere—the waters of the Atlantic, hushed within the islands of the Chiriqui Lagoon, glimmered in the twilight of the horizon. But the cold up there was piercing—we were on the highest ridge of the great dividing range—and the dense mist, in a few minutes, had drenched us thoroughly. So, taking a last look at that transcendent scene, turning from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Pacific to the Atlantic waves once more, we rapidly descended.

Yet hardly had we reached the foot of that commanding height, when another, as abruptly as the former, rose against us, and for two hours more we had to climb, and sweat, and ache, clinging to roots and branches, burrowing our knees in the fresh earth, and, all-fours most of the time, tearing our hands and ears with thorns, had to wriggle our way under fallen trees, stride over them if that were easier, but in either event, from first to last, strain ourselves to an apoplectic pitch.

It is an exquisite relief to draw off from all this burning and breathless work beside such a glorious wild river as the Robalo or the Balsa, and with cataracts, white and soft as masses of falling snow, leaping from one black edge to another through gorges a thousand feet in depth—with deep green pools glowing with golden ripples at your feet—with the overhanging foliage, silvered with the spray of splashing waters, breaking the light which would otherwise be deadening—with the torrent, quieted in that sweet cold shade, looking as though it had run its desperate race and was at rest forever, but, for all that, stealing away until it nears some smoking gulf into which it leaps, and then, frenzied and free once more, thunders away through the wildest solitudes and horrors to the sea—in the midst of all this changeful grandeur, it is a luxury, indeed, to take breath, ease the strained limbs, give way to memories and dreams of scenes dearer to the heart, and thus, by the gentlest enchantment tranquilized, renew the strength that has been exhausted. It is more than a relief, it is a rapturous pleasure after a fevered night—in the darkest hour of which a black skeleton, with a tuft of grizzly-gray beard upon the chin, encircled with a pale yellowish light, stood over you, and a long thin finger-bone was uplifted, and quivered as though it gave a stern warning—and after a merciless wet morning, during which you had again to make your way up and down many a rough spur and chasm, the loosened earth and slippery rocks throwing you back every now and then, the rain and wind beating the branches against you, and the lightning causing you to start and reel every twenty paces for two remorseless hours and more—after such a night and morning, it is a rapturous pleasure to find yourself in the midst of a scene like that which the Tres Brasos—uniting in a channel deeply worn in an enormous slab of granite—vitalize and pervade. Down they hasten, those three beautiful young rivers, in a succession of gentle rapids, from three densely-wooded gorges, and as they joyously mingle, they form a broad swift river, borne upon which one can pass from this point, the greater part of the year, in a bungo to the Lagoon. Both sides of it there are smooth pebbly beaches, and over these the most luxuriant trees in the whole forest seem to have woven the darkest canopy, for scarce a ray of light penetrates the rustling web, and it is chill and cloister-like beneath it.

A lovelier picture it would be hard to find within those mountains. The wildness and terrorism of nature here subside. No longer haughty, stern, and defiant—no longer throwing up high walls and monstrous fortresses to resist invasion, and, with the torrent, hurling down huge stones and trees to smite and overwhelm the intruder—she surrenders to him, and soft and murmuring as a bride, beautiful as Ruth among the reapers, invites him to repose. For days and weeks we could have gratefully rested there, soothed by the subdued chorus of those confluent waters, and, from the resemblance the picture bore to one made famous in the songs of Thomas Moore, have been lulled into a loving though mournful remembrance of an island, the great hope of which can not perish while the mingled waters of Avoca repeat the name of the minstrel to whom they owe their fame.

One night more in the Cordilleras—the sixth and last on foot—one more supper on pheasant and wild turkey, for the forest of the Cordilleras is alive with game—one sleep more in a palm-thatched ranch, Camillo mirthful and boisterous as ever, José fresh as though he had come one day's journey only, and Eduardo obliging and gentle as he was the hour we started—one night more, and there were the wide peaceful waters of the Chiriqui Lagoon throbbing at our feet in the auspicious light of the Easter morn!

Of these calm and glorious waters—shut in from the Atlantic by a rampart of large and luxuriant islands, upon which a Spanish scholar, writing from Costa Rica to Madrid, two hundred years ago, declared that another Venice, richer and nobler than that of the Adriatic, might be planted, the region was so bounteous, and the sea so safe, tranquil, and commodious—of those calm and glorious waters, which, according to the English naval report of 1839, every where afford secure anchorage, multiplying harbors within harbors that admit of ships of the heaviest burden, it is unnecessary here to speak. The Commission, authorized by Congress at the close of the last session, have returned, and their report is before the public. The party, charged with the partial survey of the route between the oceans, appear to have had an easier trip across the mountains than has been here described, and, what is infinitely better still and worthier of happier congratulations, have ascertained, beyond all doubt, the practicability of a railroad connecting the Chiriqui Lagoon, on the Atlantic side, with the Golfo, within the Gulf of Dulce, on the Pacific. The energy, quick intelligence, nerve and enterprise of Mr. Ambrose Thompson, Jun.—a young and successful representative of that spirit of practical and enlightened adventure which so strongly marks the American character and is destined to achieve for the American people so vast a measure of prosperity and national power—these have principally led to this result, Mr. Thompson having, in the month of February last, discovered a cañon, or chain of narrow valleys, which avoids the spurs and precipices, and most of the difficulties which this narrative in a familiar and convivial way sets forth.

The discovery of this cañon overcomes the only difficulty which was at any time supposed to render the project of such a road impracticable. Every thing else was obviously in its favor. Two-thirds of the way across the land is almost as level as a macadamized road could be. Were the rivers bridged—and there are but four between David and the Boqueté—a spring-wagon might be driven at full speed from the Pacific to the slope of the Cordilleras, without a stone or any other impediment having to be removed. Perfectly free from swamps—the writer having crossed on foot from sea to sea without once wetting the sole of his shoe, except, indeed, when he had to ford the rivers—not a dollar would have to be sunk, at any point, in the construction of an artificial foundation. The work being upon solid dry soil all through, the sacrifice of human life, which the Isthmus of Panama entailed, would find no counterpart under the pure sky of Chiriqui, and this of itself would save thousands and thousands of dollars in the construction of the road. The eloquent and philosophic Member of Congress, who, beaming forth from one of the Arcadian Districts of New York, spoke in the last session so alarmingly of the embarrassments and horrors of the route, alluding in freezing terms to the snakes and tigers with which, he understood, that region was infested, may be inclined to regard it with a less frenzied and a friendlier eye, when he reads this narrative and learns that the travelers, of whom it speaks, saw but three snakes the entire of the trip—one, it is true, of the Boa species, being fifteen feet in length, while the longest of the other two was not as many inches, though both were poisonous, the smallest one especially—and that, as for the tigers, their howlings were heard on one occasion only, the last night of the trip, when the party were slipping along at midnight in their bungo, from the Frenchman's Creek, where they had debouched from the mountains, to the little village of Boca del Toro, on Columbus Island, a distance of forty miles.

For the support of the men employed in the construction of the road, the country furnishes any quantity of food, and that of the best description. Beef, sugar, rice, coffee, potatoes, corn, venison—every thing is to be had in the greatest abundance. Not a tree has to be felled along the proposed route, nor within half a league of it, where the forest most closely approaches it. Nevertheless, an inexhaustible supply of fuel can be easily obtained, and, for building purposes, the forest on the slopes of the Volcano, and all through the Cordilleras, is stocked with the soundest material, such as Spanish olive and mahogany, guyaca, cedar, caoba and live-oak.

Last of all, there are the unrivalled harbors themselves. Perfectly easy of access at all hours and in every season—deep and ample enough to shelter the navies of France and England, as Admiral Pelion and Captain Barnett long since reported them to be—the islands of the Lagoon teeming with the most serviceable description of coal a steamship can use—fresh water pouring into them in every direction from the impending mountains—magnificently fitted for all the requirements and the highest ambition of commerce, nowhere between the Poles can the New World match those harbors. The railroad once built, ships of the largest size can lie broadside on to the wharves, and transfer their freight and passengers right off. Neither tug, nor lighter, nor breakwater will be required; nor will it be necessary for cars or ships to wait three minutes, much less three hours, for the tide to suit.

All this being said, nothing more remains, perhaps, satisfactorily to close the narrative, but the expression of an ardent wish, that, before another winter comes, some one, inspired or trained to use a brighter and bolder pen than that which has left its feeble traces on these leaves, shall enter the Boca del Toro, the last great gate-way of America that flew open to the challenge of Columbus, and, circled by companions not less genial or amusing than the Captain of the Fruta Dorada or the old warrior from Indiana, who has disappeared forever, shall, with a grandeur worthy of it, describe the scene, of which the Cordilleras, the forest, the islands, the cloudy domes of Blanco and Robalo, and, above all, the steepes of the volcano of Chiriqui are the transcendent features, and which, from a deep sense of its sublimity, is here left not unfinished only, but untouched.

THE BIRTHDAY OF ROBERT BURNS.

JANUARY 25.

WHY lives this day in fond remembrance now?
Whence its wide spell, that lifts the weary brow.
Back to each heart the dream of Youth recalls,
Till through Life's shadow Nature's sunshine falls—
Love melts the hoar-frost from the breast of Care,
And Song with festive chorus fills the air—
While hand grasps hand, and eye responds to eye.
And Soul bids Self, for one blest moment, die?

No Saintry calendar his name endears
Whose charm defies the wasting blight of years:
No warrior's meed embalms it for the brave,
No shrewd invention Thrift's oblations crave,
No rich bequest, emblazoned on a tomb,
Redeems its memory from oblivion's gloom;
No regal boon or legislative sway
Its blessing mingles with our life to-day.

A Bard's nativity!—can this engage
The frugal spirits of our eager age?
Win from his gold the plodding son of Trade,
And bid Ambition's cherished visions fade,
Toil cease its strife, and Pleasure quit her shrine.
The Scholar own his lore no more divine—
As wise and humble, poor and noble throng
To hail the advent of a child of Song?

Since his brief life, on a progressive tide,
The world exults in its complacent pride—
That subtle vapor does the work which then Wrung the life-blood from hearts of living men.
That Town and Country, Land and Sea unite
By vital currents of electric light,
That Learning, once confined to narrow schools,
O'er mart and hamlet now benignly rules;
While motive-force both time and space transcends,
And in one sphere all ranks and races blends;
Since then, Adventure—our poetic king—
O'er earth and sea has spread her dauntless wing.
A harvest gleaned for Wonder to explore
From mute Japan to Afric's mystic shore,
New Eldoradas found—on Arctic main
Won his perennial wreath for gallant Kane;
Yet vainly Action strives to supersede
The heart's pure conquest by the valiant deed.
Or Science her bold miracles prolong
To quell the magic of thy artless song!

Since then, thy country's loneliest heath and glen Another Scott has glorified for men;
Impassioned Byron breathed his Pilgrim lay,
Ethereal Shelley mused his life away,
And thoughtful Wordsworth chastened bardic zeal
With Veneration's harmonized appeal—
While Woman's genius holds unchallenged sway
In the high cadence of Aurora Leigh.

And Love or Grief its inmost beauty yields
To the divining-rod the Laureate wields;
Nor is the muse an unfamiliar guest
Where Bryant sings the glories of the West;—
Yet through the chorus vast, melodious, dear
How steals thy carol to the ravished ear!

And whence the marvel? other bards have sung
In strains whose echo through the ages rung;
The blind old Greek is audible to-day
As when first woke his peerless Trojan lay;
That walk through Hell in the medieval time
The Tuscan wove in adamant rhyme,
And the Lost Paradise we still explore
With Milton's harp—are precious as of yore;
All unclipped the world that Shakspeare caught
From Life reflected by his chartered thought:
Why from these fathers of eternal rhyme,
These saints and prophets of ideal time,
Turn we so fondly, with a smile and tear,
To him whose spirit lures and links us here?
Why from Ilissus hoar with classic pride,
From elms and castles by the Avon's side,
From Arno's trophies—do we hasten soon
To linger pensive on the banks of Doon?

The star of genius that beguiles us there
Proclaims what all humanity can share;
O'er Rank and Wealth proves Nature's nobler claim,
And gives the lowliest man a brother's fame—
Until the primal instincts of the soul
Transcend all aims, all meaner lures control,
While baffled manhood once again aspires
And feels a-glow its elemental fires.

Thy muse, content fair Nature to explore,
Ne'er knew the chill of Academic lore,
Nor lost the honest fervor that declines
In Traffic's mart and Fashion's gilded shrines:
Not thine the task a borrowed theme to fill
With stolen gems and lapidary skill,
Or seek by Ingenuity to gain
What Inspiration only can attain;
No pedant toil nor blandishment of Art
Made thy frank muse sweet Nature's counterpart;

Thy dark eye glowed with Passion's candid zeal,
Thy brown cheek flushed at Honor's true appeal,
And undismayed amid the wise and great,
Thy bearing won the dignity of state:
Toils wasted fruit, the banquet's wild excess,
The Cares that wither, and the Loves that bless,
Pity more prompt than woman's casual tear,
Heroic pride and penitential fear,
The spell of Beauty and the ban of Woe
Usurped thy heart and bade thy numbers flow!

With every breeze thy infant cheek that fann'd
Breathed the traditions of thy native land,
And the rude ballads of thy mother tongue
A plaintive charm around thy childhood flung;
While Penury her sterner lessons wrought,
And Piety her sacred incense brought,
Domestic love, the landscape and the heart,
Led thee unconscious to the goal of Art!

The sombre gloamin', through whose misty shade
The curlew flits as daybeams slowly fade,
The dew-gemm'd hawthorn and the lassie's hair,
The gelid fleece and milk-thorn scented air,
The lonely moor and sun-enlivened brae
Sufficed to wake and harmonize thy lay;

For humblest things to tender eyes reveal
The dear and wondrous signs of woe and weal;
From the dank furrow to the open sky
Creation spoke to thy revering eye;
The storm's wild howl, the harvest's golden sheaves,
The wintry moon and Spring's unfolding leaves,
An infant's smile or woman's loving glance,
Death's cold eclipse and peasants' jocund dance, Friendship's warm grasp and midnight's peaceful calm,
Taught thee to win and wear the minstrel's palm.
Thus Nature's hand in benediction laid Upon the boy who loved and strove and prayed—
The fount of Poesy—a living spring
Gushed at her touch—a soulful offering!

So pure that spring—perennial its flow
To freshen mirth and solace care or woe,
That the same thrill of pity and delight
It woke at first—melts every heart to-night!
Still do we bend enraptured to behold
The meek-eyed daisy that he sung of old;
Hear, with unbroken awe, the evening prayer,
As "wales" the cotter "with judicious care;"
Still through the revel's mist, ere break of day,
Gleam in the Kirk the lights of Alloway;
Still, to our dreaming sense, the odor plays,
Exhaled so sweetly from the "banks and braes;"
With him we laugh to scorn blasphemous rant,
The pious trick and soul-consuming cant,
Follow with jests the hypocritic brood,
And strip the mask from all the "unco gude;"
Still feel the patriot-throb's electric jar,
As leaps each pulse to greet his "Scots wha hae!"
Or Love's magnetic glow enchanting steal
At bonnie Jean's or Nannie's blithe appeal;—
Its tested solace from the guidwife crave,
Its solemn faith renew at Mary's grave;
Live o'er the tryst, the wreath of friendship twine,
As heart and voice re-echo "Auld Langsyne;"
And to each breast its dearest life returns
To bless and consecrate the muse of Burns!

HENRY T. TUCKERMAN.

MELLICENT'S MALADY.

I DO not affect alliterations, neither do I affect a dislike of them, which is popular now—the reaction of the flood-tide of Minnie Myrtles and her numberless sisters. I affect nothing; I only tell my story, for which no other name or title will suffice, because those two words, "Mellicent's Malady," were the key-notes to the mysterious pæan of her life. I can not remember that I ever thought of the alliterative fact, though I have pronounced the words hundreds of times, until I sat down here just now to write them; which is not strange, but quite natural, when you consider that they were household words to me for a long time. She is my cousin; and for two years preyed upon by a disease which baffled the physicians, I heard daily such phrases as "Mellicent's malady is very curious, certainly;" "Mellicent's malady will kill her."

She was barely nineteen when her seeming high health was invaded by this shadowy enemy. A girl of rare endowments in some directions—poet, painter, and musician. An organization such as you might suppose, if you study organizations at all. Nervous, sanguine, and susceptible. It is hardly necessary now to paint her portrait. You can clearly see the slim figure, the subtle sensibility of complexion, blonde and blushing, the changing blue of her large-lidded eyes, the fine waviness of her splendid silk-soft hair of dun gold. With all this susceptibility she was not weak; there was a foreign grain of sturdy strength running through these tender translucencies—foreign to such temperaments usually; a strata of strength that showed, under the phosphorescent lights, like grains of solemn agate let into the sparkle of topaz. But it did not save her from her fate; and, I am assured, for only one reason—ignorance of her own organization. For two years she paid the penalty of her want of knowledge. She went so near in this time to the mystery of the world beyond the grave, that I am convinced a ray of its subtle light communicated itself to her soul, and enabled her to comprehend the mysteries of her being; enabled her to take up her life's wasted threads, and retrace her steps; to find her way back again upon firmer footholds than at first.

At eighteen you could scarcely credit the possibility of disease—and that, apparently, a purely nervous one—attacking her, so effluent was she of harmonious health in every direction. At eighteen—her eighteenth birthday—then, let me commence my history. There she sits opposite me at the breakfast-table—a little late both of us; a good deal late, Ann Mahoney tells us; but what do we care for Ann Mahoney's Irish grumbling? We were out at our first party last night, and we are talking it over with our chocolate. I am slightly weary-eyed and pale; my lips are feverish, and my appetite not remarkably keen. My cousin Mellicent is as fresh as a flower just bloomed—as that one-pink cactus there at the bay-window; extraordinarily like it, indeed, so crisp and fresh and pink with prettiness.

"I was disappointed in him," she remarks lazily, dropping one, two, three lumps of loaf-sugar into her Parian cup.

"Disappointed in him! Why?"

"Ellerslie said he was splendid: two or three told me so. Every time I have heard his name spoken, in fact, it was with some complimentary adjective; so my expectations were away up, up—oh! on some Roman or Grecian height, you know; and I only saw a young man with a nice complexion and a crooked nose! What did you think?"

"I had heard nothing special about him, you know."

"Well?"

"I thought him handsome—very; a splendid youth. I heard Mrs. Hughes call him a 'princely boy.'"

"Is he very young, then?"

"Only twenty, I believe."

"I'll tell you what I do like amazingly about him, Sara."

I delayed breaking my egg to hear. The pink cactus lips puckered down in a pretty plect of fun.

"His name, dear?"

"Lansing Vaughn."

"How would you like Mellicent Vaughn, then?" girl-fashion, I said.

"Mellicent Vaughn—Mellicent Vaughn," rolling over the conjunction slowly; "oh, it's pretty! but then, Sara, I hate to write a V—always did—never could make a decent capital V; they will look like U's! No, I'll not risk it, though he asks me never so humbly. I should die of his V!"

I am not amusing myself with pleasing reminiscences, reader; I am not wandering away from my story; I am simply unrolling a map of the eventful two years for you. This is the first view: as necessary as the last, you will see.

Sitting in the low, large carriage, we went slowly rolling through the street that afternoon. Two young men went riding by; one, the last, raised his hat, bent down almost to his saddle-bow in making his salutation to us. Mr. Ellerslie—Frank Ellerslie. The other I didn't know, and only saw an unbearded profile, which did not strike me one way or another.

Mellicent was looking after them. "Strange he didn't bow," she said.

"Frank Ellerslie? Why, where were your eyes, Mellicent? He almost dislocated his neck in the effort."

"Frank Fiddlesticks! I mean Lansing Vaughn. Where were your eyes, Sara?"

"That never was Lansing Vaughn. I saw his profile distinctly."

"So did I, and it was Lansing Vaughn's."

"You're moon-struck—laboring under an optical delusion, or crazy, Mell. It was the Kubla Khan as soon as Lansing Vaughn. I talked with him two mortal hours last night; I went to supper with him; I danced two quadrilles and a waltz with him, studying his handsome face all the time. You just looked up from your tête-à-tête with Hoyle Mallory, said two or three pretty greetings to him, then subsided into your sultan chair and forgot him. How should you know him as well as I?"

She leaned forward and gave an energetic order to Jarvie the coachman. Back we plunged, through Bay, and up Front Street, crossing six lanes and three railways, and out on the same street half a mile up, with our horses' heads turned downward in a twinkling. Then I saw what she had planned. There they were, coming toward us—Ellerslie and his companion—as I live, Lansing Vaughn! I stared at him all the way, and, not content, followed him with my gaze as he passed. Oh! I saw it all then. Last night I had studied his full face; to-day, for the first time, his profile had presented itself completely to me. Two different persons there were in his exterior, one much finer than the other: that, the full front view, from sole to crown, the magnificent fellow I remembered him; the other, the side view, revealing the crooked nose, and an immature aspect altogether—a rapidly grown look, unfinished and boyish, especially about the neck and shoulders. This was Mellicent's first and only impression. We talked it over, and speculated upon its oddity. Odd enough it was.

That night the two called. I was sitting beside the drawing-room door; Mellicent half-way down the apartment, in the centre. I got that side glance again; my cousin, I knew, was receiving the best impression. Suddenly I thought of the mirror at the extremity of the room, opposite the advancing guest. I glanced into it, and saw him going down toward my cousin, looking like a god. She received the new impression honestly and gladly, without prejudice—very gladly, for she adored beauty.

They sat together all the evening, in the best possible positions—vis-à-vis in an S chair—mutually pleased, I could see. He talked, mostly; she listened. He liked talking, and he did it well, remarkably well for so young a man. His soul shone loftily in his eyes—eyes like pansies—that splendid purple blue, always distinguishable from black at their deepest sparkle; always showing the pupils from the iris. His dark, glittering hair fell down over his brow like plumes; and through it the white forehead glimpsed; and below, the flower of the peach flushed his beardless cheeks.

Ellerslie and I watched them with interest. Ellerslie, though a bit of a dandy by blood and breeding, has a passion for studying character; so he was invaluable at such points, losing, perhaps, a little personal vanity of liking to be first man in the nobler quality of his nature.

"They are a match pair, aren't they?" I asked.

"No—yes."

"Which do you mean, Mr. Ellerslie?"

"Both. They look charmingly together; but they have some corresponding traits, one or two antagonisms."

"How you talk! they are as harmonious as a full major chord."

"Miss Sara, your cousin is not receptive; she is creative in the temper of her character. Well, Vaughn has what amounts to the same quality—not creative in the sense of genius, perhaps, but suggesting all its possibilities, by the rapid evolutions of his own remarkably active brain and ready intellect; at the same time he is an absorbent to the extent of his own requirements—there, I will not say any more. You will go and tell your cousin every word I have said now."

How indignantly I repudiated this sudden accusation any woman can understand; yet I dare say I should have told her, just as he said; but I felt on my honor now—a silly, self-conscious point of honor, for there would have been no harm in the telling; but this is not to the point. With my indignant denial I made him go on; and he wanted to—he liked to speculate. I took up the dropped thread—"his own requirements—how? explain."

"Why, you go and talk to him now for a while on any subject that interests you. He listens intently, warily, thinking wholly of the subject, not you, though you were the Venus de Medicis; picks up, one by one, every thread of your thought, of your knowledge, skeins it out after his own fashion, and by-and-by presents it from his own mind, tinted and textured by his brain process, yet at the same time unrecognizable to you, though it is yours. He has what would be called an available mind."

"Why, he's a perfect—"

"Hush! He's splendid—one of the least self-conscious persons in the world—splendid capabilities. You women jump at conclusions. There! I'm off in five minutes—see there"—he pointed to the little old Swiss clock over the door—eleven! "Vaughn never would go, I believe—has no conception of time proprieties—stays forever."

"And so exhausts the springs of enjoyment—bore people, in other words. I told you so."

"You are severe, Miss Sara. He must learn by experience; he is young."

"Always will be. It will take ages to teach that man any thing. Let me be oracular and Orphic now: he don't care so much for individuals as ideas; has more respect for what a man knows than what he is. I tell you he is a perfect—"

"Hush! again—I won't let you;" and over my lips came the ivory bars of my fan he had been holding.

"Come, Vaughn! do you know what time it is?"

Vaughn made a little impatient motion, looked ruefully at the clock, and rose, pointing his handsome young lips, and saying, energetically, just like a boy, "I hate Time!" It was so naïve we all laughed, and I liked him better.

We went to the hall-door with them to see the snow falling. Mellicent leaned out; the sill was icy, and she slipped. Before they could catch her she had swung round against the iron rail outside, breaking a fall with a wrench against the sharp post. Vaughn sprang to her; took hold of her hands.

"You have hurt yourself!"

"No, not much, I guess; only my side a little—oh! and my foot—I can't step!"

He took her up easily, and set her down in a hall chair.

"How will you get up stairs?" I blundered out, foolishly; but I was scared. She colored with shame, and said instantly, with a warning look at me to hold my peace,

"Why, Jarvie can take me, of course."

"I can take you just as easily, Miss Ware, if you will allow me," Vaughn said, gravely and innocently, as if it were a mere matter of strength.

I knew Jarvie was in bed an hour ago; Uncle Ben was out of town; and the boys, Sam and Chester—young fellows of fifteen and seventeen—gone sleighing; and, despite the warning look, I said so.

Off went Vaughn's cloak, down flung the cap, and he ejaculated this sentence:

"Of course, then, I shall take you. Don't be afraid! I am slender enough—not full-grown—but the strongest fellow at the Gymnasium. Frank can tell you. Pooh! your weight is nothing to me!"

This speech wasn't made for effect, you know; it was simple, straightforward directness; simplicity, innocence, ignorance!

I held my breath till he set her down just inside our chamber-door, as if she had been a kitten, nothing more; nodded, I couldn't speak, to his hearty good-night and the naïve question, Could he be of any further service? Then, when the hall-door shut on the two, and they were out of hearing, I sat down on the floor and laughed till I cried. So did Mellicent.

"Mell, he's splendid!" I exclaimed, at length. "What a boy man! His naïveté is irresistible!"

"Yes; and what a nice mess you made of it, Sara! I felt so embarrassed. You made him carry me."

"Well, he did it just as easy, Mell!"

She smothered a shriek of laughter, then started off again on the same topic, scolding me for my want of tact; when I said,

"You ought to thank me, Mell. I only wish it had been my ankle. Do be natural, child, and own it was charming!"

She colored fiercely, and kicked her little sandal slippers off, whereat she cried out in pain;

"Oh, my ankle, my ankle, Sara!"

It was swollen badly; a sprain, most certainly. "And your side?" It was lame, and some pain, but her ankle was the worst. I bathed it in arnica, put cold bandages on her side, and had the satisfaction of seeing her soundly asleep before I closed my eyes. The next morning she was quite bright; the sprain seemed doing well, there was no pain in her side—a trifling lameness, that was all. I was so relieved.

In the afternoon Lansing Vaughn called at the door. I heard him questioning Ann Mahoney, so I ran down. I saw he wanted to come in, and I asked him—actually took him up stairs into the little round tower room, where I had wheeled Mellicent—the room out of her chamber—a gem of a boudoir! There I left him, telling him to amuse my patient while I fed the canaries and attended to the score of troublesome little torments my cousin called her troubles. I had such a time with them that I forgot all about the guest I had introduced with such unparalleled freedom. Going into the boudoir two hours later, there he sat, comfortably settled in an easy-chair, talking, talking still. Mellicent was lovely; her cheeks were so red and her lips so bright. She enjoyed the tête-à-tête, though she opened her eyes at me for introducing him where only the oldest and most intimate friends were admitted.

"How came you?" she asked, after he had gone.

"Well, I don't know; it seemed the most natural thing in the world. He is so unconventional and easy."

"He is very unlike every body else, Sara; quite original and amusing—sort of inspiring, I think, in his fresh vigor."

This was the beginning of her acquaintance with Lansing Vaughn; this was the beginning of her malady—both on her eighteenth birthday. It seems singular, doesn't it? The sprained ankle got well—we thought her side had; but five or six weeks after this day she began to complain of a singular sensation there—the left side it was—neither a pain nor an ache; she described it as a feeling of exhaustion. Lansing was quite domesticated in the family by this time, and proved invaluable in many ways; would do any thing in the world for us; was so anxious and kind that I began to suspect the usual thing—that he was in love with my cousin. It was curiously demonstrated; quite "unlike other people," indeed. Coming and going at his own hours, unembarrassed and easy, he seemed as much like one of my cousins as Sam and Chester. And Mellicent—how was it with her? Quite the same. She spoke of him freely, laughed at his naïve speeches, and jested or scolded him as her mood or the circumstances prompted. The most amicable couple! One day she came into my room and told me coolly, almost carelessly, that they were engaged to each other—she and Lansing. I expected it, but was somehow surprised—at the way of announcement, I suppose. I remember my sudden, ridiculous question,

"Do you love him, Mell?"

She looked at me, and raised her eyebrows. "To be sure I do—think there's nobody like him."

"But you'll die of his V, you know," I returned, maliciously.

She laughed. "Oh, I can arrange that. I've discovered it's only the other half of a W. I've got used to my W in the Ware, child. So he's my other half, you see. Isn't that ingenious?"

After this he was with her almost constantly, our devoted attendant. His unvarying sweetness to Mellicent was the best of it; for as the weeks wore on her mysterious malady developed slowly, but surely, in a weak weariness of exhaustion, which extended over her whole system, and made her often unreasonable and petulant to him; but he met it all with his cheerful serenity, never giving her a retaliative word in the whole time. For my part, I used to rejoice at his coming—it seemed like opening the doors to a bracing northwest wind. The great splendid fellow roaming about in all the rooms, singing, and laughing, and talking, noisy and hearty!

I thought Mellicent very ungenerous to him one day when she said:

"I do wish you would keep still five minutes, Lansing. You don't seem to care a pin for my being ill. You are suspiciously happy on it, it appears to me!"

That, after all his devotion to her! He answered so sweetly:

"Why, I wouldn't pain you for the world, Mellicent. It is my way, you know. I am not insensible by any means, and you don't think so."

She lay quiet a few moments, then said, lowly: "I shall never marry you, Lansing—you shall not have a sick wife."

"Yes you will! I would rather have you sick than any other woman well. I must have you, any way. I will take splendid care of you, Mellicent."

I was in the other room, but I could see this touched her, as it must have any woman.

"Then it doesn't bore you, Lansing, to bear with my weakness?" she asked.

"Bore me? No, indeed; I like to care for you."

And he did care for her, day after day, week after week, ay, and month after month, as the fluctuations of this singular malady went on: no pains, but weariness, weakness, exhaustion, and a sharpened sensibility to all things; fluttering pulses at trifling causes; hard, muffled beatings of the heart. Was the disease located there? The wisest physicians shook their heads. All the various forms of medicine were tried—all uselessly. Then came travel. How I blessed the fate that gave us such a traveling companion as Lansing Vaughn—alert, and active, and full of hearty cheer. Florida's life-giving gales greeted us in his company; sweet airs from broad savannas swept over us; fresh winds from over mountains blew down to us; and salt sea breezes sent us messages of strength. But at the end of it all we found her dying—my splendid cousin dying! Mellicent Ware dying!

"Let us go home," she said at last; "every thing is all wrong; let us go home."

Home we went.

Lying stretched out one day upon the lounge in that little round tower room so redolent of old memories of health and happiness, she unfolded the new idea that had come to her to Lansing and I as we sat there beside her. Lansing was always there, you know—her shadow, the shadow of her former vigor.

She had been silent a long time, while he talked as usual. All at once, irrelevant to the topic entirely, she began:

"Sara, I have no faith in physicians. I am confident that I have never yet been visited by one who went beyond the mere physical indications. I have a dim perception—I can not explain it—that I am needing something, a new influence, not of climate or drugs—" Her voice dropped off wearily a moment; resuming, she held up a slim, transparent hand—

"Think of this high-strung temperament treated in the same manner as Jarvie's down stairs—Jarvie's slow, sluggish sense of living. That's the practice, you know. It's all wrong, Sara. I wish I knew the right; but I shall, I shall. Why do I talk? Next year at this time I shall know the whole secret. Do not wake me if I sleep;" and she dropped off drowsily, wearily again.

The sun was going down through seas of splendor—purple, and amber, and frost white; a ray stole through the blind-bars, and laid the tip of its fiery lance just athwart her head. Dying with that royal largess of life unsolved, and its loveliness lying like a crown upon her! What abundances of this royalty yet lay in her being! There is no death in that superb shimmer of hair, nor in the soft, dewless skin, nor in that slender symmetry of form that lies in solemn stillness there. Whence emanates this fever bloom, this weary-eyed exhaustion, this painless loss of strength?

I bent over her in a passion of regret, a defiant frenzy of love and bewilderment. Lansing met my eyes, glazed with tears, and just uttered softly but impatiently, in that same old way of boy impatience, "Don't, Sara!"

Hark! a far, far ring like a bell comes up. She moves, the lashes lift, and a look of listening gleams in the eyes. She is dreaming—she can not have heard. Fleet footsteps sound lightly up the stairs, gain the door; Chester's low undertone communicates a message: "Dr. Niles, just back from Arabia, down stairs; wants to see Mellicent. Ask her, will she see him?" Such a low, low, unlippered whisper outside the door, yet she overheard, and replied herself: "Yes, at once, Chester. I am so glad!"

He came in with effortless quiet, took my hand in passing, and sat down in the chair I had left in front of my cousin, putting his cool palm over her hot fingers.

"I am so glad you have come, so glad!" she said, smiling strangely.

"So am I, Mellicent," he answered naturally, with no surprise. "It is nearly two years to a day since I was here."

A pause ensued. I observed the new guest narrowly. I had met him once before, that was all. He might have been thirty or thirty-five; browned by Arabian suns, but coolly colored withal; bearded darkly and finely, but with no mustache to cover the most expressive mouth—firm and strong, but refined into marvelous lines of tenderness. Prophetic eyes of soft hazel, that kindly searched your soul.

"Did you know about me?" she asked him at length.

"Not until I saw your father down stairs."

"No one knows much, you know—any thing, in fact—only that I am losing, losing, every day—dying, I suppose," she said, quite tranquilly.

Lansing came out of the bay window with a ruffled brow and troubled lips. I could imagine the deprecating "Don't, Mellicent!" I mentioned his name to Dr. Niles. The soft prophetic eyes dwelt earnestly on the handsome young face while he passed some pleasant commonplaces with him, then went back to Mellicent. All the time he had been holding his hand over hers; now he removed it to her head, laid it lightly down where the sunshine lay. Her weary eyelids drooped at the touch, and the sweet face resolved into unsleeping calm. Then he talked in his effortless way, and the voice was like a spell, sonorous and soothing, completely under control, like the whole man.

Lansing came round and took possession of a little chair as close as he could get, right under the powerful mesmeric hazel eyes—sat there and talked with all his old eager relish, but in more subdued tones.

After a while Dr. Niles got up. "We are wearying Miss Mellicent," he said, "with all this talk."

"Oh no, she likes it!" was Lansing's eager response.

"Does she?" Dr. Niles asked, looking into the large-lidded eyes, now upraised.

She answered "Yes," very decidedly.

"But it tires you, nevertheless; it exhales your strength. Mellicent, do you put yourself under my care now?"

"Oh yes, yes!" quite eagerly.

"You will obey me completely?"

"Completely."

"Well, I have only one thing to say to-night—you must not listen to so much talking and reading. They read to you, don't they?" indicating Vaughn and I with a bend of his head.

"Yes."

I was in amaze. How did he guess it? She was never without the one or the other—the conversation or the reading—she would not be.

"There, that is all now. Good-night! I will see you to-morrow;" and he went out.

To-morrow came. The same sunset splendor again, and at the same hour Dr. Niles. Mellicent on the lounge, expectant and flushed; Vaughn and I near by.

Vaughn had been singing a succession of exquisite old songs at her request. He had such a free, melodious voice, and it rolled richly down the stirring strains in a way that made my pulses thrill as if I were listening to martial music. I watched him with pleasure, he looked so handsome; so splendidly-limbed; no angularities—a symmetrical line, arrowy straight, from his Greek head down to the Spanish foot. Such color, too! the flower of the peach; or, better, the ripened fruit, sun-softened, and touched with cool red. The purple pansy eyes radiated with northern lights, calm and clear; the full, perfect lips took beautiful shapes, showing sometimes a pearly line between. Suddenly my gaze wandered to Mellicent. She was lost in the contemplation of him; her cheeks spotted with scarlet, her eyes aflame with what looked to me like an ecstatic state of enjoyment. It was then I first noticed Dr. Niles; he was standing in the door-way, and held up his finger to me for a sign of silence, which I obeyed, watching him covertly. I saw him take Vaughn's superb picture into his soul; then, with a new expression, receive my cousin's. He was studying deeply: I knew that, and my faith in him began to grow into that entire belief of his infallibility which has since taken thorough possession of me. The song ending, he came forward immediately, sitting down before her, and dropping his cool, cool hand over hers, burning and dry. She gave a great start at first, as one gives in coming out of a vivid dreamful sleep. The blood all went out of her cheeks, her eyes lost their light a moment, and her lips quivered down from their mournful curves. I was frightened, and evinced it; I thought it would injure her. He shook his head at me, answering my unspoken thought; and presently I saw how wise he was—not completely then, but partially, enough to trust him further—for presently a smile broke into bloom on her face, and color and light came back, and she grasped the hand that covered hers with a certain gladness that surprised me, and—shall I say it?—troubled me a little. I was meanly worldly and conventional enough then to think he might misunderstand her—he, with his perfect self-abnegation and proud humility.

He staid an hour, sometimes talking a little, oftener silent; always holding her hand, which she clung to like a refuge, and grew into a peaceful calm before he left her. When he went he took Lansing with him—wanted him to show him where somebody's office was—and they went out together, both bidding a final good-night.

Gradually he got to coming in at any time—three or four times, perhaps, a day. Once, not a week after his admonition concerning the conversations, we forgot all about it. I must tell this instance carefully; it opened my eyes a little—it may yours. Vaughn brought in a little Parian figure—one of the Apostles, I believe—and Mellicent roused up into animation over it. She knew something of sculpture—he little or nothing; and, in his eager way, he questioned and suggested till, all at once, that conversation I had with Ellerslie two years ago about him flashed up. I was, somehow, uneasy; and I know I wondered at his seeming knowledge, at his splendid suggestions, which were better than knowledge itself. I looked at Mellicent. She had got through talking, and was sinking back, scarlet with excitement, and weary-eyed as ever. I sprang forward to arrange her cushions, but somebody else was there—Dr. Niles! when did he enter? Mellicent uttered a little cry; he bent over her; she burst into a passionate sob of tears, and dropped her head in nervous abandonment against his breast. I was blind enough, foolish enough, to feel a sensation of trouble again—I, who pretended to be so natural!—for, with that instantaneous reasoning which comes at such points, I thought, "He is young enough and fine enough to awaken love, and to know it himself;" and I remember I felt glad that Vaughn had run down at Chester's call just before. I was ashamed when I looked again—ashamed of myself. He just held her there quietly; the lines of tenderness about his mouth deepened into the solemnest pity. She fell asleep so; and then he laid her down, and went out of the house with this charge to me: "Keep Vaughn away from her; not entirely, but so much: she must not talk in that style, nor be talked to; she doesn't want singing either, nor reading—you can manage it."

He gave her no medicine. When I remarked it, he only said, "I am studying the case; she will not suffer for it."

The days went by—still summer days—and brought us into autumn, with a change, slight but positive, in this mysterious malady. "Was it a breaking of the spell, or only a new form of the disease?" I asked myself, fearfully. There was less of the weary, feverish unquiet—more restful calm. What did it bode?

One night—how well do I remember it!—the 10th of October, I was sitting alone down stairs in the drawing-room, perplexing myself about this very point, when some one came in (it was dusk twilight there)—I could not see whom—came in and shut the door quietly behind them. Lansing—it was not him; he never came unheralded by sound of voice or step like this. A voice spoke my name:

"Miss Sara!"

"Dr. Niles!"

He came and sat down by me.

"Are you quite alone?" was the next thing he said.

"Quite." And I wondered—not long.

"Sara," he began, dropping all title in his earnestness, "have you the faintest fancy what is killing your cousin?"

A slow shiver ran through me. I bent over to look in his face—it was impenetrable; the dim shadows that had spun their misty cobwebs in my brain began to take form and coloring. He was waiting for me to speak. I uttered a confused jargon of words—mere words, it seemed to me—in trying to present my intangible thought. My head was dizzy, my pulse beating in sharp strokes. But he understood; and then his clear, subtle mind revealed itself to me. He translated my dim, vague conception; he gave me the wonderful analysis of his close study, and unfolded to me, for the first time, a delicate marvel. I knew now what was killing my cousin. Do you remember Frank Ellerslie's words to me that night when we talked of Lansing Vaughn: "He is an absorbent to the extent of his own requirements?" Do you remember Mellicent's playful assertion, "I should die of his V?" Prophetic words! She was literally dying of Lansing Vaughn. I can not render into terms Dr. Niles's fine exquisiteness of detail in this explanation; I can only give you bare facts, which are, after all, too aglow with spiritual fire to be meagre. Dying of Lansing Vaughn! Do we not all of us remember presences that exhausted us, that left us charmed but drained for a while—a certain sense of confusion in mind—an excited weariness that kept us waking half the night. Some of us, perhaps, understand this complex simplicity of organism; I do now—I did not then. I thought these two in perfect harmony, because they were moulded of Nature's choicest clay—because their souls kindled at the same subjects, at all lofty themes—because they were young and splendid, and full of genius. They were more than the octave apart for all—separate tones not to be touched together—and yet too like and too unlike for unison. Here is the jar: their physical temperaments were much the same, but his, strung with man's physical power—a strength always beyond a woman's—outbalanced hers. In his mental, as Ellerslie said, how truly! Vaughn was an absorbent. How subtly, then, upon her peculiarly sympathetic nature this eager, craving spirit fed! How, as under their mistaken relations they knit closer together, the more delicate nature was drained of its aura. Mutually enamored by the youth and splendor of each, they imagined but one result. They belonged together; but in this appropriation lurked a death.

As I said, Dr. Niles explained all this to me with an exquisiteness of detail which I can not command. Enough that I am understood.

After the first flush of feeling passed, I asked, "But how shall we adjust it all? She must die, any way. We can not keep her now, for she loves him."

"No, you are mistaken; so are they. They admire each other—that was the first bond; they love each other with the love of brothers and sisters—nothing more, I do assure you. Time will prove me right. To gain this you shall aid me. There is a quiet family mansion down in Haydon Valley, just a ten miles' ride from here, where I propose that you and she shall visit these lingering autumn days. Lansing, assured that she is rallying, has accepted the post your uncle has been urging upon him; he goes to Washington next week."

"Visit! Who is at Haydon for us to visit?" I inquired.

He turned on me a look of slow surprise.

"Why, my mother and my wife. It is my home, you know."

"Your wife!"

In this great start of amazement I think he read the revelations of my mind—all my thoughts concerning him for the past few weeks. He smiled down upon me, and just said,

"My child, did you think me too old, or too young, to be married? I am nearer forty than you know."

And the smile dropped away into easy gravity.

I asked a hundred questions. One:

"What led you here that night last summer?"

"You may well ask, Sara. I have, often. I think it was God's providence. I had but just come in town from Haydon that night—was sitting absorbed in Roger's book on Things Spiritual and Mundane—when all at once some vivid remembrance of your uncle came over me. In old recollections my reading lost interest; I put it away, got up, and went out; came to this door. Mr. Chester and I were old friends. In the library we sat and talked, and there he told me of his daughter—wished I would go up and see her—take her under my charge, indeed. He remembered I used to have great mesmeric power; would I try and give her some rest from it? So I went up, as you know; and the rest you know also."

It was so, so strange, all of it! I wondered did Mellicent know that he was married. I would find a way to ask him. I thought I was so adroit when I said,

"Did Mellicent know you—better than I?"

"She knew I was married, Sara"—dropping down upon me that cool gaze—"my wife is her second—no, third cousin; not on your side—on her mother's."

It all broke upon me now. Pauline Delancy—I had forgotten her; forgotten she married Dr. Niles. I remembered a good, friendly person, years ago it seemed to me, whom Mellicent used to go and see, after her mother died. In my memory she stood a plain, brown fact; there was no radiance of beauty or romance about her—and she was Dr. Niles's wife. I knew now what that meant. Dr. Niles—significant of all fineness, and strength, and power! Well, we went to the family mansion, Mellicent and I, and there I found her—Pauline Delancy, Mrs. Niles—a plain, brown fact, indeed, with no radiance of romance or beauty, it is true, but with a halo of kind tenderness all about her. We girls loved her dearly; but I wondered how he came to marry her—our Dr. Niles.

It was marvelous to watch the sure revival of our flower, of Mellicent Ware, in the atmosphere of this quiet home. Slowly but surely the delicate marvel was being wrought. In all this no word of the cause had been spoken to Mellicent.

"Let her alone," he said. "I am much mistaken if she does not comprehend it fully, and better without our suggestion. There will then be no shock to her soul."

We were sitting one afternoon, talking animatedly together—Dr. Niles, Mrs. Niles, Mellicent, and I—talking about hasheesh-eating, De Quincey and his opium frenzy, psychology, biology, mesmerism, and all the marvelous train-of-philosophies—when my ear was aroused by a vigorous stamping on the door-step—some one throwing off the first light snow that had been falling. It was so like—could it be? I glanced at Mellicent; she was listening to Dr. Niles; not a nerve thrilled to any thing outside—he held her. There was a momentary wandering of the Doctor's eye—of his mind. He was cognizant of that step; and as he loosed her attention, she, too, became aware.

The ponderous knocker sounded, the door opened, and that full, persistent voice, unlike any other, rang in to us.

Oh, Lansing Vaughn! How glad he was—and we, too! Who could be any thing else, in sight of that youthful splendor? The flower of the peach, the purple pansy eyes, the perfect-limbed young god!

"And you are all right again, Mellicent? I knew you'd be."

And he swung his hat round with a little triumphant halloo.

"Off on a furlough!" he exclaimed; "so I ran down here."

Three days he staid, monopolizing my cousin utterly, and Dr. Niles looked on without a word, without a gesture of disapproval. Did he think her strong enough so soon to risk that absorbing presence, day and evening, every hour? I was amazed. By-and-by I understood.

Three days—then in the first jingle of sleigh-bells the bright young fellow went. That night Mellicent came and laid her head down in my lap,

"Sara, I am tired to death." Her hands were dry and hot, her head throbbing. "And, Sara, I know why."

He was right, that wise Dr. Niles. She comprehended, without a suggestion, every shade of the matter. Her intuitions, sharpened by the nervous tension, were clear as a spirit's. Long we sat and talked, and what had seemed so hard a thing to adjust became plainer and simpler as we approached it. Now I knew why our host looked on through the three days so calmly. In that time he knew that she would find the key; and he was right again. The reaction of his presence, after the peaceful days of returning strength, had opened the last door of conviction upon her mind. It needed but one conversation, full and entire, with Dr. Niles to complete her resolve. And the end came, not of affection and friendship, but of that mistaken relation. It was curious the way he took it—Lansing Vaughn. Unconvinced at first, he attempted argument—said we were certainly moon-struck, every one of us; and, finally, went away without a word, but with a lowering brow. Finding her decided, he behaved like a gentleman, gave up the thought of marriage, and returned to Washington again, where he straightway flung himself into society, and became the centre of a small but fine circle of conversationists. Before the winter was over he had formed a close friendship with Miss R—, a woman of wide culture and great strength of mind and purpose, withal not wanting in feminine softness. When I met him there one evening I saw how it was—the threads of habit were taken up again. He did not fancy himself in love with Miss R—, but he had found another orbit to swing in; he had found mental food—a personal presence wherein he was at home. There leave him; and to return. Back again to her harmonies of health and strength went Mellicent Ware; but with the light of a wonderful experience transfiguring her loveliness into a soft splendor that outshone her first rosy bloom, as the tender moon-rays transcend the glare of day.

The next summer Dr. Niles suddenly announced his departure for the East again. Why was he so restless? I wondered. Had he no power of rest for himself, who gave so much to others? Did he lose, I marveled, in this giving? Did he? I asked him the question. He dropped his cool gaze down upon me; it was colder than a glacier, I thought, for a moment. Then he answered quietly, a little wearily,

"No, I do not lose in giving; but I am not 'well here.'"

So he went. I cried, and kissed him goodbye; but Mellicent only shook hands with him very gravely, and wished him a safe journey. Mrs. Pauline did better than either of us. She packed his trunks, and attended to all the little bother of preparation, making no fuss of tears or kissing, but bidding him be careful of himself—which counsel he returned warmly, adding, that she always thought of that for others more than herself. Then he turned—he was just going to the carriage, I remember—put his hat down, and held her a moment to his side, saying, tenderly,

"Good-by, my dear, kind Pauline; if any thing should happen—my papers you know are in the inner drawer of the cabinet—all goes to you and mother."

I never forgot this somehow.

Oh, he was always good and true!

"If any thing should happen:" we all thought of but one thing to happen—that he might die; but something else happened, something so unlooked for I could not realize it for a long time. Death came, it is true, but not to him in Eastern lands, beneath the palm-tree and the tent; it stole softly in one day to a low bright room, whose west windows overlooked a green valley, and laid its finger of silence on the good, kind wife. Something had happened indeed—Pauline Delancy, Mrs. Niles was dead!

A year went by, Dr. Niles yet wandering in the East; he would not come back soon now, they said, Haydon would be so lonely without Pauline. A year and a half—would he never come?

"Yes, I know he will," Mellicent answered briefly, at my ejaculation. We were sitting in the little tower room that day, so like another day I remembered, and it was at sunset; purple and amber and frost white were the clouds, and Mellicent was lying upon the low lounge, with the sun's rays shining on her hair of gold. All at once she starts up.

"Did you hear, Sara?"

"What?"

"A footstep, Sara!—his—Dr. Niles—don't laugh at me, dear. There!" Still I heard nothing; how should I? it was for her.

But presently to my ears came that far, far ring of a bell.

She made three paces through the room, a pale pink flush suffused her skin, and a new look shot into her eyes.

"Sara, he is coming!" There was a quick hurrying tread, up the stairs it sounded. He had come! I was somehow the first to greet him, and my greeting was the same as my good-by; I cried and kissed him. He let me go, and turned to her. "Mellicent!" They regarded each other a moment, then he opened his arms. "Mellicent!" She lay upon his breast. She had found her rest—so had he. They belonged together, that is all. The world slides away, here is heaven at last! God rest us all!

MY UNCLE.

"MY Uncle" is a cosmopolitan. As has been observed by Mr. Dickens in the Household Words, he is an extremely useful member of society; but as has not been observed by Mr. Dickens, he is also an extremely ancient avuncular relative; and as most relatives of that class have histories of one kind or another, it is not to be supposed that some record of his life is not extant. Therefore, in looking up the facts concerning "My Uncle's" birth and pedigree, I am convinced that I shall perform an interesting and agreeable duty, and shall find ample assistance in the pages of chronology and family biography.

Every body knows who "My Uncle" is at present; if not, I will refer them to the article "Up the Spout" in Harper's, for October, 1859, where they will be enabled to satisfy themselves as to his present existence, and the part he plays in the Musque of life.

One gloomy day, in the year of grace, 14—, the City of Padua, in the States of Lombardo-Venetia, lay within its stone walls and its seven gates, while the traffic in the market-place went on with the busy hum and noise common among the money-making Jews of that respectable city on market-day. Times were hard in Padua, as indeed they were through all Italy, and the unhappy citizens were nearly all engaged in discounting, renewing, coaxing, beating down, and reviling the Hebrew money-changers in every idiom known to their fluent tongues and rich language. It was noon, and business was at its height, when a sudden excitement seemed to sway the crowd on the Prato, and immediately thereafter a loud voice was heard as the speaker approached the money-changers, whose tones betokened excitement of no light character.

The figure of a Minorite friar, in the quaint garb of his order, gesticulating and haranguing the populace at high noon on a market-day, was no common sight to the Paduans, and for a moment their woes were forgotten as they turned to listen to the barefooted Padre. By the tumult that preceded and followed him it was soon discovered that his remarks were calculated to discompose the busy Jews, and their effect was soon observed. At the highest pitch of his voice, Francisco di Viterbo called down anathemas upon the heads of the usurers and the brokers of the day. Characterizing them as grinders of the poor and robbers of the widow and the orphan, he prayed the wealthy merchants who listened to him, to lend their efforts to further a scheme he had thought upon to save these poor wretches about him from misery and starvation. The scheme was only that the rich should lend gratuitously to the poor on pledges or pawns, and so relieve their wants without risk or sacrifice, and at the same time suppress the accursed Jews, who, like vampires, fluttered about the city sucking the life-blood of the needy.

The friar was listened to with attention, and, what was more, he was heard with satisfaction. On that day "My Uncle" was born.

I do not wish to have it imagined that there was never any thing pawned before the Minorite friar thought upon his pawnbrokerage establishment. Because I know very well that the same institution, modified, however, according to the differing manners and customs of different nations and periods, had existed centuries before. But the modern pawnbroker's shop, the home of "My Uncle," owes its existence to the preaching of that barefooted friar on the Prato of Padua.

Now, as may be supposed, the Jews were not going to give up their usurious practices without a struggle, and also, as in the case of every good and great discovery or invention, the poor people, whom it was calculated to benefit, fought against the new system and their own interests as tenaciously as any body. The different church-orders arrayed themselves for and against the money-lenders, as their tastes or interests inclined them; the Dominicans against them, the Franciscans for them—indeed, the Franciscans were themselves, in many instances, money-lenders, and more usurious than the Jews. So they preached through the country, until the Pope issued a Bull, charging every one to refrain from upholding the money-lenders, and attacking the new institution on pain of excommunication: and then the excitement subsided.

Pawnbroking shops were soon established in all the large towns in Italy; Assisi, Mantua, Parma, Naples, and Rome, counted them among their business marts; then they spread into other countries, and Germany, France, and Russia adopted them. These establishments were known under the titles of "Lombard Houses," "Mons Pietatis," "Mons de Piété," "Banco di Roveré," "Exchange Banks," etc. In Rome, Gregory VIII. established a bank of deposit for widows and orphans, whose deposits were guaranteed by a lien on the goods of the bank. Sextus V. added to this permission to deposit goods and articles of any value, and of every description. Soon this establishment—a combination of two ideas—reached a height of wealth and splendor unexampled in the history of banking, and was frequently enabled to loan immense sums to states and sovereigns. In Turin the Jews held the money power, and 80 per cent. was common interest among them. In 1519 a Mont de Piété was established here, and, as every where else, with the happiest results. But as they charged no interest their capital was soon exhausted, and they were obliged to close; the "Compagnie de St. Paul," however, came to their rescue, and by establishing it on a new basis, charging 2 per cent. interest to pay expenses, the institution flourished with renewed vigor, and was soon enabled to make loans without interest as before. This establishment lasted until near the end of the last century, when it disappeared in the midst of the political convulsions of that period. It was, however, again reopened in 1822. The "Mont" of Milan is a union of thirty-six private establishments, and is one of the largest in Italy; it is now nearly four hundred years old. It was, like the others, affected by the various political catastrophes of the country, and at one time disappeared entirely. In 1833 its capital was 671,000 Austrian livres, its charge for interest being 6 per cent. In 1830 it made 86,126 loans, on pawns valued at 1,137,000 livres, on which they loaned about three-fourths of the valuation. Among the earlier establishments in Italy was one at Cremona for lending corn at interest; it was called "Mons frumenti pietatis."

The custom of charging interest, which has obtained among "Mons de Piété" ever since, was licensed in 1515, when the Lateran Council in Rome decided that these banks could lawfully charge sufficient interest to pay expenses. At Rome the charge was about 6½ per cent. per annum; this rate has been greatly increased, however, and at present the charges vary in different countries and cities. In Holland the interest has been as high as 56 per cent., in Ireland 25 per cent.; France about 15 per cent.; in America the charge is usually 25 per cent.; and in England 20 per cent. per annum. In Italy the charges for interest are much less than in other countries, varying between 4 and 6 per cent., while small loans are there made gratuitously. When Napoleon entered Italy, in 1796, he plundered the "Mons de Piété" of their treasures, consisting in many instances of valuable plate and diamonds. The charge of the "Mons de Piété" in Italy, is, in most instances, placed in the hands of distinguished individuals, who count it an honor to be thus employed, and who do their work without requiring any reward; the expenses being thus very small, they are enabled to keep the interest down to a very low per centage.

"Monts de Piété" were established in Paris under Louis XIII. in 1726, and at Marseilles in 1695. This institution in Paris has become a type of the class, and at present is probably the largest in the world. The rate of interest charged is 9 per cent.; it employs a capital of from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000, and usually has between 600,000 and 700,000 articles in its possession. The revenue of this immense establishment is about $250,000 per annum, with an expenditure for expenses of $90,000. The money loaned by this "Mont" has been calculated to be equivalent to 80 francs per annum to every family in Paris. Although the Paris "Mont" commenced its existence under Louis XIII. it met with little success, and soon failed. In 1769 Turgot made an effort to establish it, but it was not until 1777, under Necker's administration, that letters patent were obtained. During the Revolution its functions were suspended, but revived in 1804. The building of the "Mont" was erected in 1786, in the Rue des Blancs Manteaux, No. 18; it was destroyed during the Revolution, and rebuilt. The present building is very extensive, having occupied five years in building. Five years after the original establishment of the "Mont," there were no less than 40,000 watches alone in its vaults; indeed it sometimes possesses as many as forty casks of gold watches.

There are altogether forty-five "Monts de Piété" in France, the one in Paris doing a larger business than all the others; those of Lyons and Marseilles are rated next in extent. In Paris the city is divided into districts, in each of which is an agent of the principal establishment, who facilitates the business, which would be overcrowded if all visited the same building. Six per cent. of the charges for interest go to the stockholders; the balance, after deducting expenses, is divided among the poor.

A "Mont de Piété" was established at Copenhagen, in Denmark, in 1688, and flourished in private hands until 1753, when it was purchased by the Naval Hospital for 6000 Rix bank dollars—about $3000. The rate of interest throughout Scandinavia was from 9 to 12 per cent.

The first "Monté Pio" in Spain was opened at Madrid in 1703; and in 1778 an attempt was made to place it in the hands of the Government. At the "Monté" in Valencia farmers are supplied with money to purchase feed, and are charged no interest; fishermen are also supplied with boats and nets. At this "Monté," as well as in those of Malaga and Galicia, the capital arises from vacant benefices, termed Eapólios y vacantes.

The two Russian "Monts de Piété" were established in September, 1772, "to put an end to the devouring cupidity of the usurers, by offering prompt assistance to those who are so unfortunate as to be suddenly thrown into need." The income from these "Monts," over the expenses, goes to aid in supporting the "Hospice des enfants trouvées," which has ever been an object of fostering care on the part of the Russian Government. The rate of interest in Russia was six per cent., but increased to twelve per cent; at present the borrower pays only legal interest. During the first twenty years of its existence the St. Petersburg "Mont" paid a net profit of 500,000 rubles (about the same number of dollars). During this period, and until six years later, the average value of the articles deposited was from $30 to $100 each; but from 1830 the value increased largely, showing the "Mont" to have been used more extensively by the nobility and gentry than by the more indigent. But in that country the nobleman does not consider it any greater disgrace to apply for assistance to the "Mont" than we do to ask for aid at a bank: without hesitation, he will drive with his stately equipage to the door of the "Lombard" and deposit his plate, worth perhaps thousands of rubles. Frequently, in the absence of families from Moscow, they will deposit their plate at the "Mont" merely for the security afforded them. In 1813, when Napoleon marched on Moscow, the amount loaned by the "Mont" exceeded five times the usual average. In 1817 the St. Petersburg "Mont" lost, by a "breach of trust," over one million of dollars. The profit to the "Mont," in 1813, amounted to more than $300,000.

I have thus glanced at the more prominent establishments of this class in Europe, and come now to those of the British Islands.

Now, as long as "My Uncle" had remained upon the Continent, he had continued to retain some quantity of charity in his composition, and had indeed performed many benevolent acts; but he grew old and miserly, and, unhappily for his reputation, he left the genial climate of his native land, and traveling northward, crossed over to England. The result of this change was that he lost his character, and became known by the title of "pawnbroker." Whether this is to be attributed to the climate or the people I can not say; but although the old, sacred institution of the Mont de Piété has often been attempted in these countries it has always been without success, except in a single instance. Mr. Barrington, after visiting the principal European establishments of the kind, established one in Limerick, in 1837, which assisted, in a great degree, to relieve the sufferings and embarrassments of that unhappy period.

It is not known when the Jews first entered into England. Traces of them have been discovered, showing that they were there before the Norman Conquest; and under several reigns they continued to be so useful to the Court that various benefits were conferred upon them, greatly to the dissatisfaction of the people. William II. refused to allow them to become converts to Christianity, fearing that, with their religion, they might perchance lose their capacity for money-getting, and thus their ability to serve the crown. It is curious, however, that, until the reign of Henry II., they were only allowed to bury their dead in the city of London. The popular feeling against them continued to increase; and in the time of Richard "Cœur de Lion," as the readers of Walter Scott will remember, an outbreak occurred and a public demonstration was made against them, which, for a time, threatened their extermination. From this period they became the recipients of similar acts on the part of the populace, and Henry III. sold all the Jews in his realm to his brother for 5000 merks. In the following reign all the Jews in the kingdom were expelled, and upward of 15,000 were deprived of their possessions and forced to flee the country.

"My Uncle," as near as I can learn from family documents in the possession of his descendants, made his first appearance in the British Islands about the sixteenth century. Leaving the province of Lombardy, where he had dwelt for some time previously, he passed through Central Europe, and journeying northward, took a steamer of the period at Calais or Marseilles for London. His reputation had preceded him, but unfortunately had been so warped in the transit, that he was looked upon only as a Lombard, which was polite for a usurer and a thief. "My Uncle," undaunted by the cold reception which he met, set up his little establishment in a street in London, which was immediately and ever after known as Lombard Street. In order to prevent all mistakes, he placed over his door the arms of his family—viz., three golden balls. There is, perhaps, no instance of a similar amount of doubt and discussion having ever been caused by a street-sign as was created by this act of "My Uncle." From the family papers to which I have before alluded I have been enabled to procure a statement of the facts of the case, which, I trust, will set the question at rest for the future. "My Uncle" belonged to the wealthy and important family of the Medici, who obtained their name from their profession, which was originally that of druggists, apothecaries, or doctors. To enable the seeker after cure to discover at a glance the character of their business, they hung over their door a sign on which was painted three golden pills.

In after years, when the family had become prosperous—when the Medici were alike celebrated in all Europe for wealth and public spirit—when the finest galleries of paintings and statuary were theirs, and painters and sculptors owed their position and prosperity to the fostering care and patronage of this noble house—there was then conferred upon them the right to bear as arms the golden pills of their ancestors. The Medici became great bankers; and when "My Uncle" traveled so far to extend the business of the house, what was more proper than that he should distinguish himself by the arms of the family? But various tales have been told, and various erroneous and disgraceful deductions drawn, concerning these three unhappy golden spheres. Thus it has been said they signified that it was two to one against the borrower, possibly reasoning from the fact.

Then it is stated that from the "tres boules d'or" the Troubadours obtained their poetic appellation—a philological statement in which I have little faith. But I can not refrain from giving a legend, which seems so beautiful that I could almost wish, for the sake of "My Uncle," that it were true. Thus it runs:

"Now in that city (Panthera, in the province of Lycia, in Asia Minor) there dwelt a certain nobleman, who had three daughters; and, from being very rich, he became poor—so poor, that there remained no means of obtaining food for his daughters but by sacrificing them to an infamous life; and oftentimes it came into his mind to tell them so, but shame and sorrow held him dumb.

"Meantime the maidens wept continually, not knowing what to do, and not having bread to eat; and their father became more and more desperate. When (St.) Nicholas heard of this, he thought it shame that such a thing should happen in a Christian land; therefore, one night when the maidens were asleep, and their father alone sat watching and weeping, he took a handful of gold, and tying it up in a handkerchief, he repaired to the dwelling of the poor man. He considered how he might bestow it without making himself known; and while he stood irresolute, the moon, coming from behind a cloud, showed him a window open; so he threw it in, and it fell at the feet of the father, who, when he found it, returned thanks, and with it he portioned his eldest daughter.

"A second time Nicholas provided a similar sum, and again he threw it in by night; and with it the nobleman married his second daughter. But he greatly desired to know who it was that came to his aid; therefore he determined to watch; and when the good Saint came, for the third time, and prepared to throw in the third portion, he was discovered, for the nobleman seized him by the skirt of his robe, and flung himself at his feet, saying, 'Oh, Nicholas, servant of God! why seek to hide thyself?' And he kissed his feet and his hand. But Nicholas made him promise that he would tell no man. And many other charitable works did Nicholas perform in his native city.

"These three purses of gold, or, as they are more customarily figured, these three golden balls, disposed in exact pawnbroker fashion, are to this day the recognized special emblem of the charitable St. Anthony."

Now "the bearings of this observation lays in the application on it;" and it is not in the least improbable that the monks who first established the charitable "Monts de Piété" should have taken for a sign the emblem of St. Nicholas of charitable memory. However, as this is only a family tradition, I am not prepared to accept it, but rather lean toward the more worldly theory of the arms of the Medici.

So the establishment of "My Uncle" in Lombard Street grew and flourished, and became rich and important, until many other similar establishments were opened in different parts of London and the rest of England; so that in 1842 there were no less than 383 pawnbrokers in London, 1804 in the rest of England and Wales, and 133 in Scotland. From the licenses of these pawnbrokers the Government received some $80,000 annually.

The first establishment of this kind in Scotland was started in 1806, but lasted only six months. Another was established in 1813, and since that time they have formed a necessary part of the social economy of the country.

This system of pawnbroking early found its way to America, and has become an institution with us. At present there are about fifty pawnbrokers' establishments in the city of New York, all properly licensed, besides many which are not licensed. It is gratifying to learn that, in proportion to the population, the business done among our pawnbrokers is far less than that of England or other countries. In 1824 an attempt was made to establish a "Mont de Piété" in New York, under the title of the "New York Lombard Association," with a capital of $200,000. Its charter fixed the rate of interest at 15 per cent. on all sums under $50; 12½ per cent. between $50 and $100; and 8 per cent. on all transactions over $200. This establishment continued in existence until 1836, when its affairs were wound up, as it was found that the business would not pay the stockholders.

As I have in a previous article exhibited the internal working of our pawnbrokers' shops, I will now leave the United States, and, traveling rapidly westward, will refer briefly to the same institution in the Far East.

How "My Uncle" ever chanced to go to China I can not discover, or when; but as we find traces of almost every ancient or modern discovery or invention in the strange land of the Celestials, it is not wonderful that we should there find the pawnbroker.

From an intelligent young Chinaman, rejoicing under the name of KI-YUNG, I learn that pawnbroking is considered in China to be as respectable as any other trade or calling. The brokers are generally a high class of merchants, having great wealth, and are generally respected. The sign "tong" answers the purpose of the three balls, and is generally to be found over a spacious and elegant mansion, seeming to be a dwelling-house. The money of the country, consisting of cash, vuns, zes, and bangs, may be reckoned at  $\frac{1}{12}$  of a cent to the cash, 7 cash to the vun, 70 to the zes, and 700 to the bang, increasing in a ratio of one to ten. In pawning an article there usually occurs a little argument between the pawnier and the clerk as to its value—the clerk depreciating as the owner elevates. One-half the present value of the article is usually loaned upon it.

All articles are redeemable within three years, paying interest at the rate of twelve per cent. During the winter months the rate of interest is reduced, as the amount of pawning is much greater at that season.

Besides the licensed pawnbrokers there are others who charge ten per cent. per month interest, and if not redeemed sell the pawn at the end of three months.

At Shanghai the pawnbrokers' shops are the largest buildings in the city; they seem like old castles, having walls thirty or forty feet high. After a great inundation in Canton the Government levied on each pawnbroker in the city (about 830) to relieve the sufferings of the unfortunate.

These establishments are extremely plenty in China; one meets them at almost every turn; and as they are usually very wealthy, they are the especial favorites of the banditti, who plunder them without mercy whenever an opportunity offers.

Not one pledge in ten in China is ever redeemed. The laws in relation to pawnbroking are very strict; but by bribing the government officials the brokers manage to escape the penalties. A traveler states that, in a large establishment at Ningpo, he found a bell, and an idol of the Goddess of Mercy, made of bronze and ten inches high. They had been pawned by a neighboring Buddhist nunnery, and the pawnbroker offered to sell the idol for two dollars and a half. As the Chinese place no confidence in word or bond, they will only lend money on pledge, and the business thus done is therefore enormous.

In Siam, the custom in pawnbroking is different from that of any other country: thus, if the lender receives as a pledge a productive article, as cattle, carts, or other articles which may be rendered remunerative, he is not allowed to charge interest; but the usual method is to pledge the person and property of the borrower. If the sovereign lends money from the treasury, he is entitled to charge seventy-five per cent. interest; while private individuals can charge half that sum. When the interest amounts to the sum lent it ceases, unless a new agreement be made.

In Hindostan, the pawnbrokers lend principally to the farmers, taking grain in pledge; they sometimes have capital to the extent of four or five lacs of rupees.

In Morocco the Jews have the lending business in their hands, and loan on pledges at the rate of about forty per cent per annum.

Having thus glanced at the pawnbroking institution throughout the world; having traced "My Uncle" from Rome to London, and from New York to Siam—I will close this bit of family history with a few lines descriptive of the popular idea of "My Uncle," assuring the public that it is an entirely erroneous one, and founded upon a mistaken view of his acts. "The money-lender," says Douglas Jerrold, "moves stealthily as an ague: as though haunted by the memory of a thousand acts that have written him down in the private memoranda of Lucifer. Had he lived in Spain, he would have made an excellent familiar of the Inquisition; he would with demoniacal complacency have applied the thumb-screw, the burning pincers, and the molten lead. Born in England, bred an attorney, and adding to his professional cares the anxieties of money-lender, he is yet enabled to satisfy his natural and acquired lust of evil, and he therefore gets up costs. He has never stood at the bar of a police-office, and yet his hands are dyed with the blood of broken hearts."

STORY OF A GRAY SHAWL.

CLATTER, clatter! gallop, gallop! And away flew the iron horse, with his fire-breathing nostrils, tearing through mountain gorges and moonlit valleys, and rushing madly through midnight tunnels, in the wild heart of the Alleghanies.

It was grand—this unchecked, north wind kind of motion—this exhilarating consciousness of annihilation of time and space!

Some such novel and sublime thought as this was swelling the heart of a small individual, who sat, tucked up into a round lump, with her feet under her, and a dark tartan shawl converting her into an indistinguishable mass, in the corner of one of the high-backed seats in a Pennsylvania sleeping-car. Traveling alone, all the way from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia—the only crinoline in a car full of rough overcoats, at night—one would have thought Miss Sylvia Swan's reflections would scarcely have been of so gushing an order. But the young woman, being sensible as well as sentimental, had got over her first horrors on perceiving that nobody stared at her and nobody spoke to her, and was enjoying the exhilarating sensation of a first railroad ride by night, through a mountainous country, with all the enthusiasm of a school-girl just emancipated from gall and bondage.

She gazed out of the narrow window at the tall trees flitting by like black spectres, and laughed at the moon vainly striving to overtake them in their mad race; then as her glance fell upon a certain "bright, particular star," whose clear, soft ray seemed like a look from a loving eye, she remembered what dear eyes, now left far behind, were keeping their promise of watching this same star at this hour, and thus establishing a link between the severed soul-sisters!

Sentiment had it now; and Syl—(her school-mates never thought of giving her the whole of her romantic appellation)—leaned back in her seat, with a quivering face, and thought over all the "nice times," the hair-breadth 'scapes and scrapes, she had had at school; the dear five hundred friends, to say nothing of her "own peculiar," whom she had left, perhaps, forever; the girlhood slipping away behind her, as it were, the mystic, fateful womanhood stealing on, and came very near making a dissolving view of herself in a flood of tears.

But a bright thought of the delights awaiting her at her journey's end came happily to the rescue; the dear friend who was to meet her in Philadelphia, and escort her to the far-famed city of Gotham, of which Syl's eager fancy had drawn a most marvelous picture; the beloved sister dwelling there; the lions and elephants she was to see! She remembered, too, the long, tender epistles, crossed and recrossed, which were to be as carrier-doves between herself and the loved ones she had left, and was comforted enough to allow of her beginning to grow sleepy.

The car was filled with individuals in all stages of somnolence—some sitting bolt upright, and nodding ludicrously in their efforts to maintain that dignified posture; some doubled up in corners; others, more bold, defying public opinion, had bound their handkerchiefs about their brows to break the jolts, and resting their heads upon the tall backs of the seats in front, rode on in triumphant unconsciousness, regardless of the bobbing bandanas, and pouring forth sounds, "long-drawn" certainly, whether "sweet" or not.

It was a very ridiculous picture altogether, and Syl dreaded contributing her share toward it; but her sleepy blue eyes positively refused to remain open any longer. So, congratulating herself for once upon her dumpy stature, she doubled her little feet under her, and laid herself down across the seat, her head resting on the cushioned arm, with her hand under the plump cheek to "soften the thumps."

All sorts of kaleidoscopic visions flitted past her eyes for a few moments; the thunderous rush of the train sounded in her ears like the distant fall of a cascade; and soon came blissful unconsciousness, and she was sleeping soundly as a tired child—so soundly, that she was only dimly aware of "somebody doing something," when presently a kind hand raised the weary, jolted head, with all its heavy curls drooping over the slumber-flushed face, and slipped beneath it a great traveling-shawl, folded into the most comfortable of pillows.

So the strange night passed, and Syl slept sweetly, and dreamed she was in her own little white cot in the boarding-school dormitory, until, presto! a fierce snort, an abrupt jerk that almost threw her from her seat, and she awoke, with her fellow-passengers, to the consciousness of late morning, a pouring rain, and "something the matter with the engine."

Poor Syl! Every body else had some one to discuss the accident with. She did not venture to ask any questions, but gathered from what was said around her that the engine was hopelessly out of order, and there was nothing to be done but to wait upon the road until another could be brought from Harrisburgh. Pleasant prospect! Her friend would be at the Philadelphia dépôt seeking but not finding her; she would arrive in that great, strange city all alone—late in the day—and what ever would become of her? Meanwhile there was nothing to console her under this despairing reflection but the complaints of tired and hungry passengers within, and without the ceaseless, sullen rain.

But Syl had a brave little spirit, which refused to be discouraged at the first trial of its strength; and she settled herself in her corner, determined not to be the least bit impatient of the delay, nor even anxious as to what the end would be, but wait to see what course events would take as imperturbably as though she were the most experienced of travelers.

It took all her resolution, however, to keep back that little quick temper of hers during the long, dreary hour of waiting; but at length, before the pout on her rosy face had settled into an absolute "sulk," the puff! puff! of the coming locomotive was heard nigh at hand, and in a few moments more they were again dashing on their way through the golden autumn fields of the thrifty Deutschland of America.

It was long past nine, however, when they reached the tidy little capital—"and they should have been there by seven!" thought Syl, in despair, remembering her appointment to be in Philadelphia by two. But it was no use worrying about it, for they were to change cars here, and she must summon all her wits, and not appear stupid or frightened. And then there was that shawl! Which one of all those rough men, jostling and bustling so to get out of the car, could have placed it under her head? What was she to do with it? There was nothing to be done but to leave it on the seat; the owner would probably look after his own property; though, to be sure, she would like to thank him for his kindness. And yet she should be ashamed, too. The idea of going to sleep, and having to be cared for like a baby!

Syl colored as she smiled at the thought; and then saying to herself that it was probably only the conductor after all, she got up and made her way out of the car. And she never noticed a gentleman, who was stooping down, busy with his carpet-bag, in the seat just behind her, and who, with a comical smile on his face, proceeded to take possession of the mysterious garment, and followed her out into the street with it hanging carelessly over his arm.

But as she sat, looking idly out of the window of the Philadelphia car which she had entered, waiting until the hungry passengers should have swallowed their ten minutes' breakfast, and the train get under way, Syl caught a glimpse of the veritable gray plaid coming out of the door of the railroad house, and had time to take a satisfactory survey of the wearer's face as he crossed the track to enter one of the cars.

"What a good face he has!" thought the child, with a little throb of gratitude, while the quick color rose again in her cheek. "He looks like a man who would put a pillow under a poor tired head, and never stay to be thanked. Dear me! I only wish I knew him, and that he was to take care of me all the way. It is so dreary this traveling alone, and being detained, and missing one's escort, and every thing!"

Poor Syl sighed—a long tired sigh; she was beginning to feel almost discouraged. She ventured presently to look behind her, as the noise of tramping feet announced that the train was rapidly filling up, but she did not see any thing that looked like a gray traveling shawl; and putting aside all hope of help or comfort in that quarter, she prepared to endure the day's solitary journey as best she might.

The various dainties with which the loving hands of her schoolmates had supplied her little traveling-basket kept her from feeling sick or faint; and she had the last Harper for a companion: then the rain had ceased, and the country, through which they were dashing at such exhilarating speed, looked very beautiful in its mellow autumn richness; so that the hours wore away far less wearily than our little traveler had feared, and long before she had expected it, the spires of the Quaker City were discerned in the distance, and the impatient passengers began to gather up their various scattered chattels, and make ready for the inevitable rush which is, of course, the only orthodox method of egress from cars or steamboats.

"Oh dear! if I only might find him after all waiting for me! We have come so fast—only an hour behind time!" thought Syl, her heart beating as if it were away up in her throat; and when the conductor came round collecting checks, she ventured to ask him timidly if he wouldn't please look out for a gentleman—a tall gentleman with dark hair—who would maybe be there to meet her.

The man of much business and few words gave her a hasty nod in reply, and with this she had to be content and strive to possess her soul in patience; but it seemed now as though the train never would stop; and after it actually had reached the dépôt, and the hurrying throng had poured out of the car, leaving her alone and trembling, the moments appeared like hours until the conductor approached.

"Nobody at all waiting at the dépôt, Miss," said he, not unkindly, but as though time was very precious to him. "What d'ye think ye'll do? Goin' on to York, wasn't you? Baggage checked all the way through. Next train leaves in half an hour—have a carriage, and go right on, or go to a hotel? In a hurry, if you please, Miss."

Poor Syl! there was no time to think, and if there had been, she would not have known what was best to do. Her friend had, of course, been to the station and gone, whither she knew not; perhaps he would be on that very train for New York, thinking she had deferred the day of her departure from school. Or even if he were to return at the hour for the next arrival to look for her, she could not wait alone at that public place with night coming on. No, there was a chance of her meeting him—she had better go right on.

So she told the conductor, and then sat down again, with a sinking heart, to wait till he should procure a carriage. She heard him stop and speak to some one—evidently a gentleman from the tone of his voice; and when he presently returned, and handed her to the coach, she was sure she saw a gray shawl fitting into another vehicle which followed directly behind hers on the route to the New York dépôt.

There seemed to be a little mystery about it all which began to excite Syl's curiosity; but she had little time to puzzle herself about it, for a very few minutes brought her again in the midst of the bustle and confusion she so dreaded; the horrid shouting hackmen, the jostling porters, and hurrying throng of passengers, all eager to get the first tickets and best seats; and the poor child's only thought was how to steal in most unobserved, and wait the last dreary hours until at length the end should come!

For she saw no sign of her friend among all the crowd of men, neither did the gray shawl appear; but the coachman said as she gave him his fare,

"If you'll give me the money, Miss, I'll get your ticket for you. The gentleman told me."

"What gentleman?" thought Syl, with an impulse of wonder, and again that quick-springing glow. "Not the conductor!" But she felt grateful for the offer, no matter whose suggestion it was, and was inexpressibly relieved to have her ticket placed in her hand, and be able to enter the car directly and be seated, without having to wait her turn amidst the jostling crowd at the ticket-office.

Once more she was in comparative quiet and privacy; but the excitement and hurry, and the giving up of the last hope of meeting her friend, had been too much for her nerves; and the poor child, drawing her vail closely over her face, leaned her head against the window and cried—a long quiet cry to herself. It made her feel better: the tears relieved that tightness in the throat which had seemed almost like strangulation; but her head still ached sadly, and the sense of loneliness and friendlessness, the quick-coming night, and the dread of entering the great wicked city all alone so late, made her almost ill. It seemed as though the ceaseless motion of the cars, the unending rush and clatter of their wheels, would haunt her always; and she longed, like a sick child whose mother is away, to be safe and at rest in her sister's arms. How anxious her sister would be, when the hour came, and the expected travelers came not with it! The tears started again full and fast with the thought, and Syl had really to make a brave effort, and summon up all her self-control, her hope, and her faith, to aid her in enduring those heavy hours.

At one of the way stations an immense old lady got in, with a basket almost as huge as herself, and there being no other seat vacant in the car, deposited her ponderosity beside Syl's little figure, which, shrunk away up in the corner, left plenty of room. She had a fat, comfortable face, and a mellow, kindly voice; and it quite roused up our little traveler, the having to answer her deprecations of crowding her, and her good-natured abuse of the narrow accommodations of rail-cars. It was an absolute comfort to be able to speak to any one. But it was not of long duration; her new friend was kindly enough, but seemed to be of a taciturn and somnolent habit; she soon settled herself into a comfortable posture and closed her eyes; and by-and-by, the deep breathings from her expansive chest announced to Syl that there was no diversion of her weary, anxious thoughts to be expected from that quarter.

She turned to the window; darkness was gathering thickly without, and it strained her eyes to attempt to descry the objects past which they were rapidly speeding. She suffered the lids to fall wearily over them, and leaning her head upon the sash, strove to let patience have its perfect work. A sudden stopping of the train presently, accompanied with a confusion of voices, loud talking and laughing, aroused her from her reverie; the door was flung open, and a whole band of firemen in uniform burst noisily in, and made a general scramble for the seats which were being vacated by passengers who stopped here. The one immediately in front of Syl had been turned over, facing hers, by some family party who had occupied it previously, and the poor girl devoutly hoped that none of these merry gentry would get possession of that.

And they did not: a gentleman in a citizen's dress pressed toward it, and seated himself directly in front of Syl and her companion, without restoring the bench to its proper position.

"Impertinent!" thought Syl, indignantly; but just then the fat old lady, who had been aroused from her nap by the noisy entrance of the firemen, called her attention to their gay and gallant appearance.

"As sure as I live they are Albany boys!"

she exclaimed, enthusiastically; "the bravest fellows in the world. I'm an Albany woman—and I know 'em well. They've been on a trip to Philadelphia. Ain't they a fine-looking set?"

Syl shrugged her shoulders, and said nothing, but the gentleman opposite made a gracious bow, and said, blandly,

"No doubt, Madam, the finest band in the country; glad to hear you're from Albany, Madam; my native city—fine place!"

The Albany lady's good-will was won at once, and an animated conversation was instantly commenced between them. Syl leaned back wearily and took no part in it, though the stranger, appearing to suppose that she was the daughter of the amiable old lady, tried in every way to draw her to join them. Her answers were monosyllabic; and after a while silence again prevailed, for her somnolent companion dropped to sleep, and the gentleman opposite was obliged to stop talking for lack of an interlocutor.

Syl folded her handkerchief between her forehead and the sharp wood-work, and rested her head against the window; it was not a very comfortable position, and as she moved uneasily the handkerchief fell. Her vis-à-vis picked it up quickly, and restored it with a bow and smile, which Syl thought intrusive, and acknowledged only by a languid nod. The individual was not to be rebuffed, however.

"You seem fatigued," said he, the thing usually said on such occasions. "Come on from Baltimore, probably?"

"No, Pittsburgh," replied Syl, laconically.

"Ah! been at school there, I presume?"

"What business is that of yours?" thought Syl, indignantly; but his look was that of a gentleman, and his tone and manner very respectful, though his words were inquisitive. It would be unpleasant to have a scene, so she merely said, in a concluding kind of tone,

"No, near there."

"At Canonsburg, I suppose? No? Jefferson then? Indeed! I spent a week once at that charming little town, and visited a cousin of mine at your seminary. That was before your time, however!" and here he bowed again, with a complimentary smile. Syl looked at him a little more observingly than before. He was certainly a very stylish-looking personage, with dark curling locks, brilliant black eyes, and such a mustache! His costume was in faultless taste, and his one unkidded hand was white as a woman's, and wore a large diamond that glittered in the dim light.

"How handsome he is, and how well-dressed!" thought Syl, with school-girlish interest. "And how odd he should know about our seminary! I am sure he must be a nice person; I am glad I was not rude to him."

It really seemed like a kind of comfort and protection to meet any one who had visited the beloved seminary to this poor little lamb who had just left that sheltering fold, and was feeling all astray. Her pleasure showed itself in the timid, eager look with which she listened to the stranger's announcement, and he did not fail to follow up the favorable impression.

"I was present at one of your examinations once," he continued, "and I never was more astonished in my life. We students, in my college days, never could have gone through such a mill as those pretty young girls, in their innocent white dresses, went through that day!"

Syl colored with pleased pride; had not she just passed through one of those fiery ordeals in triumph, and crossed the "fool's bridge" with flying colors? So she answered in a little deprecating tone,

"Oh, it is nothing when one gets used to it. They cram desperately at the seminary:" and then the ice was broken, and they were floating away on the stream of school-talk and small-talk; and Syl found herself chattering away in the most unreserved and vivacious strain about all manner of things, to this self-presented acquaintance of an hour. Some little compunctious visitings obtruded themselves now and then; "but then he knew about the seminary, and probably her principal was acquainted with him. She was sure he was a gentleman, and of course he would attend to her when they got to that dreadful New York; and it was so horrible sitting alone conjuring up all sorts of dangers and troubles to come!" And so she talked and he talked; and at length there came the unearthly whistle, the final jerk, and lo! New York!

"The wrong side of the river," however, as her mustached friend informed the eager child, who was ready to jump out into the darkness, and rush off alone in her half-crazy excitement at the thought of being actually at her sister's home. There was the ferry yet to cross, and Syl held tremblingly to the arm her new friend gallantly offered, as they made their way among the jostling throng jammed together in the dark upon the crowded deck. She had a horror of the water, and was shivering with excitement and the night air; so that she was devoutly thankful when at length they reached the other side, and her escort found her a seat in the ladies' waiting-room while he went to procure a carriage. Syl had all the dingy, dim saloon to herself, and her cheek grew hot as she noticed that there were no other ladies waiting in so public a place at nine o'clock at night. As she sat trembling with nervous excitement, the door opened slowly, a man's head was thrust cautiously in, and Syl met a long, sharp survey from a pair of stern-looking eyes. As the owner of them withdrew, Syl noticed that he wore a gray traveling shawl about his shoulders!

"It is he!" thought the child, springing to her feet in surprise, and almost terror, at what seemed a mysterious pursuit. "What can he mean? Oh, if I were only home!"

But just then her mustached friend appeared, and with his favorite bow, drew her arm within his glossy sleeve.

"I shall consider myself forever your slave, for the charming way in which you have beguiled an otherwise tedious journey, fair lady," said he, with an ineffable smile, as he conducted her to the carriage. "I regret unspeakably my almost immediate departure from the city; how happy should I be to continue this delightful acquaintance! For you will not think I flatter you if I say you are the most entertaining person I have ever met. What a treasury of good things your journal must be!"

"Oh, I hope you don't suspect me of the weakness of keeping one!" replied Syl, gayly, blushing at his elaborate compliments, and giving him her hand in a cordial good-by. "No, don't say a word about going farther. I feel perfectly safe now, and so glad that I am almost home. Besides, I have a great respect for engagements—even gentlemen's business ones—they should never be broken. Good-by!"

And so, while the gentleman stood on the sidewalk and waved a last adieu, the coach rolled away, and Syl threw herself back upon the cushions, and strove to calm her excited feelings. Her nerves had been on a continual tension for two days, and she felt as though she would give any thing to be alone that she might relieve them by a good cry. But it was not a private carriage into which she had been put; but some kind of public conveyance, which contained several persons besides herself, and was continually stopping to let one and another out.

"By-and-by I shall be alone," thought she; and at length the last individual took his departure, and the repressed tears had already sprung to the poor child's eyes when the door again opened, and a gentleman entered and took his seat. Syl started almost to her feet, and scarce kept back an exclamation of surprise, almost terror. The new-comer wore a gray shawl.

He did not seem to notice her confusion, however, and a few streets were passed in silence. Presently there was a premonitory ahem! followed by a pause, and then the gentleman found voice.

"You will pardon me, young lady," said he, in a very grave and constrained tone, "if I appear intrusive in what I am about to say. Even at the risk of displeasing you, I feel it my duty to ask you a certain question. Had you any previous acquaintance with the gentleman with whom you were conversing in the car, and who put you in this coach?"

Syl drew herself up, and looked haughtily at her interrogator.

"I must first learn your right to catechise me, Sir, before I reply!"

"I know I have no right," replied the gentleman, quietly, "except the right of a good motive, and a wish to avert from you a mischief that may be in plot for you."

"You need not take the trouble, Sir," interrupted Syl with scornful dignity. "I am on my way to friends who are quite able to take care of me, granting that, as you seem to think, I am unequal to the charge myself."

"I am very glad to hear it," replied the young gentleman, with grave persistence; "but I will explain the reason of my intrusion. I see now that you did not know the fellow who presumed upon your inexperience. I do, however; he is a "confidence man:" do you know enough of slang to understand the term? A swindler, a gambler, a reprobate in every way; in the disguise and with the appearance of a gentleman. And knowing this, do you wonder that a true man could not stand silently by, and see such a fellow worm himself into the confidence of an innocent and thoughtless young girl? Pardon me, but you showed yourself thoughtless in permitting such familiarity with a stranger."

Poor Syl! this was the last drop in her cup of disasters! Such humiliation! In vain she strove to disbelieve the story. She could not but trust those grave, clear eyes, and she remembered his act of unobtrusive kindness the night before. She could not speak, for the long-repressed sobs completely choked her voice; she only covered her face with her hands, and cried like a child.

Her companion was touched by her distress, and resumed more gently:

"You were not so very much to blame, so young and inexperienced. And it was natural that you should greet gladly any one who seemed kind, when you were feeling so anxious. You see I know all about it. I have had my eye on you ever since we left Pittsburgh."

"Pity you had no business of your own to attend to!" rejoined Syl, indignant at what looked like surveillance.

"I always make it my business to give help to those who need it, when I can," answered the young man, with grave dignity. "I saw you were alone, and knew that the stoppage on the road would derange your plans. Your face told your anxiety plainly enough. I thought I would keep you in sight, that I might aid you if necessary, though I did not wish to intrude proffers of service upon you. I saw that you were properly attended to at Philadelphia—those conductors are always so much engaged—and was in the seat directly behind you when that fellow thrust himself upon your acquaintance. So that I had the benefit of most of your confidences to him! I had no right to interfere, annoyed as I was; but I kept near you on the ferry-boat, and looked into the waiting-room to see if you were safe." Syl remembered this with a thrill. "Then I got on the outside of the carriage, which was full within, feeling it my duty to warn you against any further acquaintance with this man, if he had presumed to offer it. You have the whole story now: perhaps you will think me officious; but a few years hence you will probably thank me for what I have done."

Syl had listened breathlessly to this strange recital. Was ever such kindness, such delicacy heard of? How different this unobtrusive guardianship from the fulsome compliments which her last self-appointed protector had poured upon her! She could have eaten herself for permitting them! And this true gentleman—this social Bayard—how should she thank him?

Meanwhile he evidently misconstrued her silence, and spoke again, a little haughtily:

"I have not bored you with these details with any purpose to lay claim upon your gratitude, but simply to clear myself from the charge of intrusion. Perhaps, now that I have put you upon your guard with respect to your new acquaintance, no more is needful, and I may withdraw. Meanwhile"—and he paused with his hand upon the check-string—"if you will show this to any of your gentleman friends, they can find out for you that I am a responsible person, and deserving of trust."

He placed a card in her hand, and was going, but she stopped him eagerly:

"Oh no, do not leave me alone again, I beg of you; stay till I am safe with my friends, and believe that I would thank you if I could. It was very, very good of you—and you put your shawl under my head when I was so tired. I do not deserve—" And here Syl broke down, and the sobs had it all their own way again for a while.

The young gentleman colored and smiled, and wondered how she knew—if she recognized the shawl; but before he could speak the carriage had stopped, and the coachman was opening the door.

"134, ma'am," and Syl sprang up, half wild.

"Ask for Mr. Chapman—Mr. F. D. Chapman," she said, excitedly, not noticing how her companion started at the name.

"I have never been here before; surely there can be no mistake."

No, there was no mistake, for in a second Mr. F. D. Chapman appeared at the door, and in another Syl had sprung up the steps, and was in his arms, and in those of her sister.

"Ah, never mind teasing me now, brother Frank," she plead, as her brother-in-law advised her seriously against a fit of hysterics. "Let me go into the house, please; and you thank the gentleman, Frank, who took care of me—he was so kind! he is in the carriage;" but just then she stopped in utter amaze, for "the gentleman" leaned out of the carriage-door, and there was a "How d'ye do, Frank?" and a "Hullo, Fred!" given in so hearty a tone that it was plain there was no need of introduction or formal exchange of compliment there.

"Why, where in the world did you pick up my little sister-in-law, Fred?" exclaimed Mr. Chapman, in the next breath. "She says you've been so 'very kind' to her. Just like you, always on the look-out for unprotected females. But jump out and come in. I never could bear mysteries, and I want this one solved right away. Syl, tell him to come. Here you've been making acquaintance with one of the best of my friends, you little flirt!"

So there was nothing to be done but for Mr. Frederick Dallas to "come," which he accordingly did; and the evening was spent by him in a very different way from any thing he had anticipated, when pity for her fatigue and admiration for her rosy, sleeping face had prompted him to fold his traveling wrap under the head of a tired girl.

Such a maze of questions, and explanations, and blushes, and laughter we respectfully decline to enter into. Of course Mr. Dallas felt it his duty to call next evening to inquire if Miss Swan had recovered from the fatigues of her journey; and it will be sufficient to state, in conclusion of this "owre true tale," that in the course of a few weeks he found means to convince our heroine that it was a great deal pleasanter traveling in company than alone, and that he was a proper protector for her on the railroad of life.

We shall only add that the ubiquitous gray shawl has been appropriated by Mrs. Dallas to her own especial use, and converted into an "Afghan" for her dressing-room lounge, as she has taken an odd notion into her silly little brain that her head is never so thoroughly comfortable as when reposing upon its soft thick folds.

AN INTERVIEW WITH MARTIN LUTHER.

HISTORY generally differs from real life, as the marble forms on a temple-frieze differ from flesh and blood. The place which a man fills is the mould in which our idea of the man himself is cast; and the world's heroes become so many motionless figures, each standing in his characteristic attitude. Who ever thinks of Napoleon as a sentimental young man shedding tears over the "Sorrows of Werther?" Or of Washington rolling on the sofa in a fit of laughter? For us the one is always dressed in full regimentals, and the other cool and calm, in his gray overcoat, surveying his "tête d'armée." Yet these figures lose nothing in dignity when we learn—from oral tradition rather than from the cautious biographer—that they had a childhood and a youth, seasons of inexperience and rashness, human weaknesses and human passions; that they had their fun and their familiarities; that the one liked fish, and the other carried snuff in his vest-pocket—in short, that they were men as well as historic personages; and that, although they stand upon pedestals for us, they walked about in the dust in their day.

So far from losing, on such familiar acquaintance, every truly great life gains in interest as we perceive its points of contact with our own. Peter the Great, Dr. Johnson, Franklin, are examples of this; nor can all the evil which we hear whispered about Catharine of Russia diminish our appreciation of her qualities of mind. What would we not now give for a phonographic report of an evening's banquet at the villa of Mæcenas? or of a debate in the Roman Senate? or a talk with Dante? or the carousals at the Mermaid Tavern? A single anecdote related by Haydon give us a more life-like impression of Wordsworth, Keats, and Charles Lamb than their several biographies. There is no more useful class than the Boswells—provided, always, that they do not publish until their subjects are dead.

We have been led to these reflections by the perusal of a curious narrative, written by Mr.

Johannes Kessler, of St. Gall, in Switzerland—a man whose name would never have been heard of if he had not chanced to have been born in the commencement of the sixteenth century. He was fifteen years old when Dr. Luther nailed his famous protest upon the door of Wittenberg Cathedral. He studied theology at Basle; and in his twentieth year, poor and afoot, wandered to Wittenberg, where he remained for eighteen months. On returning to St. Gall, whither the Reformation had not then reached, he was obliged to learn the trade of a saddler in order to support himself; but, finally, by his preaching and teaching, assembled around him a small congregation of Protestants. He was thus enabled to lay his trade aside, and devote his time to the schools and libraries of the town. He wrote a few books, from one of which—"SAB-BATHA: A Chronicle of the Time of the Reformation in St. Gall"—his interview with Luther is taken.

It was in the month of March, 1522. Eleven months previous Luther had appeared before the Diet of Worms; after which, protected by Frederick the Wise, he had remained concealed in the Wartburg at Eisenach, engaged in translating the New Testament. The tumults at Carlsstadt had called him forth at last from his hiding-place, but it was still necessary that he should travel in disguise. His dangers and his struggles had but just commenced: the wedge was entered, but not driven home. Luther's life contained no more eventful period than this; and a picture of him taken at such a time possesses a peculiar interest to us, who can so calmly overlook his whole career.

Thus much by way of introduction. Now let us listen to Johannes Kessler, who, with his friend—a youth of the same age—are on their way to Wittenberg.*

"As we were on our way to Wittenberg, to study the Holy Scriptures, we came to Jena, in the Thuringian land, in a most severe storm, God knows! After much inquiry, here and there, through the city, for quarters where we might spend the night, we could neither find nor hear of any; every where was a lodging refused us. For it was Shrove Tuesday (March 4, 1522), when people are not accustomed to care for pilgrims and strangers. Therefore we turned to leave the city, intending to go further, and perhaps find a village where we could be entertained. At the very gate, however, there met us a worthy man, who greeted us pleasantly, and asked whither we were going so late, since it would be dark night before we could reach either house or hostel where they would take us in. Moreover, the way was difficult to find, and he would advise us rather to remain where we were.

"We answered: 'Good father, we have been at all the taverns whithersoever we have been directed, but have every where been turned away and denied lodging. Perforce, therefore, we must go further.' Then he asked had we tried the inn of the Black Bear? We replied, 'We have not met with it. Good friend, say, where shall we find it?' Thereupon he showed it to us, a little beyond the city gate. And as we saw the Black Bear, behold! even as all other landlords had denied us lodging, here came the host to the door, received us, willingly offered of his own accord to lodge us, and conducted us into the guests' room.

"Therein we found a man sitting alone at the table, with a small book before him. He greeted us in friendly wise, and invited us to come nearer and seat ourselves beside him. But—if I may take the liberty of mentioning it—our shoes were so muddy and filthy that we were ashamed to venture fully into the room, and crowded ourselves timidly upon a narrow bench near the door. Then he invited us to drink with him, which we could not very well decline. Whereupon, when we perceived his friendliness and cordiality, we seated ourselves near him as he had requested, at his table, and called for a measure of wine, in order that we might have the honor of asking him to drink with us in return. We did not suspect otherwise than that he was a trooper, who, as was the custom, sat there in his cap of red leather, his jacket and breeches, without armor, a sword by his side, his right hand on the hilt-knob, and his left grasping the belt. His eyes were dark and deep-set, shining and sparkling like a star, so that they could not well be looked upon.

"Presently he began to question where we were born, but answered the question himself: 'You are Swiss; from what part of Switzerland do you come?'

"'From St. Gall,' we answered.

"Then, said he: 'If, as I hear, you are going hence to Wittenberg, you will find there two worthy fellow-countrymen, Dr. Hieronymus Schurf and his brother, Dr. Augustin.'

"We said: 'We have letters to them.' Then we asked further: 'Sir, can you not inform us whether Martinus Luther is now at Wittenberg, or in what other place he may be?'

"He answered: 'To my certain knowledge Luther is not now in Wittenberg; but he will soon return thither. Philippus Melancthon is there, however; he teaches the Greek language, and there are others who teach Hebrew. Candidly, I would advise you to study both, for they are necessary in order to understand the Holy Scriptures.'

"Said we: 'Praised be God! for if He spares our lives we will not rest until we have seen and heard the man, since because of him have we undertaken this journey, having learned that his design is to overthrow the priesthood, together with the mass, as an unauthorized worship. As we have been from childhood destined by our parents for the priesthood, and educated for that purpose, we should like to hear what sort of instruction he will give us, and by what means he will carry his doctrines into operation.'

"After these words he asked: 'Where have you studied until now?'

"'In Basle.'

"Then he: 'How do things stand in Basle? Is Erasmus of Rotterdam still there, and what is he doing?'

"'Sir,' we answered, 'we know not otherwise than that every thing is going on well. Also Erasmus is there; but what he does is unknown and concealed from every one, seeing that he keeps himself very quiet and secluded.'

"It seemed to us not a little strange that this trooper should know about the brothers Schurf, and Philip, and Erasmus, and the qualifications of the latter in speaking the Greek and Hebrew languages. Now and then he made use of divers Latin words, so that we suspected he must be no ordinary soldier, but a very different person indeed.

"'Friends,' he asked, 'what do people think of Luther in Switzerland?'

"'Sir, there are there, as elsewhere, various opinions. Many can not sufficiently exalt him, and thank God that through him He has revealed His truth and suffered Error to be made known, while others damn him as an infamous heretic, the clergy most of all.'

"'Truly, I think,' said he, 'it is the priests who do that.'

"Through such discourse we became very familiar, so that my comrade picked up and opened the little book, which lay before him. It was a Hebrew psalter. Thereupon he put it back quickly, and the trooper took it.

"My comrade said: 'I would give a finger off my hand if I understood that language.'

"Where to he answered: 'You will surely understand it if you are sufficiently diligent. I also desire to learn more, and daily exercise myself therein.'

"In the mean time the day went down, and it became very dark, when the landlord returned. Perceiving our great desire and yearning toward Luther he said:

"'Dear comrades, if you had been here two days ago your wishes would have been gratified, for here at this table was he sitting, and' (pointing with his finger) 'in this very spot.'

"This vexed us greatly; we were angered that we had delayed, and loudly expressed our wrath on account of the deep and dirty roads which had hindered us.

"'Nevertheless,' we said, 'we are rejoiced to be in the house, and to sit at the same table where he sat.' Thereupon the landlord went out of the room, laughing.

"After a little while he came and called me out. I was frightened, thinking I had committed some indiscretion, or was suspected of something for which I was not to blame. But the landlord said to me:

"'Since that I perceive your desire to see and hear Luther—he is beside whom you are sitting!'

"I took these words for jest, and said: 'Yes, Mr. Landlord, you would like to chaff me, that I may satisfy my desire by seeing your illusive Luther.'

" 'It is surely he,' was his reply; 'but do not act as if you knew it.'

"I promised accordingly, but could not believe the landlord's words.

"I returned to the room, seated myself again at the table, and sought for an opportunity to tell my comrade what I had just heard. Finally I turned to him and whispered, secretly,

" 'The landlord says he is Luther.'

"But he, like myself, would not at once believe it, and said:

" 'Perhaps he said it is Hutten, and thou hast not rightly understood him.'

"Now, as the soldier garments and his demeanor suggested Hutten to me rather than Luther the monk, I suffered myself to be persuaded that the landlord had said 'he is Hutten,' since the commencement of both names has a similar sound. What I further addressed to him, therefore, was as if I had addressed Herr Ulric von Hutten, knight.

"During our conversation came two merchants, who also designed remaining overnight, and after they had taken off their mantles and spurs, one of them produced an unbound book. 'Martinus' asked what book that was, and he said, 'it is Doctor Luther's explanation of various Gospels and Epistles, just printed and put into circulation: have you not seen it?' Said Martinus: 'I shall soon receive copies.' Then the landlord called: 'Now dispose yourselves at the table; we will eat.' We, however, entreated him to have some consideration for us, and prepare something separate from the others. 'My dear youths,' he answered, 'only take your seats with the gentlemen at the table; I will see that you are respectably served.' Martinus hearing this, called out, 'Come, come, I will settle the score with the landlord!'

"During the meal he spoke many friendly and godly words, so that we and the merchants were silent before him, attending to his conversation more than to the dishes on the table. Among other things he lamented, sighing deeply, that the princes and nobles, who were even then assembled at the Diet in Nuremberg, on account of the Word of God, and the fluctuating disturbances and difficulties of the German nation, were not otherwise inclined than to squander away their precious time in costly tournaments, sleighing-parties, dissipation, empty ceremony, and whoredom, when the fear of God and the prayerful entreaty for His aid were so much needed. 'But such,' he concluded, 'are our Christian princes.' He further said his hope was, that the fruits of evangelical truth would appear in our children and posterity, who would not be poisoned by the errors of Papistry, but their lives planted in the enduring truth of the Word of God, rather than in the present generation, in whom those errors were so deeply rooted that it was next to impossible to exterminate them.

"Thereupon the merchants also openly expressed their views, and the eldest said: 'I am but a simple, foolish layman, and do not particularly understand these matters. This much, however, I will say, as I look upon them—Luther must either be an angel from heaven or a devil from hell. I should like to spend ten florins for his sake, if I could but confess to him, for I firmly believe he both could and would enlighten my conscience.' In the mean time the landlord came and secretly said to us: 'Martinus has settled with me for your supper.' We were greatly rejoiced, not on account of the money or the meal, but because we had been the guests of such a man. After supper the merchants arose and went into the stable to look after their horses, whereupon, being alone with Martinus in the room, we thanked him for the honor and expense, and plainly hinted to him that we took him to be Ulric von Hutten. But he at once declared: 'I am not he.'

"When the landlord returned, Martinus said: 'This night I have become a nobleman, for these Swiss hold me to be Ulric von Hutten.' Said the landlord: 'He, indeed, are you not, but Martinus Luther.' He smiled good-humoredly, saying, 'they think I am Hutten, you think I am Luther; next thing, I shall be Markolfus.*' After these remarks he took a tall beer-glass and said, according to the custom of the country, 'Swiss, drink with me a friendly drink as benediction!' But as I was about to take the glass from him, he changed it and gave me a glass of wine instead, saying: 'You are not accustomed to beer at home, so take rather wine.' During this while he had arisen, thrown his dragoon cloak on his shoulders, and then said farewell. Giving us his hand, he added: 'When you reach Wittenberg, give my salutation to Dr. Hieronymus Schurf.' We answered, 'We will do so willingly; but what name shall we give you that he may understand from whom the greeting comes?' 'Say but this,' said he: "'He who is coming, salutes you!'" and he will understand you at once.' Then he departed from us and went to his rest.

"The merchants afterward returned to the room and ordered the landlord to bring them another measure of wine, much conjecturing who the guest might be. The landlord speedily let it be seen that he held him to be Luther, and they were no sooner convinced of it than they lamented and worried themselves that they had spoken with so little tact in his presence. They determined to get up very early in the morning, before he should have ridden away, and beg him not be angry with them, seeing that they did not know his person. This plan they truly carried out, and found him in the stable next morning. His only answer was: 'You said last night, at supper, that you would spend ten florins for Luther's sake, if you could once confess to him. If you should ever come to him to confess, you will then see whether I am Martin Luther.' Further than this he did not acknowledge him.

* Markolfus was a popular comic character—a sort of Punch in Germany, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

self, but soon afterward mounted his horse and rode on toward Wittenberg.

"On the same day we set out for Naumburg, and reached a village—it lies at the foot of a mountain—which is called Orlamunde, and the village Nasshausen, if I remember rightly—through which ran a stream, so swollen by tremendous rains that a part of the bridge was carried away, and no one could get across. We therefore halted in this village, where, by chance, we again found in the tavern the two merchants, who entertained us as their guests that night, for Luther's sake.

"On the following Saturday—the day before the first Sunday in Lent—we called upon Dr. Hieronymus Schurf, in order to deliver our letters of recommendation. When we were summoned into his chamber, behold! there we found Martinus the trooper, just as he was at Jena. And with him were Philip Melancthon, Justus Jodocus Jonas, Nicholas Amsdorf, and Dr. Augustin Schurf, who were relating to him what had taken place in Wittenberg during his absence. He saluted us laughingly, and, pointing with his finger, said: 'There is Philip Melancthon, of whom I spoke to you.'

Freytag truly says, that in this narrative of Kessler nothing is more remarkable than the impression he gives us of Luther's calm courage and cheerfulness, at a time when he was outlawed, denounced, his life in danger, with few friends, and all the weight of a tremendous crisis in his fate, and the fate of his doctrines, hanging over him. That sublime repose of character which is a necessary element of greatness was never more grandly exhibited.

Just outside the eastern gate of Jena stands the Tavern of the Black Bear, a low, massive two-story house (an architectural boulder), with an arched gate-way in the centre, leading to a flagged court and stables in the rear. Still may the visitor mount the narrow and not over-cleanly steps, enter the dusky, low, ancient guests' room, and, seating himself at a table old enough to belong to Luther's age, if it be not the same whereat he ate and drank, call for his seidl of excellent beer or the red wine of the Saal Valley, and drink to the memory of the only Protestant Reformer whose heart was as large as his brain.

GOSSIP ABOUT A GREAT PAINTER.

THE Great Painter is Turner.

Mr. Ruskin has written five considerable volumes about Turner's genius and works, but in all the five volumes gives scarce a glimpse of the man. Those who have read Ruskin will be glad to know something of the artist to defend whom the "Modern Painters" was written. Those who care nothing about him will, it is believed, be amused at the oddities of one of the greatest of England's many men of genius.

Of course it is not proposed here to do more than give some account of the man's personality. Those who wish to know about his works may go to Mr. Ruskin, from whom we take only this account of Turner's birth-place: "Near the southwest corner of Covent Garden a square brick pit, or well, is formed by a close-set block of houses, to the back windows of which it admits a few rays of light. Access to the bottom of it is obtained out of Maiden Lane, through a low archway and an iron gate; and if you stand long enough under the archway to accustom your eyes to the darkness, you may see on the left hand a narrow door, which formerly gave quiet access to a respectable barber's-shop, of which the front window, looking into Maiden Lane, is still extant, filled, in this year (1860), with a row of bottles connected, in some defunct manner, with a brewer's business. A more fashionable neighborhood, it is said, eighty years ago than now—never, certainly, a cheerful one—wherein a boy being born on St. George's Day, 1775, began soon after to take interest in the world of Covent Garden, and put to service such spectacles of life as it afforded."

William Turner, the father of Joseph Mallard William Turner, was a barber. He dressed wigs, shaved beards, and was so poor that he used to charge but a penny for a shave; and once, it is said, followed a customer down Maiden Lane to demand a half-penny extra for soap—a trait of closeness in bargaining which his son seems to have inherited from him. Once when the painter, then already famous and rich, was arranging with Messrs. Hurst and Robinson for a new work in numbers, the price of each drawing was settled, not without deliberation, at twenty-five pounds. He went away, expressing full satisfaction; but came speedily back, thrust his head in at the door, and cried "Guineas?"

"Guineas be it," said the publishers.

In a few minutes a hasty step was heard, and Turner put in his whole person, saying, "My expenses?"

"Oh, certainly, Sir," was the answer.

But this was not all: a few minutes after he was for a third time at the door, breathless and eager, with his whole body in the room, for he expected resistance to his new demand—"And twenty proofs?"

"Certainly," was again the reply, and the painter went off pleased.

Another time Turner had painted a picture for the famous Jack Fuller, and was asked by Fuller to breakfast with him the next morning, and to bring the picture with him, being told that the check for the picture would then be ready. To this Turner consented. He took the picture in a hackney-coach, breakfasted, received the check, thanked the purchaser, and left. He was not gone above five minutes when a knock was heard at the door—the painter was back:

"I must see Mr. Fuller."

He was shown in.

"Oh! I'd forgotten; there is three shillings for the hackney-coach."

The sum was paid. Fuller, who was laughing all the while, loved to relate this story to his friends.

Lord de Tabley, another of his patrons, did not take Turner's jewing so good-naturedly. Jerdan relates the story in his Autobiography: "Turner, of whom Lord de Tabley had been a most liberal patron, spent a day or two at Tabley when I was there. In the drawing-room stood a landscape on an easel, on which his lordship was at work as the fancy mood struck him. Of course, when assembled for the tedious half-hour before dinner, we all gave our opinions on its progress, its beauties, and its defects. I stuck a blue wafer on, to show where I thought a bit of bright color, or a light, would be advantageous; and Turner took the brush and gave a touch here and there, to mark some improvements. He returned to town, and—can it be credited?—the next morning at breakfast a letter from him was delivered to his lordship, containing a regular bill of charges for 'instructions in painting.' His lordship tossed it across the table indignantly to me, and asked if I could have imagined such a thing; and as indignantly, against my remonstrances, immediately sent a check for the sum demanded by the 'drawing-master.'"

Yet sometimes he was lavish in the midst of his general penuriousness. On a continental trip, Mr. Thomas Hunt, the well-known writer on Tudor architecture, accidentally encountered him on a continental excursion. Turner took a fancy to so excellent a boon companion, invited him to travel with him, and treated him in a princely style, without suffering him to pay a shilling through the whole of their tour.

To return, however, to Turner's boyhood: His first drawing is said to have been a lion, copied from an emblazoned coat-of-arms in the house of one of his father's customers. He went thither with another object—to take a lesson in hair-dressing from the practice of his father whom he accompanied; but the boy's attention was more occupied by the coat-of-arms on the table than with the old man's skill with the comb and curling-tongs. The rich colors in the arms attracted the lad's attention; but his imitation got no further than the lion.

The father was not displeased at this effort in an opposite direction to hair-dressing, for which he was intended. When asked, as he often was, "Well, Turner, what is William to be?" he would reply, with a look of delight, "William is going to be a painter." He was, accordingly, provided with water-colors and brushes, and the father was proud to show his customers the boy's colored drawings.

He soon evinced skill beyond these boyish exercises, and was employed to color prints by John Raphael Smith, the crayon-painter and mezzotinto engraver. Another of Smith's colorers at this period was Thomas Girtin, the founder of the English school of water-color art. Girtin (according to Bryan) was of the same age as Turner, and from him it was that Turner acquired his love for landscape-painting. Meanwhile his father did not attempt to make him a scholar, and the great painter never advanced far beyond the rudiments of an ordinary English education.

At this time he was very poor, and had of course to do a great deal of drudgery for a very small pittance. It was in the spirit with which he put himself to the most distasteful tasks that his real greatness showed itself. He never slighted the humblest piece of washing in color; and by this faithfulness he in time acquired that inimitable expertness of hand which was the wonder of all his contemporaries; and which enabled him, in after years, to literally make his pictures during the "varnishing days" at the Academy. His canvases, when first hung up, were often merely divided into large masses of blue, where the water or sky was to come, and the other portions laid out in broad orange-yellow, falling into delicate brown where the trees and landscapes were to be placed. This brilliant foundation was worked into detail and completed in the varnishing days, Turner being the first in the morning and the last to leave. His certainty in the command over his color, and the dexterity in his handling, seemed to change, in a few hours, "an unsubstantial pageant" into a finished landscape.

He was glad to hire himself out at sixty cents a night to wash in skies in Indian ink upon other people's drawings, getting his supper into the bargain. One of the men who thus employed him was Porden the architect, whose daughter, Eleanor, was the first wife of Sir John Franklin. Then he took to illustrating guide-books, almanacs, and any sort of books that wanted cheap frontispieces. "What could I have done better?" said he afterward; "it was first-rate practice." He did every thing carefully and conscientiously, never slobbering over his work because he was ill-remunerated for it. He aimed at learning as well as living; always doing his best, and never leaving a drawing without having made a step in advance upon his previous work. In this persistence of effort lay one of the chief secrets of his after greatness.

When only twelve years old he exhibited two drawings at the Royal Academy. This was the beginning of his career. He used to say that at this time his best academy was "the fields and Dr. Monro's parlor." The Doctor, who was a warm-hearted patron of young artists, had an excellent collection of water-color drawings and engravings at his house in the Adelphi, and he not only gave his two protégés, Turner and Girtin, free access to his treasures, with permission to copy them, but directed their studies, and encouraged them to make sketches of the scenery round London, which he readily purchased at prices satisfactory to the modest students. Nor was Turner unmindful of Monro's kindness. "There," said he, in a conversation with David Roberts—"there," pointing toward Harrow, "Girtin and I often walked to Bushey and back, to make drawings for good Dr. Monro, at half a crown a piece, and the money for our supper, when we got home."

Girtin, had he lived, would probably have been as great a painter as Turner was. At this time he was his master; and from him, and John Cozens, and one Dayes, Turner learned much. All three of these were men of the greatest promise, but lacked Turner's self-control and perseverance. Girtin died in 1802, of intemperance, leaving only some fine drawings behind him. Cozens died in a mad-house, in 1799; and Dayes committed suicide in 1804. Turner alone had patience to work and wait; and although many many years were passed in oblivion, and some of his greatest works were but poorly appreciated when first exhibited, the time came when he had his reward; and when he died, in 1852, his name was known and honored all over the civilized world. Had he died as young as Girtin, his name would only have survived as that of a second-rate painter.

Of the middle period of Turner's life not much is known. He was always a recluse, an uncompanionable man, absorbed in his art, and having his eyes too wide open to be able to use his mouth much. He kept most profoundly the mystery of his art, and never allowed a brother artist to see him at work. When he was painting for Lord Egremont at Petworth he worked with the room door locked, and only Lord Egremont was admitted by a certain pre-arranged knock. Chantrey, the sculptor, who was also staying in the house, bribed the butler to show him the peculiar signal, and then, one day, imitating Lord Egremont's peculiar walk and cough, gave the knock. The door was opened, and in walked Chantrey, to Turner's great annoyance, which he got over, however, by remembering that though once a painter Chantrey was then a sculptor.

He was very fond of fishing, his only amusement; and while staying at Petworth another time devoted himself so entirely to this, that one of the other guests remarked to the host, "Turner is going to leave without having done any thing; instead of painting he does nothing but fish." To every body's surprise, as he was on the point of leaving he produced two or three wonderful pictures, which he had painted in entire seclusion and reserve, in the morning before the family were up.

His conversation was sprightly, but desultory and disjointed. Like his works, it was eminently sketchy. He would converse for half an hour, and then be amused at finding his companion in doubt of what he had been talking about.

He either never knew, or never would tell, his birthday. One who was a fellow-student with him at the Academy, and his companion from boyhood, once said to him, "William, your birthday can't be far off? when is it? I want to drink a glass of wine to my old friend."

"Ah!" growled Turner, "never mind that; leave your old friend alone."

He was never married, and had no relations, except two or three cousins, to whom, probably, it never occurred to ascertain the day of his birth.

He wrote few letters, and these were, like his conversation, abrupt, and referred little to art.

The following, accepting an invitation to dine with his valued friend and patron, Mr. Windus, of Tottenham, on the occasion of his birthday, is characteristic: "My dear Sir,—Yes, with very great pleasure. I will be with you on the B. D. Many of them to yourself and Mrs. Windus; and, with the compliments of the season, believe me, yours faithfully, J. M. W. TURNER."

He had great activity of body, and a wonderful memory, and the secret of his success was his constant recourse to nature. He would walk through portions of England, twenty to twenty-five miles a day, with his little modicum of baggage at the end of a stick, sketching rapidly on his way all good pieces of composition, and marking effects with a power that daguerreotypied them in his mind with unerring truth at the happiest moment. There were few moving phenomena in clouds or shadows which he did not fix indelibly in his memory, though he might not call them into requisition for years afterward.

His pencil was always in use. An intimate friend, while traveling in the Jura, came to an inn where Turner had only just before entered his name in the visiting book. Anxious to be sure of his identity and to be in pursuit of him, he inquired of the host what sort of man his last visitor was. "A rough clumsy man," was the reply; "and you may know him by his always having a pencil in his hand."

He was always on the alert for any remarkable effects. In 1792, when he was eighteen years of age, the Pantheon in Oxford Street was burned down. It happened to be a hard frost at the time, and huge icicles were seen the next morning depending from different parts of the ruins. The young artist quickly repaired to the spot, and his picture, "The Pantheon on the Morning after the Fire," exhibited at the Royal Academy in the following May, witnessed the force with which the scene was impressed upon him. In like manner, the "Burning of the Houses of Parliament" forty years afterward was an event that could not escape the pencil of Turner. He repaired to the spot to make sketches of the fire at different points, and produced two pictures, one for the Academy, and another for the British Institution. Here was a glowing subject for his pallet. Lord Hill, on looking close to the latter picture, exclaimed, "What's this? Call this painting? Nothing but dabs!" But upon retiring and catching its magical effects, he added, "Painting! God bless me, so it is!"

Few were intimate with him, and few even knew him. Once, upon being told that an eminent publisher had boasted of having obtained admission to his studio, "How could you be such a fool as to believe it?" replied Turner, in his usual abrupt manner. And his reserve in this respect was responded to by a most faithful servant who had lived forty-two years with him, to the day of his death.

He had a peculiar dislike of having his address known, and to the last, with his immense wealth, lived poorly. Though he owned a house in London, he lived much in country lodgings. When he went to Chelsea he looked at lodgings, asked the price, found them cheap, and declared they were quite to his liking. But the landlady wanted reference.

"I will buy your house outright, my good woman," was the reply, somewhat angrily.

Then an agreement was wanted; met by an exhibition of bank-notes and sovereigns, and an offer to pay in advance; an offer which was quite satisfactory.

The painter's difficulties were not, however, yet over. The landlady wanted her lodger's name, "in case any gentleman should call." This was a worse dilemma.

"Name, name," he muttered to himself in his usual gruff manner. "What is your name?"

"My name is Mrs. Booth," was the reply.

"Then I am Mr. Booth;" and as Admiral Booth he was known in the neighborhood, his sailor-like appearance favoring this belief.

When his residence became known he changed it, and his ingenuity in baffling the curiosity of his friends was marvelous—almost equal to that of Dr. Paul Heffernan. Offers were made to walk home with him from the Athenæum Club for a chit-chat about Academy matters. No: he had got an engagement, and must keep it. Some of the younger sort attempted to follow him, but he managed to steal away from them, to tire them out, or pop into cheap omnibuses, or round dark corners. If he suspected that he was followed, he would set off for a tavern haunt; but as soon as this got to be known he left it, and the landlord lost his customer. Once his hiding-place was nearly discovered. Turner had dined with some friends at Greenwich, had drunk freely, and, on reaching town, was thought to be not sufficiently collected to call a cab. The party, as had been plotted, dropped off, and there was left with Turner only one friend, who placed him in a cab: thinking to catch the bemused painter unawares, he shut the cab-door, and said, "Where shall he drive to?"

Turner was not, however, to be caught, and collectedly replied, "Along Piccadilly, and I will tell him where."

Till he became known he lived in a room over his father's barber-shop. Then he changed to costlier lodgings, and when his father wished to retire from business he took care of him tenderly, till the old man died at the age of eighty-four. When Turner was elected to the Academy, he not only wrote A.R.A. after his name, but also changed the initials of his signature. Before, he had been content to exhibit as "W. Turner." From and after his elevation into the Academy he is "J. M. W. Turner" in Court Guides and Exhibition Catalogues.

He would never sit for his portrait, but several were taken of him surreptitiously. He thought his likeness would throw a doubt upon his works. "No one," said he, "would believe, upon seeing my figure, that I painted those pictures." The best and only finished portrait of him is, however, one of half-size, in oil, by J. Linnell. It was the result of a plot, which may now be revealed without offense to the honored victim. Rev. Mr. Daniell, a gentleman who was extremely intimate with Turner, prevailed upon his eccentric friend occasionally to dine with him. Linnell, without exciting any suspicion of his object, was always one of the party, and by sketching on his thumb-nail, and, unobserved, on scraps of paper, he at length succeeded in transferring the portly bust and sparkling eye of the great artist to his canvas. The picture was finished, and passed in due time, at the price of two hundred guineas, into the possession of Mr. Birch, a gentleman residing near Birmingham. Turner never knew it.

Mr. Peter Cunningham describes Turner as "short, stout, and bandy-legged, with a red, pimply face, imperious and covetous eyes, and a tongue which expressed his sentiments with a murmuring reluctance. Sir William Allan was accustomed to describe him as a Dutch skipper. His hands were very small, and, owing to the long cuffs to his coats, only his fingers were seen. His look was any thing but that of a man of genius."

But a second glance would find far more in his face than belongs to any ordinary mind. There was a peculiar keenness of expression in his eye which denoted constant habits of observation. His voice was deep and musical, but he was a confused and tedious speaker. He was very joyous at table, and was very apt at repartee. He was a social man in his nature; and Mr. Leslie considers the recluse manner in which he lived to have arisen from his strong wish to have his time entirely at his command.

Like most great men, he had a hobby for something else than his profession. As Rachel could never be convinced that her forte was not comedy, so Turner always desired to be a great poet. He is said to have left behind a long MS. poem, called the "Fallacies of Hope," which is chiefly known to the world by extracts from it which he used to put under his pictures; and of which none are either good enough or bad enough to be quoted here. He was very indifferent to praise; and it is curious to know, was not always pleased with Mr. Ruskin's eulogies. "He knows a great deal more about my pictures than I do," said Turner; "he puts things into my head and points out meanings in them that I never intended."

A well-known collector, with whom he had long been intimate, once invited Turner to be present at the opening of a new gallery, in which the principal pictures were from his pencil. To the disappointment of the connoisseur, he scarcely noticed them, but kept his eye fixed upon the ceiling. It was paneled and neatly grained in oak. "What are you looking at so intently?" said the host. "At those boards," was the reply; "the fellow who did that must have known how to paint." And nothing would induce him to turn to the magnificent pictures that sparkled on the walls. He never talked about his own pictures, but would occasionally give hints to other artists; and when these were adopted, they were always certain improvements.

He never allowed a picture of his own to be sold at public auction without trying to buy it in himself. So well was this known that the auctioneers made a point of calling his attention to the catalogue whenever they had any of his pictures for sale. If time pressed, and he was unable to attend in person, he would sometimes, but rarely, intrust his commission to the auctioneer; his ordinary practice was to send some agent, with written instructions, to bid in his behalf, and he was not always very fastidious in his selection. At the sale of the pictures of Mr. Green, the well-known amateur of Blackheath, two pictures by Turner were among the most attractive lots, though neither important in size nor of his best time. In those days their market value might have been about eighty guineas each. They would, however, have been knocked down for considerably less, but for the impetus given to the biddings by one of Turner's agents, whose personal appearance did not warrant the belief that he was in search of pictures of a very high order. He was, in fact, a clean, ruddy-checked, butcher's boy, in the usual costume of his vocation, and had made several advances, in five-guinea strides, before any thing belonging to him, excepting his voice, attracted Mr. Christie's notice. No sooner, however, did the veteran auctioneer discover what kind of customer he had to deal with, than he beckoned him forward, with a view, no doubt, of reproving him for his impertinence. The boy, however, nothing daunted, put a small piece of greasy paper into his hand—a credential, in fact, from the painter himself. The auctioneer smiled, and the biddings proceeded.

The first picture of Turner that came to this country was ordered by Mr. James Lenox, of New York city, who wrote to Mr. Leslie to inquire if a Turner could be had. Leslie replied that Turner's rooms being full of unsold pictures, doubtless he would part with one. Mr. Lenox then consented to give £500, and left the choice to Mr. Leslie. He called on Turner, and asked if he would let a picture go to America.

"No; they won't come up to the scratch." This referred to another American friend having offered him a low price for the "Téméraire."

Mr. Leslie named £500, which a friend would give for any thing Turner would part with.

His countenance brightened, and he said at once, "He may have that, or that, or that," pointing to three not small pictures.

Mr. Leslie chose a sunset view of Staffa. It was in an old frame, but Turner had a new frame made for it.

When it reached New York, and Mr. Lenox had hastily glanced at it, he wrote to Mr. Leslie, expressing his great disappointment. He almost fancied the picture had sustained some damage on the voyage, it appeared to him so indistinct throughout. Still, he did not doubt its being very fine, and he hoped to see its merits on further acquaintance; but the above was his then impression.

A night or two after Mr. Leslie received Mr. Lenox's letter he met Turner at the Academy, who asked if he had heard from Mr. Lenox; to which Mr. Leslie was obliged to say yes.

"Well, and how does he like the picture?"

"He thinks it indistinct."

"You should tell him," he replied, "that indistinctness is my fault."

This calls to mind a story of Turner which, it is believed, has never been in print. An engraver, engaged in transferring one of Turner's paintings to steel, came one morning to the great artist, and owned, not without hesitation and fear of exciting his anger, that, though he had tried his best, he could not distinguish what object was meant to be represented by a dab of bright color in the immediate fore-ground of the picture.

Turner looked at it for a while, then said:

"What do you think it is?"

"I can't tell, Sir," was the reply; "but if I were to make a guess I should think it might be a wheel-barrow."

"Very well! Then make it a wheel-barrow," said Turner, and dismissed the engraver. The shape of the object made no difference to him, but the color was every thing; and this great stress placed upon general effect and harmony of color in a picture probably led to that indistinctness in detail which he declared to be his weak point.

Turner was very chary of his opinions on art; but on the occasion we are about to relate he said more than was expected. He was taken to see the pictures of Thomson, of Duddingston, called by his countrymen, in the fondness of their admiration, "the Scottish Turner." The friend who took him was anxious to hear what the original Turner thought of his Scottish representative. Thomson, too, was equally eager. Turner examined with attention, mumbled some sounds of apparent approbation, but began and ended by asking, "Where do you get your frames, Mr. Thomson?"

We must close our paper with a few stories of Turner's expertness in coloring.

In 1839, when Constable exhibited his "Opening of Waterloo Bridge," it was placed in one of the small rooms at Somerset House, next to a sea-piece, by Turner—a gray picture, beautiful and true, but with no positive color in any part of it. Constable's "Waterloo" seemed as if painted with liquid gold and silver, and Turner came several times into the room while he was heightening with vermilion and lake the decorations and flags of the city barges. Turner stood behind him, looking from the "Waterloo" to his own picture, and at last brought his pallet from the Great Room, where he was touching another picture, and putting a round daub of red lead, somewhat bigger than a shilling, on his gray sea, went away without saying a word. The intensity of the red lead, made more vivid by the coolness of his picture, caused even the vermilion and lake of Constable to look weak. "I came into the room," says Mr. Leslie, "just as Turner left it." "He has been here," said Constable, "and fired a gun." On the opposite wall was a picture, by Jones, of "Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego in the Furnace." "A coal," said Cooper, "has bounced across the room from Jones's picture and set fire to Turner's sea." Turner did not come again into the room for a day and a half; and then, in the last moments that were allowed for painting, he glazed the scarlet seal he had put on his picture, and shaped it into a buoy.

In 1827, when Turner exhibited his "Rembrandt's Daughter," in a red robe, the portrait of a member of one of the Universities was hung by its side, with a college-gown that was still redder. Upon finding this out on varnishing day, Turner was observed to be very busy adding red lead and vermilion to his picture. "What are you doing there, Turner?" asked one of the hangers. "Why, you have checkmated me," was the reply, pointing to the University gown, "and I must now checkmate you."

One cold day Chantrey stopped before a picture by Turner, and seizing the artist's arm, placed his hands before a blaze of yellow, in an attitude of obtaining warmth, and said, with a look of delight, "Turner, this is the only comfortable place in the room. Is it true, as I have heard, that you have a commission to paint a picture for the Sun Fire Office?"

Many a lively gossip passed between these two friends. Turner had expressed an eccentric intention to be buried in his picture of "Carthage;" and said to Chantrey, "I have appointed you one of my executors; will you promise to see me rolled up in it?" "Yes," said Chantrey, "and I promise you also that as soon as you are buried I will see you taken up and unrolled." Mr. Leslie tells us this story was so generally believed, that when Turner died, in 1851, and Dean Milman heard he was going to be buried in St. Paul's, he said, "I will not read the service over him if he be wrapped up in that picture."

THE SLEIGHERS.

THE trackless fields are white with snow,
And mute the frozen river's flow;
The moon's rays pierce the shivering night
With arrowy beams of silver light;
Swift as the lithe and eager hound,
Away the merry sleighers bound:
With jingling sound of bells they go;
With hoofs that hardly touch the snow
The fleet steeds leave the following wind,
And dash the feathery flakes behind.

By frozen stream, through drifted ridge,
Across the crazy, sunken bridge;
Past sheltered farm and dreary waste,
Through untrod lanes they speed in haste;
By bristling woods, where gleam and glance
The iron Winter's icy lance;

By naked trees, whose stout limbs creak;
Past level tracts of landscape bleak;
And ever to a jingling tune,
And underneath a clear, cold moon.

Where glows the fire across the floor,
And ticks the clock behind the door;
Where sings the kettle on the hearth,
And rolls the kitten in its mirth;
With hands that ply the slender thread,
With stooping form and bended head,
She knits and nods, and knits again;
She sleeps and wakes, but wakes in vain—
Her hands drop down, her eyelids close
In gentle slumber's sweet repose.

The clock, within its case of oak,
Beats out the hour with measured stroke.
She hears subdued its ringing chime,
She counts each pulse, she marks the time,
She feels herself awake once more.
She lifts the latch and opens the door;
The sharp winds smite her on the cheek,
From distant uplands, cold and bleak;
She wonders at the hour so late,
And hurries to the garden-gate.

With eager gaze she strains her sight;
Far off along the turnpike white
A shadowy form appears to glide;
She flings the wicket open wide,
And stands with anxious heart and arms,
And breast that throbs with strange alarms,
As nears that shadowy form to view,
A spectral horse, a spectral crew;
An added chill is in the air,
She feels it blanch her silvery hair.

They heed her not, nor turn aside;
She follows with a hurried stride;
She clutches at the robe behind,
Her empty hands but grasp the wind.
In tones that wake the hills she cries;
The ghostly semblance faster flies;
She calls their names—they will not hear;
Her limbs grow weak with haste and fear;
And still she grasps the robe behind,
And still holds nothing but the wind.

By frozen stream, through drifted ridge,
Across the crazy, sunken bridge,
Past sheltered farm and dreary waste,
Through untrod lanes they speed in haste;
By bristling woods, where gleam and glance
The iron Winter's icy lance;
By naked trees, whose stout limbs creak;
Past level tracts of landscape bleak;
And ever to a ghostly tune,
And underneath a waning moon.

Her feet grow cold, her eyes grow dim,
Her throbbing head begins to swim;
There comes a mist across her sight—
An added darkness to the night;
She gropes with outstretched arm and hand;
Alas! she can no longer stand;

She droops, she falls upon the snow;
The failing moon is sinking low;
She feels the shadows o'er her creep,
And shudders in her icy sleep.

Once more her wasted strength returns;
The blood within her flows and burns;
She opens wide her wondering eyes
To twisted branch and glimmering skies:
The spectral horse and sleigh are fled:
From boughs that interlace o'erhead,
The icy blades, like fingers thin,
Point downward to the gloom within,
Where something like a shadow lies.
She upward springs: she forward flies.

She, trembling, kneels and lifts the veil:
The face is fixed and deathly pale;
The lips are ashen; cold as ice
The slender hands, clenched like a vice;
The eyes are glazed, the heart is dumb,
The rigid limbs are frozen numb;
The snows are matted with the hair
That falls, amid the shadows there,
Like tender moonlight in a room
Where all is doubtful, dusk, and gloom.

She stoops to kiss the clay-cold brow:
Her darling's arms are round her now:
Her lips are pressed by young lips warm:
She holds a living, breathing form;
Her darling's voice is in her ear;
She rubs her eyes, she can not hear,
Because of romping girls and boys,
Who shake the cottage with their noise;
Some laugh, some shout, and all declare
They found her sleeping in her chair.

ABOUT THOMAS HOOD.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

I HAVE been reading the Memorials of Hood, by his children, and wonder whether the book will have the same interest for others, and for younger people, as for persons of my own age and calling. Books of travel to any country become interesting to us who have been there. Men revisit the old school, though hateful to them, with ever so much kindness and sentimental affection. There was the tree under which the bully licked you: here the ground where you had to fag out on holidays—and so forth. In a word, my dear Sir, You are the most interesting subject to yourself of any that can occupy your worship's thoughts. I have no doubt a Crimean soldier, reading a history of that siege, and how Jones and the gallant 99th were ordered to charge, or what not, thinks—“Ah, yes, we of the 100th were placed so and so, I perfectly remember.” So with this memorial of poor Hood; it may have, no doubt, a greater interest for me than for others, for I was fighting, so to speak, in a different part of the field, and engaged a young subaltern in the Battle of Life, in which Hood fell, young still, and covered with glory. “The Bridge of Sighs” was his Corunna, his heights of Abraham—sickly, weak, wounded, he fell in the full blaze and fame of that great victory.

What manner of man was the genius who penned that famous song? What like was Wolfe, who climbed and conquered on those famous heights of Abraham? We all want to know details regarding men who have achieved famous feats, whether of war, or wit, or eloquence, or endurance, or knowledge. His one or two happy and heroic actions take a man's name and memory out of the crowd of names and memories. Henceforth he stands eminent. We scan him: we want to know all about him: we walk round and examine him, are curious, perhaps, and think are we not as strong and tall and capable as yonder champion? were we not bred as well, and could we not endure the winter's cold as well as he? Or we look up with all our eyes of admiration; will find no fault in our hero; declare his beauty and proportions perfect; his critics envious detractors, and so forth. Yesterday, before he performed his feat, he was nobody. Who cared about his birth-place, his parentage, or the color of his hair? To-day, by some single achievement, or by a series of great actions, to which his genius accustoms us, he is famous, and antiquarians are busy finding out under what schoolmaster's ferule he was educated, where his grandmother was vaccinated, and so forth. If half a dozen washing-bills of Goldsmith's were to be found to-morrow, would they not inspire a general interest, and be printed in a hundred papers? I lighted upon Oliver, not very long since, in an old Town and Country Magazine, at the Pantheon masquerade, “in an old English habit.” Straightway my imagination ran out to meet him, to look at him, to follow him about. I forgot the names of scores of fine gentlemen, of the past age, who were mentioned besides. We want to see this man who has amused and charmed us; who has been our friend, and given us hours of pleasant companionship and kindly thought. I protest when I came, in the midst of those names of people of fashion and beaux and demirips, upon those names—“Sir J. R-yn-ls, in a domino; Mr. Cr-d-ck and Dr. G-ldsm-th, in two old English dresses,” I had, so to speak, my heart in my mouth. What! you here, my dear Sir Joshua? Ah, what an honor and privilege it is to see you! This is Mr. Goldsmith? And very much, Sir, the ruff and the slashed doublet become you! Oh, Doctor! what a pleasure I had and have in reading the “Animated Nature.” How did you learn the secret of writing the decasyllable line, and whence that sweet wailing note of tenderness that accompanies your song? Was Beau Tibbs a real man, and will you do me the honor of allowing me to sit at your table at supper? Don't you think you know how he would have talked? Would you not have liked to hear him prattle over the Champagne?

Now Hood is passed away—passed off the earth as much as Goldsmith or Horace. The times in which he lived, and in which very many of us lived and were young, are changing or changed. I saw Hood once as a young man, at a dinner which seems almost as ghostly now as that masquerade at the Pantheon (1772), of which we were speaking anon. It was at a dinner of the Literary Fund, in that vast apartment which is hung round with the portraits of very large Royal Freemasons, now unsubstantial ghosts. There at the end of the room was Hood. Some publishers, I think, were our companions. I quite remember his pale face; he was thin and deaf, and very silent; he scarcely opened his lips during the dinner, and he made one pun. Some gentleman missed his snuff-box, and Hood said—(the Freemason's Tavern was kept, you must remember, by Mr. CUFF in those days, not by its present proprietors). Well, the box being lost, and asked for, and CUFF (remember that name) being the name of the landlord, Hood opened his silent jaws, and said * * * Shall I tell you what he said? It was not a very good pun which the great punster then made. Choose your favorite pun out of "Whims and Oddities," and fancy that was the joke which he contributed to the hilarity of our little table.

Where those asterisks are drawn on the page you must know a pause occurred, during which I was engaged with "Hood's Own," having been referred to the book by this life of the author which I have just been reading. I am not going to dissert on Hood's humor; I am not a fair judge. Have I not said elsewhere that there are one or two wonderfully old gentlemen still alive, who used to give me tips when I was a boy? I can't be a fair critic about them. I always think of that sovereign, that rapture of raspberry tarts, which made my young days happy. Those old sovereign-contributors may tell stories ever so old, and I shall laugh; they may commit murder, and I shall believe it was justifiable homicide. There is my friend Baggs, who goes about abusing me, and, of course, our dear mutual friends tell me. Abuse away, mon bon! You were so kind to me when I wanted kindness that you may take the change out of that gold now, and say I am a cannibal and negro, if you will. Ha, Baggs! Dost thou wince as thou readest this line? Does guilty conscience throbbing at thy breast tell thee of whom the fable is narrated? Puff out thy wrath, and, when it has ceased to blow, my Baggs shall be to me as the Baggs of old—the generous, the gentle, the friendly.

No, on second thoughts, I am determined I will not repeat that joke which I heard Hood make. He says he wrote these jokes with such ease that he sent manuscripts to the publishers faster than they could acknowledge the receipt thereof. I won't say that they were all good jokes, or that to read a great book full of them is a work at present altogether jocular. Writing to a friend respecting some memoir of him which had been published, Hood says, "You will judge how well the author knows me, when he says my mind is rather serious than comic." At the time when he wrote these words, he evidently undervalued his own serious power, and thought that in punning and broad-grinning lay his chief strength. Is not there something touching in that simplicity and humility of faith? "To make laugh is my calling," says he; "I must jump, I must grin, I must tumble, I must turn language head over heels, and leap through grammar;" and he goes to his work humbly and courageously, and what he has to do that does he with all his might, through sickness, through sorrow, through exile, poverty, fever, depression—there he is, always ready to his work, and with a jewel of genius in his pocket! Why, when he laid down his puns and pranks, put the motley off, and spoke out of his heart, all England and America listened with tears and wonder! Other men have delusions of conceit and fancy themselves greater than they are, and that the world slights them. Have we not heard how Liston always thought he ought to play Hamlet? Here is a man with a power to touch the heart almost unequaled, and he passes days and years in writing "Young Ben he was a nice young man," and so forth. To say truth, I have been reading in a book of "Hood's Own" until I am perfectly angry. "You great man, you good man, you true genius and poet," I cry out, as I turn page after page. "Do, do make no more of these jokes, but be yourself, and take your station."

When Hood was on his death-bed, Sir Robert Peel, who only knew of his illness, not of his imminent danger, wrote to him a noble and touching letter, announcing that a pension was conferred on him:

"I am more than repaid," writes Peel, "by the personal satisfaction which I have had in doing that for which you return me warm and characteristic acknowledgments.

"You perhaps think that you are known to one, with such multifarious occupations as myself, merely by general reputation as an author; but I assure you that there can be little which you have written and acknowledged which I have not read; and that there are few who can appreciate and admire more than myself the good sense and good feeling which have taught you to infuse so much fun and merriment into writings correcting folly and exposing absurdities, and yet never trespassing beyond those limits within which wit and facetiousness are not very often confined. You may write on with the consciousness of independence, as free and unfettered, as if no communication had ever passed between us. I am not conferring a private obligation upon you, but am fulfilling the intentions of the legislature, which has placed at the disposal of the Crown a certain sum (miserable, indeed, in amount) to be applied to the recognition of public claims on the bounty of the Crown. If you will review the names of those whose claims have been admitted on account of their literary or scientific eminence, you will find an ample confirmation of the truth of my statement.

"One return, indeed, I shall ask of you—that you will give me the opportunity of making your personal acquaintance."

And Hood, writing to a friend, inclosing a copy of Peel's letter, says: "Sir R. Peel came from Burleigh on Tuesday night, and went down to Brighton on Saturday. If he had written by post I should not have had it till to-day. So he sent his servant with the inclosed on Saturday night; another mark of considerate attention." He is frightfully unwell, he continues, his wife says he looks quite green: but ill as he is, poor fellow, "his well is not dry. He has pumped out a sheet of Christmas fun, is drawing some cuts, and shall write a sheet more of his novel."

O sad, marvelous picture of courage, of honesty, of patient endurance, of duty struggling against pain! How noble Peel's figure is standing by that sick bed! how generous his words, how dignified and sincere his compassion! And the poor dying man, with a heart full of natural gratitude toward his noble benefactor, must turn to him and say: "If it be well to be remembered by a minister, it is better still not to be forgotten by him in a 'hurly Burleigh!'" Can you laugh? Is not the joke horribly pathetic from the poor dying lips? As dying Robin Hood must fire a last shot with his bow—as one reads of Catholics on their death-beds putting on a Capuchin dress to go out of the world—here is poor Hood at his last hour putting on his ghastly motley, and uttering one joke more.

He dies, however, in dearest love and peace with his children, wife, friends; to the former especially his whole life had been devoted, and every day showed his fidelity, simplicity, and affection. In going through the record of his most pure, modest, honorable life, and living along with him, you come to trust him thoroughly, and feel that here is a most loyal, affectionate, and upright soul, with whom you have been brought into communion. Can we say as much of all lives of all men of letters? Here is one, at least, without guile, without pretension, without scheming, of a pure life, to his family and little modest circle of friends tenderly devoted.

And what a hard work, and what a slender reward! In the little domestic details with which the book abounds, what a simple life is shown to us! The most simple little pleasures and amusements delight and occupy him. You have revels on shrimps; the good wife making the pie; details about the maid, and criticisms on her conduct; wonderful tricks played with the plum-pudding—all the pleasures centering round the little humble home. One of the first men of his time, he is appointed editor of a magazine at a salary of £300 per annum, signs himself exultingly "Ed. N. M. M.," and the family rejoice over the income as over a fortune. He goes to a Greenwich dinner—what a feast and rejoicing afterward!

"Well, we drank 'the Boz' with a delectable clatter, which drew from him a good warm-hearted speech. . . . He looked very well, and had a younger brother along with him. . . . Then we had songs. Barham chanted a Robin Hood ballad, and Cruikshank sang a burlesque ballad of Lord II—; and somebody, unknown to me, gave a capital imitation of a French showman. Then we toasted Mrs. Boz, and the Chairman, and Vice, and the Traditional Priest sang the 'Deep, deep sea,' in his deep, deep voice; and then we drank to Procter, who wrote the said song; also Sir J. Wilson's good health, and Cruikshank's, and Alnsworth's: and a Manchester friend of the latter sang a Manchester ditty, so full of trading stuff that it really seemed to have been not composed but manufactured. Jerdan, as Jerdanish as usual on such occasions—you know how paradoxically he is quite at home in dining out. As to myself, I had to make my second maiden speech, for Mr. Monckton Milnes proposed my health in terms my modesty might allow me to repeat to you, but my memory won't. However, I ascribed the toast to my notoriously bad health, and assured them that their wishes had already improved it—that I felt a brisker circulation—a more genial warmth about the heart, and explained that a certain trembling of my hand was not from palsy, or my old ague, but an inclination in my hand to shake itself with every one present. Whereupon I had to go through the friendly ceremony with as many of the company as were within reach, besides a few more who came express from the other end of the table. Very gratifying, wasn't it? Though I can not go quite so far as Jane, who wants me to have that hand chopped off, bottled, and preserved in spirits. She was sitting up for me, very anxiously, as usual when I go out, because I am so domestic and steady, and was down at the door before I could ring at the gate, to which Boz kindly sent me in his own carriage. Poor girl! what would she do if she had a wild husband instead of a tame one."

And the poor anxious wife is sitting up, and fondles the hand which has been shaken by so many illustrious men! The little feast dates back only eighteen years, and yet somehow it seems as distant as a dinner at Mr. Thrall's, or a meeting at Will's.

Poor little gleam of sunshine! very little good cheer enlivens that sad simple life. We have the triumph of the magazine; then a new magazine projected and produced; then illness and the last scene, and the kind Peel by the dying man's bedside, speaking noble words of respect and sympathy, and soothing the last throbs of the tender honest heart.

I like, I say, Hood's life even better than his books, and I wish, with all my heart, Monsieur et cher confrère, the same could be said for both of us, when the ink-stream of our life hath ceased to run. Yes; if I drop first, dear Baggs, I trust you may find reason to modify some of the unfavorable views of my character, which you are freely imparting to our mutual friends. What ought to be the literary man's point of honor nowadays? Suppose, friendly reader, you are one of the craft, what legacy would you like to leave to your children? First of all (and by Heaven's gracious help) you would pray and strive to give them such an endowment of love as should last certainly for all their lives, and perhaps be transmitted to their children. You would (by the same aid and blessing) keep your honor pure, and transmit a name unstained to those who have a right to bear it. You would—though this faculty of giving is one of the easiest of the literary man's qualities—you would, out of your earnings, small or great, be able to help a poor brother in need, to dress his wounds, and, if it were but twopence, to give him succor. Is the money which the noble Macaulay gave to the poor lost to his family? God forbid. To the loving hearts of his kindred is it not rather the most precious part of their inheritance? It was invested in love and righteous doing, and it bears interest in heaven. You will, if letters be your vocation, find saving harder than giving and spending. To save be your endeavor too, against the night's coming when no man may work; when the arm is weary with the long day's labor; when the brain perhaps grows dark; when the old, who can labor no more, want warmth and rest, and the young ones call for supper.

WATCHING AND WISHING.

OH, would I were the golden light
That shines around thee now,
As slumber shades the spotless white
Of that unclouded brow!
It watches through each changeful dream
Thy features' varied play;
It meets thy waking eyes' soft gleam
By dawn—by op'ning day.

Oh, would I were the crimson veil
Above thy couch of snow,
To dye that cheek so soft, so pale,
With my reflected glow!
Oh, would I were the cord of gold
Whose tassel set with pearls
Just meets the silken cov'ring's fold
And rests upon thy curls.

Dishevel'd in thy rosy sleep,
And shading soft thy dreams;
Across their bright and raven sweep
The golden tassel gleams!
I would be any thing for thee,
My love—my radiant love—
A flower, a bird, for sympathy,
A watchful star above.

THE HISTORY OF A FABLE.

AN EPISODE FROM THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE.

WHEN we compare closely the literary history of different peoples and ages we can not fail to remark how little of what is supposed to be nationally characteristic is really new, and how much is but a repetition, or at most but a development, of something which has existed before. It would appear almost as though the germs of certain forms of literary conception existed naturally in the human mind, and only awaited the genial impulse from without which was to bring them forth; while other forms pass, often by routes which we can no longer trace, from people to people, receiving more or less development in their onward progress. The literature itself is a long existing—a primitive and enduring—fact, while that which constitutes temporary or national character is an accidental modification. The case of dramatic literature, which at first glance would seem least capable of being reconciled with this fact, is indeed an apt example of the first of these classes of development, that of natural growth; for though the modern drama and the drama of antiquity are sufficiently alike to have been one imitated from the other, yet nothing is more certain than that they are perfectly independent formations, each having originated similarly in primeval religious ceremonies, and gone through a very similar course of growth. The development of modern dramatic literature had been almost completed before the moderns had any intimate knowledge of the ancient theatre. We are, of course, here using the word modern in contradistinction to antiquity, in the usual historical sense of the word, and include under it the Middle Ages. We shall best display the history of the other, the migratory class of popular literature, by tracing it in one of its simplest forms; and perhaps we could not give a better example than that which is presented in the history of a fable.

That a fable is a class of literature not altogether to be despised even in the present age, is a fact which has been proclaimed to the world by a minister of state, our present Home Secretary, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, in a scholar-like edition of the Greek fables of Babrius, which, it may be added by-the-way, have just been carefully translated into English verse by another classical scholar who is favorably known to the world, the Rev. James Davies. Sir George holds that the fable originated in Greece; but his arguments appear to us by no means conclusive, and we are inclined to adopt a different opinion. The characteristic feature of this class of stories—which consists in making animals act, reason, and talk like men—is itself so singular, and so contrary to universal experience, that we can only imagine it to have been invented in a peculiar condition of the popular intelligence; and such a condition, as far as we know, is presented to us alone in the religious creed of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, held by the ancient inhabitants of India. It is exactly in the literature of this people that we find what appear to be the oldest fables known; and these fables have a peculiar character of their own which identifies them with the people and the country. In such of them as are identical with the ancient or medieval fables current in Europe, we see at once, on a comparison, the change which has taken place in their transmission to accommodate the difference of circumstances in their new location; and this has sometimes so modified the story, as to render it only fully intelligible when we can recur to the original. Thus, an old European story tells us how six men played a trick upon a country-fellow, who was carrying a lamb for sale in the market. They agree to meet him one by one, and to persist in the same story that it was a dog he was carrying, and not a lamb. In the sequel, the astonishment of the rustic becomes so great that he lets them carry off the lamb in triumph. It must be confessed that there is not much point in this story; but when we look to its Indian original, we have no further difficulty in understanding it. There the victim is a Brahmin, who is carrying in his arms a goat intended for a religious sacrifice, when he meets three robbers, who, by a previous arrangement, one after another, and apparently without complicity, call the goat a dog. Now a dog was, in the Brahminical creed, an unclean animal, and the moment the Brahmin's belief in the kind of animal he carried was shaken he threw it down in horror and fled. Again, in the well-known story, current in almost every country of medieval Europe, and localized as a Welsh legend at Beddgelert, on the slopes of Snowdon, of the man who had slaughtered his favorite hound in the hasty belief that it had caused the death of his child, but discovered, when too late, that the dog had, on the contrary, saved the child's life by killing a serpent which had attempted to destroy it, there is something not much in accordance with European sentiments in the notion of a dog killing a serpent. But in the original story, in the Sanscrit, it is a favorite mangoust, or ichneumon, for which a dog has been substituted in the European version of the story. This change makes all clear; for among the ancient Hindoos the mangoust was domesticated like a cat, and served the same purpose of killing rats and mice; and we know that that animal, when in a wild state, kills and eats serpents. Every reader will remember the old Æsopian fable of "The Cat and the Goddess Venus." A cat fell in love with a handsome young man, and petitioned the goddess to change her into a beautiful woman. Venus granted her prayer, and the cat, thus metamorphosed, was espoused to the object of her admiration; but one day, as they were fondling on a couch, Venus, rather maliciously, let loose a mouse in the room, which the transformed cat no sooner saw than she sprang from the couch and pursued to kill and eat it. The goddess, indignant at seeing that she had preserved an instinct so unbecoming in a lady, restored her at once to her original shape. "This fable," says the moral, "shows that men who are naturally bad, although they change condition and place, never change their manners." The story, as thus told, is but a clumsy one, and is certainly a very far-fetched illustration of its moral, while it is not at all accordant with Greek notions. But let us turn to the East, and the whole difficulty is cleared up. The fable is found in the earliest Sanscrit collections, where it certainly differs very much in form from its Greek representative. A holy hermit was walking one day by the side of a fountain, when a mouse, dropped accidentally from the beak of a raven, fell at his feet. Moved with pity, he took it up and carried it home; and not liking its shape of a mouse, he prayed his god to change it into a little girl; and his prayer was granted. Under the holy hermit's care the little girl in due time became a young woman, ready for marriage; and one day he said to her, "Choose in all nature the being you desire, and I promise you that he shall be your husband." "I desire," said the damsel, "a husband so strong that he can not be conquered." The hermit imagined that the sun was the strongest of beings, and went immediately to ask him to take his protégée for a wife. The sun excused himself, alleging that he was not so strong as the cloud, inasmuch as the latter could prevent him from shining. The hermit then addressed himself to the cloud; but the cloud similarly yielded the palm of superiority in strength to the wind, which blew him this way, and that way, at will. The wind, who did not seem to approve the match any more than those to whom it had been offered before, said that he was not so strong as the mountain, who often broke his force; and the mountain yielded the superiority to the rat, who, he said, made holes into his side whether he would or not, and penetrated to his entrails. When the holy hermit addressed himself to the rat, the latter accepted the offer of marriage at once, adding that he had been long seeking a wife. The holy hermit felt somewhat humiliated by the turn things had taken; but he returned to his home in full belief that the young lady would reject this proposal in disgust. When, however, he found that she was not only willing to accept it, but that she was actually impatient for the union, he became so indignant that he prayed his god to change her again into a mouse; and his petition, as before, was granted. All this is perfectly consistent with the creed of the ancient Hindoos.

The fable, indeed, appears to have been indigenous only to the people of India. The Persians and Arabs received it from them at known periods; and, although a French scholar of the last generation has rather ingeniously supposed that the book of Proverbs is only a collection of the moralizations to a large book of fables written by Solomon, it seems doubtful if what is properly called a fable existed in the ancient literature of the Hebrews. The biblical examples, in Judges (ix. 7) and 2 Kings (xiv. 9), in which trees are introduced, may be considered as allegories rather than as true fables. In the national literature of the Anglo-Saxons, which is the only existing representative of that of the Teutonic race in its oldest and purest form, there is no trace of the fable; and it was probably alike unknown to the Celts. But we find it at a rather remote period in Greece. One of the earliest of Greek poets, Hesiod, who has been carried back to a date of almost fabulous antiquity, quotes the well-known fable of the nightingale and the hawk, one of the first of the common collection of Æsop's fables. Herodotus, in the fifth century before Christ, introduces Cyrus quoting to the Ætolians the fable of the fisherman who played on his flute to the fishes, which is also one of the Æsopian collection. From this time these fables are frequently referred to in the Greek writers, who sometimes quote them by the name of Æsop; and there can be no doubt of the existence in Greece, before the Christian era, of a collection of such fables under that name. The earliest collection now known to exist is that of Phædrus, the freedman of Augustus, who professes to have translated into Latin verse from Æsop's original; but his language may leave room for a doubt whether he really translated from a written collection of fables professing to be the work of Æsop, or only made a collection of Æsopian fables, and published them in Latin verse. The earliest Greek collection of these fables is that already alluded to, which bears the name of Babrius, and which has only come to the knowledge of modern scholars in our own time. Sir George Cornewall

Lewis, we think, rightly supposes Babrius to have lived at the close of the second century after Christ; and he also professes only to have translated Æsop's fables into Greek choliambic verse: but his language on the subject is equally equivocal with that of Phædrus. The book of Æsop's fables in Greek prose, with which we are all so well acquainted, is no doubt a compilation of a much later date; and the still later life of Æsop is a greater fable than all the rest. The result of modern historical research has been to raise a strong spirit of incredulity; and it is wonderful how many things we are nowadays obliged to disbelieve, in which our predecessors put implicit faith. We confess ourselves to be among those who disbelieve in Æsop. Who believes in Sam Weller, or in the Clock-maker? yet the time may come some ages hence, when each of these worthies will be looked upon as a real personage who had lived in the world, and delivered from his own mouth all the sage remarks which go under his name. So we imagine it was with the Æsop of the fables; he was a creation, not of the mind of an individual, but of the mind of the people—a fable himself. Perhaps the statement that he was a Phrygian conceals some traditionary or legendary conviction that the fables came from the East: Babrius pretends that they originated with the Assyrians, and he traces them back to the primeval times of Belus and Ninus. Of this we think there can be little doubt, from a comparison of the Æsopian with the Sanscrit collections, that the Greeks originally derived the fable from India, though it is not easy now to point out the particular route by which it came. Sir George Lewis, in support of the theory that the fable was indigenous to Greece, insists on the fact that the animals introduced in the Æsopian collection were all, at one time or other, natives of that country; but this can hardly be allowed as an argument of much force, as a change of animals would be one of the natural modifications through which such compositions would pass in their transmission from people to people. We have already quoted remarkable examples of this process, and we might multiply them without difficulty. Thus, in one of the most important personages in the sequel of the history of the fable—the jackal of the Indian fable was changed in the Greek for the fox. A jackal and a fox are certainly not the same thing; but they have traits of character in common, and the latter was much better known to the Greeks than the former.

It was in medieval Europe that the fable had reached its highest pitch of importance. We have already stated that there are no traces of its existence in the primitive literature of the Teutonic race; but medieval Europe received the fables of antiquity in two different directions, which circumstance was eventually the cause of considerable modifications. In the first place, the fables of Æsop had been republished during the latter ages of the Roman empire, frequently, and under a variety of different forms. In the fifth century, as it is supposed, an Italian, named Avianus, or Avienus, translated a selection of the fables of Æsop into elegiac verse, which was then better appreciated than the iambs of Phædrus. At a still later period another worthy turned the greater part of Phædrus into rather barbarous Latin prose, and gave this collection to the world under the name of Romulus. From this time Phædrus himself was superseded and forgotten, and Avienus and Romulus were the old Latin books of fables best known to the medieval writers, and became the foundation of most of the medieval collections of Æsopian fables. They were translated at a rather early period into French verse, under the titles of "Ysopets" and "Avionets," familiar diminutives of the names of Æsop and Avienus. In the first half of the thirteenth century an Anglo-Norman poetess, named Marie, in our island, translated the fables of Romulus into Anglo-Norman verse, and this became the most popular collection of the purely Æsopian fables in the Romance dialects of the Middle Ages. Marie imagined that the fables she was putting into verse were a collection made by command of the "Emperor Romulus," and translated from Greek into Latin by his servant "Ysopes" (Æsop).

Again, let us return to the East. The earliest collection of the fables of India, known at present, is one published in Sanscrit, under the title of "Pantcha-tantra" (the five chapters), at a date which seems uncertain, but is not placed later than the fifth century of our era. It was, doubtless, a collection of fables already popular. At the beginning of the sixth century the Persian monarch, Noushirvan, whose ears the fame of this book had reached, sent one of his learned men to India to obtain a copy of it, and employed him in translating it into the language of his own people, the Pehlvi, or ancient Persian. In this language it was accordingly published, under the title of the "Book of Kalila and Dimna," from the names of the two principal actors in it, and its authorship was ascribed to a "sage" named Bidpai, which, by mistaking the letters of the Arabian alphabet, has been corrupted into Pilpay. After the conquest of Persia by the Arabs, in the eighth century, this work was translated from Persian into Arabic, in which latter language, but under the same title, it has continued ever since to be a popular book. Bidpai, and another well-known Oriental fabulist, Lockman (whom the Arabian writers pretended was a near relative of Job!), and Æsop, are no doubt personages whose existence is equally authentic. The knowledge of these Oriental collections came to Western Europe by two different routes—first from Spain, which in the Middle Ages possessed one of the most flourishing schools of Arabian learning; and, secondly, through the relations with Syria established by the crusades, which soon made Europeans acquainted with the Arabian minstrels and storytellers. The former route led through direct translations, generally made by learned Jews who had been converted to Christianity. Thus, in the thirteenth century, a converted Jew, known as a Christian by the name of John of Capua, translated into Latin the "Book of Kalila and Dimna;" and, in the century before, another converted Jew, a Spaniard, who took, as a Christian, the name of Petrus Alfonsi, gave to the world a similar translation of a collection of Oriental stories, under the title of "Disciplina Clericalis," in which there are a number of fables. This new accession of fiction produced a great effect upon the medieval fabulists. It not only enabled them to modify greatly, and to add to, the stories of the ancient Greek and Roman fabulists, but it excited a spirit of invention, which gave rise to what may almost be called a new school of fable. It is only one of many instances in which commixture produces force. Under its influence, indeed, we not only find a new importation of fables, but fables of medieval invention begin to appear in great abundance. In illustration of the former class, we may mention, as a curious circumstance, that in the Anglo-Norman fables of Marie, translated from Romulus, the old classical fable of the cat transformed by Venus into a woman has given place to the parallel story of the Sanscrit collection, in which, however, all the transformation is omitted. This, in fact, was not at all in accordance with the medieval idea of a fable. According to Marie's fable the mouse once became so proud that he could not find among his own race a female whom he would condescend to take for his wife, but he resolved to make a very high match. Accordingly, he went to the sun, supposing him to be the most powerful of all beings, and proposed for his daughter. The sun declined the match, and sent the suitor to the cloud, alleging the superior power of the latter, who could prevent his shining. The mouse accordingly went to the cloud, and proposed for his daughter, but he was similarly rejected, and recommended to the wind, who could drive the cloud before him, and who, in his turn, referred him to the tower built of stone, as being able to resist the wind. The mouse proceeded to the tower to make the same demand, but the tower told the applicant that he was mistaken in his estimate of his strength, for there was a little mouse which made holes into his walls without asking his permission, and pierced his mortar and stones, while he, the tower, had not power to resist. The mouse was thus, at last, in spite of his ambition, obliged to unite himself with one of his own race.

In the medieval fable the animals became more intimately identified with the class of persons they represented than in that of the ancients, and instead of acting merely their individual parts in each fable in which they appeared, the part each acted was a continuous one, and became gradually representative of some one or other class of feudal society. The lion thus became the feudal monarch, the wolf was the brutal and oppressive baron, the fox was the crafty intriguer, who usually ended by gaining the mastery by his superior cunning over both king and baron, and so on with the other characters. Under the influence of this spirit the different animals took names in some way or other characteristic of the parts they acted, so that the wolf became Monsieur Isengrim; the bear, Dan Berenger; the fox, Master Renard; the cat, Madame Tibert; and so on with the others. A point of unity was thus established among the fables of all ages and all peoples, by whatever route they might come, which, among its other creations, produced one of the most remarkable popular literary monuments of the Middle Ages, the history of Reynard the Fox. Few literary works have been the subject of so much discussion, or of so many conflicting opinions, as this curious story; but the explanation of it is simple enough when we consider it as a continuous combination of fables, a general picture of society in the Middle Ages, instead of a mere unconnected series of satires on some of its salient points. To the man who understands thoroughly the Middle Ages, "Reynard the Fox" is but a natural result of the combination of the fables of Greece and India under medieval influence: and nowhere in the history of fiction is this influence more strongly developed. Even a brief consideration of any of the questions relating to this celebrated work would lead us far away from the subject more immediately under our consideration, and we shall therefore avoid them, and shall content ourselves with merely quoting one of its numerous episodes. There arose in the Middle Ages a sudden and marvelous spirit of inquiry, which sought causes and reasons for every thing, and in its equally extraordinary credulity found ready explanations, which were often, to say the least, very odd ones. One of the questions which presented itself to the medieval fabulists was, Why did the different animals introduced into the fables possess those particular traits of character which fitted them for their apparently artificial rôle? Listen to the rather characteristic reply to this question given in the thirteenth century by the compiler of the great French metrical romance of "Reynard." When Adam and Eve were driven out of Paradise, the Creator, in his compassion for them, gave the former a wand, and told him that, if he should be in want of any thing, he need only go to the sea-shore and strike the water with that wand and he should find relief. Accordingly, the first pair went on the sands, and Adam struck the sea with his wand. Immediately a lamb came out of it. "There!" said he to Eve, "take care of this animal, for as it grows it will give us milk and cheese." (Eve's milk appears to have been much used in the Middle Ages.) Eve, instead of being grateful, was envious of Adam's success, and she thought in herself that if she had a chance she would get a better lamb than her husband had gotten; so, while he was looking aside, she seized the wand and struck the sea. A furious wolf rushed out of the waves, seized the lamb, and carried it off into the woods. When Eve saw that she had lost her lamb, she uttered cries of distress which roused Adam, and he took the wand from her and again struck the sea. A dog sprang out, followed the wolf, and rescued the lamb. Eve, not yet satisfied, made another trial of the wand, and the result was the appearance of the fox. Thus Adam and Eve went on striking alternately, the father of mankind always drawing from the depths of the ocean animals which became domesticated and were beneficial to society, while every attempt of Eve produced some wild and noxious beast. Thus it was that the wolf, and the fox, and the other animals which figure in the fables, came into the world with the various tempers which have given them their celebrity.

Several causes combined in giving importance to the fable in the Middle Ages, of which it will only be necessary to mention one. This class of literary composition had fallen into the hands of the clergy, and had effected a complete revolution in their style of predication, especially with those, such as the preaching friars, who aimed at popularity. A sermon was now often a mere string of fables and stories, with moralizations by which they were made to illustrate the general subject of the discourse, sometimes in the most unexpected and incongruous manner. Thus, with the medieval fabulists, the moralization of the fable was much more important than the story. At the same time the necessity for number and variety set men to work inventing fables, and especially their applications; and the latter became more particular and personal. They were no longer short moralizations in general terms, but they were filled with contemporary satire, and from time to time they hand down to us very singular pictures of private as well as public life. The quantity of compositions of this kind which was produced in the Middle Ages is almost incredible; and as the number went on increasing, the different collections published for the use of the preacher filled ponderous volumes in folio. One of the earlier of this class of fabulists was an English ecclesiastic, called Odo de Cirington—at least, this seems to be the name for which there is the best authority, for no place from which he could have taken it is at present known. He appears to have lived in the latter part of the twelfth century. There is a peculiar naïveté in his stories, which amuses us, in spite of the poverty of his inventive powers, while he spares no class of society in their application. Here is an example: "One day," he says, "the raven stole the dove's young one. The dove went to the nest of the raven to implore him to release her offspring. Then the raven asked her, 'Can you sing?' The dove replied, 'I can; but not well.' The raven said, 'Sing to me.' And the dove sang as well as she could; but the raven said, 'Sing better, or you shall not have your young bird.' The dove replied, 'I am not able to sing better.' 'Then,' said the raven, 'you shall not have your young one.' And the raven and his wife together ate it up. Thus," says our author, Master Odo, "the rich men and bailiffs carry off the ox or sheep of some poor man, and invent some charge against him. The poor man offers bail, and asks for the liberation of his cattle, and he is ready to give five shillings, or more or less, accordingly to his means. The bailiff says to him, 'Brother, can not you sing better? Unless you sing better you shall not have bail.' Says the poor man, 'It is not in my power to sing better, because I am needy and poor, and am not able to give more.' Then the rich man or bailiff either detains the cattle, or afflicts the poor man in some other way, and thus devours him." Master Odo was not very lenient, even to his own class—the clergy; for here is another of his fables, having special reference to them. "A black beetle, flying over the country, passed among most beautiful trees in full bloom, among orchards, and roses, and lilies, in the most pleasant places, till at length he threw himself upon a dunghill, composed of the dung of horses, and there he found his wife, who asked him where he had been. And the beetle said, 'I have been flying round the whole earth; I have seen the blossoms of almonds, and lilies, and roses, but I have never seen so pleasant a place as this,' pointing to the dunghill. Thus," says the moral, "thus many clergy and monks, as well as laymen, have read the lives of the fathers, pass among the lilies of the valley, among the roses of the martyrs, and among the violets of the confessors, but nowhere seems to them so pleasant and agreeable as a harlot, or the tavern, or a singing party, which is a stinking dunghill and the congregation of sinners." We may risk another example in the same spirit. "It happened that the wolf was dead, and the lion assembled the beasts, and caused the funeral rites to be performed. The hare carried the holy water, hedgehogs bore the tapers, goats rung the bells, badgers dug the grave, foxes carried the corpse on the bier, Berengarius or the bear celebrated mass, the ass read the epistle, and the ox the gospel. When the mass was celebrated, and Isengrim buried, the animals feasted splendidly on his goods, and wished for another burial like it." Such is the fable; and here is the moral, which is certainly not over-complimentary to the monks and friars, who are supposed to have been the lights of old England in "the ages of faith." "So it happens frequently," saith the pious Odo de Cirington, "on the death of a rich extortioner or usurer, the abbot or prior causes the convent of beasts—that is," he says, "of people living like beasts—to assemble. For," he adds, by way of further explanation, "it is often the case that in any convent of monks there are none but beasts, for they are lions by reason of their pride, hares by their levity of mind, stinking goats by their drunkenness and excess, hedgehogs by their timidity, for they tremble with fear where there is no need for it, inasmuch as they fear to lose their temporalities, which is not to be feared, and they do not fear to lose heaven, of which they have great room for fear. They are called oxen, which plow the earth, because they labor more on earthly than on heavenly things," etc. If Master Odo is rough upon the Church, neither is he over-complacent toward knighthood. One fable tells us how great barons sometimes enriched themselves by robbing on the highway, as though it were not at all an unusual thing. Another is still less complimentary to some of our English knights, especially when we consider that it was probably written in the time of the lion-hearted monarch, Richard I. "There is a certain bird, called in Spain St. Martin's bird, about as small as a wren, with slender, long legs like rushes. It happened on a hot, sunny day, about Martinmas, that this bird lay down to enjoy the sunshine at the foot of a certain tree, and, raising its legs upward, it said, 'Ah! if the sky were to fall now, I could hold it up with my legs.' But at that very moment a leaf fell down from the tree, and the bird flew away in terror, screaming out, 'Oh! St. Martin, St. Martin, come and help your little bird!'" By some singular train of reasoning, this bird is supposed to be typical of St. Peter, who, after much boasting of faithfulness, denied his Saviour; but Master Odo suddenly interrupts himself to introduce another interpretation. "It may also be adapted," he says, "to certain knights of England; when they have their heads well armed with wine or ale, they say they can each stand against three Frenchmen, and that they can vanquish any thing, but when they are fasting, and see swords and spears about them, they cry out, 'Oh! St. Martin, come and help your little bird!'"

The literature of the fable in the Middle Ages had shown at its beginning a great spirit of originality and inventiveness, but as it increased in extent it became debased, and, if we may use the word thus, adulterated. The mass of the fables of the Middle Ages, indeed, are poor in incident, and possess little point. They seem merely to represent the acts and thoughts of men given to animals, in order that they might furnish the occasion for moralization in this form, without much care for the congruity of the story or the aptness of the illustration. The fashion for allegorical interpretation was, indeed, so great, that hardly any thing escaped its influence; and not only popular stories and historical anecdotes, but even facts in science, were thrown in among the fables, and fitted with moral applications. What are, strictly speaking, stories, had been introduced in the Eastern collections of fables, and a few are found among the Greek fables of Æsop, but the proportion is much greater among the medieval collections. In fact, the confusion had become so great that people then gave the name of fabliaux to the ordinary tales or contes. Among the fables we often find these fabliaux, which are frequently the current stories of the day, told among the people without any notion that they admitted of a moral application; and, in fact, the morality of many of them is of a very equivocal description. Others are, like the medieval fables, invented for the purpose, and they would hardly pass muster any where but in a medieval sermon. The following is taken at random from one of the sermons of a preacher of the reign of our Henry II., known by the name of Odo of Kent: "There was once a king who, it is said, loving worldly glory, caused the pavement, seats, and walls of his hall to be covered with rich carpets and tapestries, and his table to be adorned with a table-cloth and with vessels of gold and silver. A certain wise man, who was invited to dinner, and sat at the king's table, wanting to spit, looked about in vain for a convenient place, and seeing every other spot covered with ornaments, he spit on the king's beard. The servants instantly laid their hands upon him, and would have dragged him away to punish him for his temerity, but they were prevented by the king, who judging that, as he was a wise man, he must have had some good reason for what he did, asked him to acquaint the company with it. To whom the wise man replied, 'I saw nothing but tapestry and precious metals on every side, and could find no more fitting place to spit on than the king's beard, which was all defouled with the remains of the food he had been eating, so I spat on it.' And so with you, my brethren," the preacher continued, addressing his congregation, "if you adorn your bodies so studiously in this world, you will be despoiled of all your ornaments when you die, and the devils in hell will cover your faces with stinking hot spittle. Do not, therefore, pride thyself, man, in any beauty, since the lilies of the field are fairer than thee; nor in thy strength, for an ass is stronger than thee; for an ass will carry to the mill a greater burden than the strongest man," and so on to the end of the story. Such was medieval popular preaching: the fitness of the application of the story in this case is certainly not very obvious; but preaching in a not very dissimilar style has been revived in our own days.

A question of some delicacy, in regard to this adaptation of stories arose, or, at all events, was anticipated. As we have already intimated, many of them were far from moral, however they might be moralized. The fable itself, moreover, was notoriously not Christian, for it was universally acknowledged to have come from the ancients, who at best were looked upon only as pagan philosophers, or from the infidel Saracens, which was still worse. This objection was met in a characteristic manner. We have had Christian preachers in later times, and in our own island, who insisted on introducing the most popular airs into their church music, and pleaded in excuse that it would be unfair to let the evil one have all the good tunes to himself; and this was the sort of argument used in the Middle Ages. There lived a great preacher in England at the latter end of the fourteenth century—and our countrymen took a very energetic part in all the intellectual movements of the Middle Ages—who was called, from the place of his birth,

John of Bromyard, and was a distinguished member of both universities, a preaching friar by profession, and a great enemy of all heretics, Wycliffites in especial. He published an enormous book of themes for preachers, in which the stories and fables were brought together in thousands. These, he owns, are frequently taken from the works of the Gentiles, but who, says he, asks in what garden, or by the care of what gardener, a plant is reared, if it be known to be an efficient remedy against disease? Have we not, he continues, the authority of the Gentiles themselves that enemy's property is fair plunder—fas est et ab hoste doceri?—and the Scriptures represent to us the Hebrews, God's own people, enriching themselves with the spoils of the Egyptians.

In the Middle Ages, the fashion for this kind of preaching, and for the fables and tales which formed the staple material for it, seemed to increase and to become more absurd, like the fables themselves, as the period of reformation and of the revival of ancient learning approached, and when that period arrived, the medieval fables were banished at once from our literature. One cause of their disappearance was the revival in Europe of the ancient Æsop, that is, of the Greek text of the fables which pass under his name. During the earlier ages of the art of printing, editions of Æsop in the original Greek, or in a Latin version, or in the vernacular languages of the countries in which they were printed, were multiplied by the press; but even in the latter they were not made for the amusement of children, but were published in ponderous folios, for the reading of men of riper years. The Greek fables are so much more simple and elegant in their construction, and so much more classically correct in their form, than either the somewhat extravagant apologues of the Orientals or the too often dull and insipid fables of the Middle Ages, that they soon triumphed over both. With them the fable secured for itself a permanent place in the literature of Europe, which, though not at present with any great glory, it still, nevertheless, continues to hold. It claims, and justly, several of the most classical and lasting monuments of the literature of Europe during the last two centuries, and counts among its worshipers such names as LaFontaine, and Lessing, and Gay. From the high position which such writers have given to it, we may look back upon its old and long career, as, born under the warm sky of India, it crept by ways unknown to the classic clime of Greece, passed thence less obscurely to Latium, and wandered onward into the Middle Ages of Europe, there to meet its older parent from its far distant birth-place, and, conjointly with it, to take medieval society by surprise, and conquer a more remarkable position than it had previously held either in the east or in the west. The history of the fable has, indeed, been an eventful one—we might almost say, romantic, and forms not an uninteresting or unimportant chapter in the general history of human intelligence.

SUCCESS.

I HAVE a great opinion of successful men; and I am not ashamed to confess it.

It was the fashion, some years ago, to sneer at Success—nay, indeed, sometimes to revile it, as though it were an offense, or at best a pretentious humbug. This came out of the sudden inflation of some huge wind bags, which as suddenly collapsed. To do honor to successful men was held to be arrant flunkysm; for a successful man was accounted little better than a flatulent impostor. Clever men drew pictures of Success, represented by a mighty Juggernaut passing triumphantly over the necks of thousands of prostrate worshipers. Still cleverer men wrote brilliant stories of modern life, illustrating the rise and fall of seemingly successful men; and imitative dramatists transferred these sketches of society to the stage. The great imposture of Success was the pet subject of the day. But a healthier social philosophy is now enthroned among us. We have begun to think that men who make their way to the front, becoming rich or famous by the force of their personal characters, must, after all, have something in them, though every now and then bubbles may arise, in which solid realities are reflected, only to burst into thin air. Have we not all been reading lately about "Self-Help"—and what has charmed us so much? Are not our assembly rooms, and lecture halls, and mechanics' institutions, all over the country—I ask the question after a tolerably wide autumnal circuit of English provincial towns—are they not thrilling night after night with popular orations on "Self-made Men," or, as I see it phrased at times, "Self-built Men," and all that relates to them? To prostrate one's self before what Success has won, be it power, or riches, or what not, may rightly be called flunkysm; but to honor what has won success is worthy worship, not to be condemned or restrained. It is veneration for that type of manhood which most nearly approaches the divine by reason of its creative energy. It is a good sign of the times that we appreciate it at its true worth.

It is not to be expected, however, that envy should die out of the world; and so long as there is envy, people will be found to talk about Luck. But success does not come by chance; Providence helps those who help themselves. We may fancy that two men adopt the same means toward the attainment of the same end, and because one succeeds and the other fails, we may say that the one is more fortunate than the other. But the one succeeds and the other fails because they do not adopt the same means toward the same end. Of the two pilgrims who started on their journey each with peas in his shoon, the one was not more fortunate than the other; he was simply more wise. The man who sank by the way, toil-worn and foot-sore, with drops of agony on his forehead, groaning with pain, may have been the better walker of the two. The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. It is by the right application of your swiftness or your strength to the particular object in view that you make your way to Success. It is not only by doing the right thing, but by doing the right thing in the right way, and at the right time, that we achieve the great triumphs of life. All this is to be dwelt on presently. It is only here to be said that the varying results which we discern are not attributable to chance—not to external circumstances of any kind; but to inherent differences within ourselves—whatsoever Envy or Vanity may say upon the subject. Success is a substantial and enduring reality; luck is a mere vapor that is speedily dissolved. "Wealth gotten by vanity," saith Solomon, "shall diminish; but he that gathereth by labor shall increase."

But what, it may be asked, is Success? and who is the successful man? I have heard it said that "all success is comparative;" but with what is the comparison? Not with the successes of others. In this sense all success is positive. The prime minister is a greater man than his butler, but he is not, therefore, a more successful one. You must measure the success of a man, not by the relation which his achievements bear to what others have achieved, but by their relation to what he himself has endeavored. If he has kept a certain object steadily before him, and has attained it—no matter what the object be—he is a successful man. In another sense, too, success is positive; for it admits of no drawbacks or abatements beyond the range of the object attained. If I strive to amass wealth, and I amass it, I am not the less successful because my son turns out a dissolute spendthrift and my daughter disgraces herself by a runaway match. Am I less successful as a poet or a painter because my wife is unfaithful to me, and I am miserable in spite of my success? Success is one thing; happiness is another. The boy Warren Hastings aimed at the Governor-generalship of India, and the recovery of his ancestral estates; was he less a successful man because, when he had accomplished these objects of his ambition, his life was embittered by the persecution of his enemies? And the boy Charles Metcalfe—he too aimed at the Governor-generalship, and he attained not solely to that eminence, but to the prouder distinction of ruling "the three greatest dependencies of the British Crown." Was he less successful, because, in the fullness of his fame, an excruciating bodily disease ate into his life and destroyed him by slow torture?

Even the disappointments and disquietudes of Success itself do not detract from its completeness. A man may not find the attainment of his object so exhilarating as the pursuit of it; but for all this he does succeed. I knew a man whose desire it was to obtain a certain public situation. There was a particular post in a particular department which he coveted, and he said to himself that he would obtain it. Night after night his way home led him down Whitehall, and as he passed under the shadow of the building which held the department of government which he aspired to enter, he would shake his fist at it, and say, "You grim old pile, you exclude me now, but some day I shall have a home in you, be sure." And he was right. Unlikely as success appeared, he succeeded, and even sooner than he had hoped. It was nothing very great that he had obtained. But the success consisted in this, that what he won was the identical thing which he aspired and endeavored to win. It is nothing to the point that other men had won much higher posts by their successful exertions. Nor is it a matter to be considered, when we would determine the measure of his success, whether he was happier than before. There may have been distressing sets-off in other directions, or the thing for which he had striven may not have satisfied him; but the positive success was there. All success, indeed, is self-contained. If it were not, I am afraid that the catalogue of successful men might be printed on half a page.

We may think about this at leisure. Vanitas vanitatum! It is not the subject of discourse which I have chosen for myself. And I would rather, if I digress at all, step aside to ask whether it may not be that we all have our successes, though they be not of a kind of which the world takes any account. I must keep, however, to the subject of recognized Success, as all men understand it, and inquire how it is attained. I have heard people laugh at the misquotation of that well-known Addisonian platitude:

"'Tis not in mortals to command success,
But I'll do more, Sempronius—I'll deserve it."

But I have thought the varia lectio involved in the blunder deserving of the highest consideration; and I have been more disposed to admire than to ridicule the reading,

"'Tis not in mortals to deserve success,
But I'll do more, Sempronius—I'll command it."

More men have commanded success than have deserved it. There is nothing presumptuous in the idea. It is more presumptuous to talk about our deserts. What do the best of us deserve but complete and disastrous failure?

It has been said that "any man may have any woman." The meaning of which I hold to be, that the persevering pursuit of any object must eventually be crowned with success. Labor omnia vincit, as the copy-book text has it, and as the proverbs of well-nigh every country have it in other words. To set your mind resolutely upon the accomplishment of any purpose is to go half-way to its attainment. Now it commonly happens, to pursue the illustration wherewith I commenced this passage, that they who are most successful with women are not the handsomest men. And the reason of this is obvious. Handsome men rely overmuch on their handsomeness. To use a metaphor, rather expressive than eloquent, they expect that all the pretty women will "jump down their throats." But pretty women will not jump down their throats. This process of deglutition is not affected by them. They have no notion of being quietly absorbed. They must be won —bravely, laboriously, and with a becoming sense of what is due to them. Are we to think that we have only to sit quietly in our easy-chairs, and to twirl our mustaches? Beauty is a divine gift; let whosoever possesses it be thankful. Madame de Staël, one of the most gifted of mortals, said that she would surrender all that she possessed in exchange for it. But Madame de Staël was a woman; and I am now writing about men. Every body knows that men care more about personal beauty in the other sex than women do, and for this reason, that pleasant sights and sweet sounds, and every thing soft and gentle, is a delight and a refreshment to them. But the ordinary environments of women are soft and gentle. They lead comparatively passive lives; and that which most fascinates them in the other sex is a sense of active power. What is softness and smoothness to them? Bless them, they like the grit. Even the hard lines on a man's face—the pallor, nay, the less interesting sallowness of his cheek—are interesting to them, if they denote power. I repeat that personal beauty is a great gift, even to a man. But it is only as an accompaniment to other gifts that it contributes to success. Every body knows what Wilkes, the ugliest man in England, said to Townshend, the handsomest. And it was not a mere idle boast.

And so it is with intellectual gifts of a high order. The conscious possessor relies too much upon them. Fortune is represented as a woman—do we not call her Dame Fortune?—and she must be laboriously won. Are we to sit down by the way-side, and expect that she will seat herself on our lap? “Any man may have any woman,” and any man may have any thing, if he only goes about resolutely to attain it. But he must not trust too much to what he is. Genius, like beauty, is a divine gift; let him who possesses it thank God with his whole heart; but it is not by being, but by doing, that we achieve success; and therefore it is that the most gifted, like the handsomest men, are often passed on the road by men of second-rate abilities, or, more correctly, of inferior natural gifts. I would have this distinction kept steadily in view, for people too often use the word “ability” with reference to any thing rather than to its true meaning. I am not one of those who have much faith in the general co-existence of inactivity with power. I hold that what men can do they will do; and I think it will be found that when they do it not, it is because they feel that they can not do it. There may be great natural gifts resulting only in a dreamy, indolent, unproductive state of life. But this is because the possessor has no special aptitude for any particular thing—no vocation, so to speak; no consciousness of ability to carry out any thing to a conclusion; no resolute will to attempt it. Dress up the idea as we may; cover it with whatsoever gloss of fine and attractive words; talk of the waywardness, the impulsiveness of genius; it is, in its naked reality, no more than this—that whatsoever the natural gifts may be, their possessor lacks ability to do any thing, and feels the inability within him. He does not see his way clearly to any definite result; he does not concentrate his powers on any given object; and he runs to waste, nothing better at the best than a splendid failure.

To concentrate your powers on any given object—to go directly to the point, looking neither to the right nor to the left, and resolutely determining to succeed—is to secure Success. If once you begin to sprawl you are lost.* I do not mean by this that we are to reject collateral aids. On the other hand, I would suffer all tributary streams to flow freely into the great main channel of our action. You may drive a dozen horses in the same chariot if you can only keep them well together. You must converge to a centre, not diverge from it. If I were to give way to the allurements of biographical illustration, I should soon fill a volume, instead of only a few pages; but here are a few lines from Plutarch, which I quote rather in the way of caution than of example: “There was in the whole city but one street in which Pericles was ever seen—the street which led to the market-place and to the council-house. He declined all invitations to banquets, and all gay assemblies and company. During the whole period of his administration he never dined at the table of a friend.” Emerson cites this with commendation in one of his lectures. But I can not help thinking that it is a mistake. You should never forget the Market-place or the Council-house. But you may expediently dine at the table of a friend, or invite a friend to dine at your table, in the interests of the Market-place or the Council-house. Self-help is, doubtless, a great thing, but mutual help is not to be despised. We may often make a greater stride on to success by “dining at the table of a friend” than by staying at home to post up a ledger, or to wade through a volume of statistics. Successful men, we may be sure, have not confined themselves to direct action, or looked only to immediate results. More failures are consummated by want of faith and want of patience than by any thing else in the world. We can not grow rich by sowing mustard seeds on a damp flannel, though they begin to sprout before our eyes. Concentration is not isolation or self-absorption. “Stick to your business, and your business will stick to you:” an excellent doctrine, doubtless; but what if I stick to my business more closely by smoking a cigar in my back-parlor than by serving customers in my front-shop? What if I put aside some important work, claiming attention, to dress for dinner, and to convey myself to the table of an influential friend, on the chance of

* I learned this lesson very early in life, on the box of the North Devon coach, receiving the rudiments of my education as a Jehu. It was night. I drove from Andover to Blackwater; and three elderly ladies were ignorant of the danger to which they were exposed. “Keep them well together. Keep them well together. Don't let them sprawl,” was all the advice I received from my instructor. The lesson was worth remembering on the great turnpike-road of life.

gaining more by going out than by staying at home? When I was a very young man I wrote essays in illustration of what I then believed to be the folly of such a course. But as I grow old, every year convinces me more and more that social intercourse, of the right kind, is a material aid to success. Often the gain is palpable to you at once, and you count your advantage as you take off your dress-coat. But if not, it will find you out after many days: you have sown, and in due season you will reap. If you do nothing more than assert your individuality—make yourself a living presence among men, instead of a myth, a nominis umbra—you may be sure that you have done something. Am I more or less likely to read your book, or to buy your picture, or to say a good word for you, if I have a chance, to some man in authority, for sitting next to you at our friend Robinson's, and thinking you a pleasant fellow? At all stages of our journey it will be the same. It is not more incumbent upon you to remember this, that you may gain a high place, than that you may keep it. Our statesmen are wiser in their generation than Pericles. There is Lord Tiverton, the very personification of smiling success. Does he "decline all invitations to banquets, all gay assemblies, all company?"

Now, all this does not in any way militate against the theory of concentration. In a work of art there may be great variety of detail with perfect unity of action. Every accessory should contribute to the one general result—should illustrate the one leading idea. Every detail that is foreign to the subject is so much sheer waste of strength. And so it is in the conduct of life. With one object set steadily before us, we may have many varying activities, but they will all assist the main action, and impart strength and consistency to it. Singleness of aim, I repeat, in nowise demands monotony of action. But if you allow yourself to be diverted from this singleness of object, you are little likely to succeed in life. "Art is long—life is short." Knowing this, there is a universal tendency among us to go in search of specialties. General practitioners seldom get beyond a respectable mediocrity, while your specialists attain to eminence and wealth. If an eye or an ear be affected, we seek out the man who has made that particular organ the study of his life. In the pursuit of that one object, the oculist or the aurist may have studied the mechanism of the whole human frame, and the general physiology of man, but only in their relation to the particular organ to the full understanding of which he is devoting all the energies of his mind. He can not, indeed, understand his subject without the aid of this contributory knowledge. But all that is not contributory is waste. In the same manner, lawyers succeed by studying special branches of their profession; and literary men are successful in proportion as they stick to their specialties—or rather, as they are fortunate in having any. If a man can write well on any one special subject—no matter what that subject may be—he is sure to find profitable occupation for his pen, while the general dealer in literary wares, though more highly gifted by nature, may fail to provide himself with bread. The popular appreciation of this general fact expresses itself in the well-known proverb that "a jack-of-all-trades is master of none." The world has no faith in Admirable Crichtons. They may be very pleasant fellows in their way, but mankind in general would rather not do business with them.

A shrewd, intelligent man of the world, and one, too, who had been eminently successful—for from a small beginning he had risen to the highest place in the department to which he had been attached, and had made the fortunes of his whole family, brothers, sons, and nephews, as well as his own—once said to me: "The longer I live the more convinced I am that over-sensitiveness is a great mistake in a public man." He might have said in all men who desire to succeed in life. Now, I wish it to be understood, that what is expressed here by the word "over-sensitiveness" does not signify over-scrupulousness. Be as scrupulous as you will. Do nothing that can give you a single pang of conscience. Keep your hands clean. If you can not do this, sink into the abysmal depths of failure, unsoiled and unspotted, with skin clear and white as a little child's, and be clean. But do not be over-sensitive on the score of pride, or vanity, or dominant egotism. Every successful man, you may be sure, has had much to mortify him in the course of his career. He has borne many rebuffs; he has sustained many failures. What if men do not understand you, are not inclined to encourage you, and exercise the privilege of age or superior position? Bear with it all, Juvenis, your time will come; you may take your change out of the world when you are a little older. Bah! how does it hurt you? "Hard words break no bones," saith the proverb. And they break no spirit that is not of the feeblest. The world may laugh at your failures—what then? Try again, and perhaps they will not laugh. Try once again, and perhaps it will be your turn to laugh. "He who wins may laugh," saith another proverb. If you have the right stuff in you, you will not be put down. There is a man now among us, a man of genius, who aspired to take a part in public affairs. After much travail he obtained a seat in Parliament. And the House, knowing he could write, assumed that he could not speak, and when he rose they laughed at and hooted him. He told his assailants that the time would come when they would listen to him—and he was right. He spoke the words of prophecy and of truth. And the time did come, when they not only listened, but when the men who had despised came to fear him, or to worship him; and, when he rose, either shrank appalled and dismayed, or looked to him for the salvation of their party, and applauded to the echo.

There are various roads to success, but I am somewhat inclined to think that the surest is gravelly and gritty, with some awkward pitfalls and blinding quicksets in the way. Was that famous nursery rhyme of the Man of Thessaly, think you, written but for the entertainment of babes and sucklings? or was it not rather meant as a lesson to children of a larger growth, to the adolescents of our nurseries of learning, starting on the great journey of life? Every one knows the story—how the hero of it —jumped into a quickset hedge

And scratched out both his eyes.

Doubtless the way with most of us, looking not before we leap; going ahead too rapidly at the outset—not calculating our juvenile strength, and jumping into the midst of what we think we can clear at a bound. Do we not all think ourselves “wondrous wise,” and, thinking so, encounter blinding disaster? But are we, therefore, to go darkling all the rest of our lives? It was not to teach us this that the great epic of the Man of Thessaly was written. He had the true heroic stuff in him; and he did not sit down and bewail his loss, helpless and hopeless.

And when he saw his eyes were out
He had reason to complain;
But he jumped into the quickset hedge
And scratched them in again.*

And such is the right way to fight the battle of life, to grapple with the failures and disasters which beset your career. Go at it again. You may have reason to complain that your good intentions meet with no better results; that the singleness of your aims, the purity of your aspirations, and the high courage of your first grand plunge into life lead to nothing but a torn face, smeared with blood, and a night of painful bewildering blindness. But it is better to strive manfully than to complain weakly; brace yourself up for another plunge; gather strength from defeat; into the quickset hedge again gallantly; and you will recover all that you have lost, scratch your eyes in again, and never lose your clearness of vision for the rest of your life.

Yes, indeed, if we have the right stuff in us, these failures at the outset are grand materials of success. To the feeble they are, of course, stumbling-blocks. The wretched weakling goes no farther; he lags behind, and subsides into a life of failure. And so by this winnowing process the number of the athletes in the great Olympics of life is restricted to a few, and there is clear space in the arena. There is scarcely an old man among us—an old and successful man—who will not willingly admit that he was made by his failures, and that what he once thought * I write the words as I learned them in my childhood; but there are various readings of all (so-called) nursery rhymes, and I am told that more correctly the concluding portion of the legend of the Man of Thessaly runs thus:

But when he saw his eyes were out,
With all his might and main
He jumped into the quickset hedge
And scratched them in again.

This reading is more emphatic than the other, and better illustrates my text. It is by going at it again, “with all one’s might and main,” that we repair our foregone disasters and gather strength from defeat.

his hard fate was in reality his good fortune. And thou, my bright-faced, bright-witted child, who thinkest that thou canst carry Parnassus by storm, learn to possess thyself in patience. Not easy the lesson, I know; not cheering the knowledge that success is not attainable, per saltum, by a hop, step, and a jump, but by arduous passages of gallant perseverance, toilsome efforts long sustained, and, most of all, by repeated failures. Hard, I know, is that last word, grating harshly upon the ear of youth. Say, then, that we mollify it a little—that we strip it of its outer crustaceousness and asperity, and truthfully may we do so, my dear. For these failures are, as I have said, but stepping-stones to success; gradus ad Parnassum—at the worst, non-attainments of the desired end before thy time. If success were to crown thine efforts now, where would be the great success of the hereafter? It is the brave resolution to “do better next time” that lays the substrata of all real greatness. Many a promising reputation has been prematurely destroyed by early success. The good sap runs out from the trunk into feeble offshoots or suckers. The hard discipline of the knife is wanted. I repeat that it is not pleasant; but when thou feelest the sharpness of the edge, think that all who have gone before thee have been lacerated in like manner. At thine age I went through it all. My first great effort was a tragedy upon a grand Elizabethan model. It was submitted by a friend to a competent critic, who pronounced it to be “morally, dramatically, and irremediably bad.” I write the words now with a strong sense of gratitude to that critic; but I have not forgotten the keen agony with which they burned themselves into my soul, when I first read the crushing verdict in a dingy back bedroom in the Hummums. We have all gone through it, my dear. We! “How we apples swim!” I would speak of men—the real Chivalry of letters—whose bucklers I am not worthy to bear. Ask any one of them about their early struggles with a world incredulous of their genius, and what a history they will have to tell thee! Ay, and what a grand moral! Is there a true knight among them who does not, on the very knees of his heart, thank God for his early failures?

In estimating the sources of Success, account must, doubtless, be taken of constitution. Some of us have constitutional defects, by which others are not incapacitated or impeded. Sustained energy is possessed only by those who have powerful digestive organs. Men of a bilious, sanguine, irritable nature are capable of great spasms of energy, which carry them along so far at a time that they can allow for intervals of prostration. But there is nothing like a steady flow of health—an equable robustness of manhood. It is a blessing which few men possess, and for which the possessor has reason devoutly to be thankful. Most of us are sensible of intervals of feebleness and weariness, when we are incapable of any great exertion; when we feel painfully that we are not doing the work which we had set ourselves to do, that we are falling behind in the race, and suffering day after day to slip by without our making any impression on the sand. For some time I doubted much as to the best mode of dealing with Nature in such a case—whether it were better to make the dominant will assert itself, and to go on in spite of the unwillingness of the natural man; in spite of weakness, and lassitude, and continual entreaties from the frail flesh; or to let Nature have her way at once, and succumb contentedly to her demands. On the one hand, there is the fear of doing your work badly—perhaps of having it to do all over again, or of making on the minds of others, whom you wish to influence favorably, an impression of feebleness rather than of strength. There is, moreover, the risk of extending the period of lassitude and incompetency by doing violence to Nature; perhaps, indeed, of permanently enfeebling your powers. On the other hand, there is the danger of making compromises with your active powers, and yielding to the temptations of indolence. We may mistake idleness for inability, and follow our self-indulgent inclinations, rather than be swayed by an honest sense of what is wisest and most befitting the occasion. It is difficult to lay down any precise rules on the subject for the guidance of others. If every man asks himself what is his besetting infirmity, and answers the question conscientiously, he will be able to decide whether he runs greater risk of injuriously forcing Nature, or of yielding too readily to her suggestions. If you know that you are not indolent—if you have, for the most part, pleasure in your work, and never need the spur—you may safely pause, when your energies are flagging, and you feel an indescribable something that resists all your efforts to go forward on the road. It is better not to do a thing at all than to do it badly. You may lose time. What then? Men, stripping for the race of life, should account no time or money thrown away that contributes in any way to their physical health—that gives tone to the stomach or development to the muscles. And we should never forget that we do not sustain our energies best by keeping them always on the stretch. Rest and recreation are no small part of discipline. The greater the work before us the more need we have of them both.

I am nearing, not the end of my subject, but the end of my space, and I see before me much which I had purposed to say, but which must be left unsaid, for such a theme is not easily exhausted. But there is one matter to which, before I conclude, I especially desire to invite attention. I have heard it said, that if we expect to get on in the world we must be suspicious of our neighbors. "Treat every man as if he were a rogue." Now, if this were a condition of Success, Success would not be worth having—nay, indeed, it would be wholly intolerable: commend me to a life of failure. But it is not a condition of Success. To know an honest man from a rogue, and to act accordingly, is doubtless a great thing; but, if we are to treat all mankind on our journey through life as rogues or honest men, why, I throw up my cap for the latter. We may be cheated, it is true; tricked, cozened, defrauded; and we may throw away that which, worthily bestowed, might have really contributed to our success. It is a serious matter to waste our strength—to squander, in this manner, the materials of Success. Successful men, it may be said, do not make blunders of this kind. I am not quite sure of that; besides, who knows but that the strength may not be wasted after all. A good deed, done in a good spirit, can never be thrown away. The bread cast upon the waters may return to us after many days. This at least I know, that if it be true, as I have said, that Providence helps those who help themselves, it is no less true that Providence helps those who help others. "The liberal deviseth liberal things, and by his liberality shall he stand." It was not meant that we should stand alone in the world. Whatsoever may be our strength, whatsoever our self-reliance, there are times and seasons when we need a helping hand, and how can we expect it to be stretched out to us, if we always keep our own in our pockets? And if we do not trust others, how can we hope to be trusted ourselves? I am not writing now about high motives, but about aids to Success. Still I would have it borne in remembrance that there is a vast difference between looking for an immediate or direct return for every kindness done to a neighbor, and having faith in the assurances of Providence that as we mete to others so shall it be meted to us. The recipient of our bounty may turn his back upon us and go forth into the world only to revile us; but it does not follow therefore that we have wasted our generosity, or that the next shipwrecked brother who comes to us should be sent empty-handed away. Let us only have faith and patience, and we shall find our reward. Doubtless, there may be exceptions—apparent, if not real; but my experience of life teaches me that men who are prone to assist others commonly thrive well themselves. The most successful men of my acquaintance are at the same time the most liberal. Their system is to treat their neighbor as an honest man until their commerce with him has proved that he is a rogue, and I do not think that men are less likely to be honest for finding that they are trusted by their neighbors.

This matter of mutual aid is a point much to be considered. Self-reliance is a great thing, but it may sometimes carry us out of our depths. The most successful men are commonly those who have known best how to influence their fellows—how to turn inferior agency to good account. After all, that which any man can do by himself is very little. You must turn the energies of other men to account in furtherance of your own. The right thing is to identify their interests with yours, and not only to make them believe that by helping you they are helping themselves, but really to insure that it is so. My belief is, that selfish men do not succeed in life. Selfishness is essentially suicidal. You know instances to the contrary, you say. Are you sure of it? Appearances are sometimes deceitful. There are men who bear the appearance of selfishness—who are harsh in manner, stern of purpose, seemingly inaccessible and unyielding—but there are soft spots under the grit. They do things differently from men of a more genial temperament. But what right have we to expect that every one should wear our colors? Stern men are not necessarily selfish men. There are men who, conscious of the excessive softness of their natures, have felt the necessity of inducing a sort of outer crust or armor of asperity, as a covering or protection for themselves, and who thus, in their efforts to counteract a tenderness approaching to weakness, do manifest injustice to the goodness of their hearts. I have known men, too, noted for an almost impenetrable reserve, who were in reality thus reserved only because no one invited their confidences. The injudicious bearing of those with whom they lived had brought them to this pass. The respect and deference of inferiors, whether of the family or only of the household, if in excess, will often produce this result. Reticence begets reticence. But men of this kind often long for an opportunity of letting loose their pent-up confidences, and, if you only touch the right spring, will raise at once the lid of their reserve, and show you all the inner mechanism of their hearts. Ay, and how grateful they will feel to you for giving them the chance! What a sense of relief is upon them when they have thus unburdened themselves! We little know what a deep wrong we sometimes do to others by suffering this outer crust of reserve to gather about them.

Whether you govern best by a reserved, dignified demeanor, or by an open, cheery manner, may be a question. Each has its advantage, and each is very effective in its occasional deviations into the system of the other. The genialities of stern men, and the asperities of genial ones, are each very impressive in their way. Indeed, the question of manner, in connection with my present topic of discourse, is one of such high importance that I can not summarily dismiss it. I do not say that it is a thing to be studied. To lay down any rules on the subject is a vain thing. People who shape their outward behavior with elaborate design generally overreach themselves. Nothing but a really natural manner is genuinely successful in the long-run. Now, the natural manner of some people is good—of others hopelessly bad, though there may be little difference in the good stuff beneath. It is hard that we should be prejudiced by what is merely superficial; but we are. I have heard it said that this is not prejudice—for the manner is the outward and visible sign of the man. But there are very excellent people in the world with manners the reverse of pleasant—people shy and reserved, or brusque and boorish, with whom personal intercourse is by no means a delight. Others, again, there are, with whom half an hour's talk is like an invigorating bath of sunshine. In this last there is an element of success. There is another successful manner, too—one which impresses every one with a sense of your power. If you have both a manner at once gracious and powerful, you have every thing that you can wish as an outward aid to success. A thoroughly good manner will often do much to neutralize the ill effects of an unprepossessing appearance. But an ill-favored countenance may be a stumbling-block at the outset that is never surmounted. It repels at the first start. There are people described as "unpresentable," who have giants to contend against at their first start in life. When they have once made their way in the world, the insignificance or grotesqueness of their appearance is a matter of no moment. Nay, indeed, we may not unfairly assign some additional credit to the man who has forced his way to the front in spite of all physical defects and personal drawbacks. But it is an awful thing for a young beginner to have to contend against the impediments of a bad face, an insignificant or an ungainly figure, and a bad manner in the presence of others.

However material to the subject under discussion, these last remarks appear here in the nature of a digression; and I do not know that I can close this essay in any better manner than by returning to what I was saying about mutual help. Great as is self-help, I am disposed to think that mutual help is greater. If we contribute to the success of our neighbors, that is a success in itself. There are few of us who may not do something in this way, assured that we shall not do it in vain. And there are few of us who do not want, or who have not at some time of our lives wanted, a helping hand, and been saved by its timely extension. Liberality is not for nothing.—"The liberal man shall be made fat, and he that watereth shall be watered himself."

A DREAM OF THE CAVALIERS.

I.

IN the May morn, rich with roses,
And alive with dancing streams,
The forms of the great old leaders
Come to my waking dreams:

From the trellis'd porch of the homestead
I see them as they pass,
Like a line of august phantoms,
Over the velvet grass.

And not alone do the figures
Of the gallant Cavaliers
Come forth from the deepening shadows
Of the long-forgotten years:

The shapes of dear dead maidens
Flit through the ancient hall,
And I seem to hear their voices
In the oak-trees great and tall.

For the river breeze, like laughter,
Comes up from the shining shore;
And, borne in the snowy cloud-ships,
I pass to the years before!

II.

They come in a great procession,
With firm but noiseless tread,
From the mists of the far horizon—
Those ghosts of the mighty dead.

In front of the glittering pageant,
With the clear dark eyes serene,
Behold, in his ruff and doublet,
The Knight of the Virgin Queen!—

John Smith, the fearless captain
Of the mighty days of old,
With the beard and swarthy forehead,
And the bearing free and bold!

He has fought in the bloody battles
Of the Old World and the New,
With a soul unmoved by peril—
A stout heart, kind and true!

He has flashed his glittering falchion
In the sun of Eastern lands,
And toiled, a woe-worn captive,
In the wild Caucasian sands!

He has bent with knightly homage
To the beauty in her bower,
But here, in the purple sunset,
He has met with a fairer flower!

She comes!—like a fawn of the forest,
With a bearing mild and meek,
The blood of a line of chieftains
Rich in her golden cheek.

With the tender, fluttering bosom,
And the rounded shoulders, bare—
The folds of her mantle waving
In the breath of the idle air.

With a crown of nodding feathers
Set round with glimmering pearls;
And the light of the dreamy sunshine
Asleep in her raven curls!

Our own dear Pocahontas!
The Virgin Queen of the West—
With the heart of a Christian hero
In a timid maiden's breast!

You have heard the moving story
Of the days of long ago,
How the tender girlish bosom
Shrunk not from the deadly blow:

How the valiant son of England,
In the woodland drear and wild,
Was saved from the savage war-club
By the courage of a child.

And now in the light of glory
The noble figures stand—
The founder of Virginia,
And the pride of the Southern land!

III.

They pass like a strain of music,
And the early rebels come,
With the blare of jarring trumpets
And the thunder of the drum.

Beware, Sir William Berkeley!
Beware, in your island town!
For the planters of Virginia
Will batter your log-walls down.

Your foe, Nathaniel Bacon,
Comes on with hasty stride;
With lips and forehead haughty,
And an eye on fire with pride!

Alas! for the brave young chieftain,
His life was foully sped:
He sleeps in the soil of Gloucester,
With the green grass o'er his head!

And Hansford, Giles, and Drummond,
Rest in their noble graves,
Lulled by the winds of ocean
And the murmur of the waves!

Thus fell those great Virginians,
For the freedom of the land;
The chords of the stout hearts sundered
By the stroke of a bloody band.

A curse on the gray-beard tyrant
Who dared not face his foe;
Who met the prayer of a woman
With a dastard word and blow!

For the wife of Major Cheeseman
Prayed on her bended knee,
In place of her noble husband,
To die on the gallows tree.

And the knight, Sir William Berkeley,
Greeted the wife's appeal
With an infamous word of insult,
And a blow of his booted heel!

IV.

The figures fade—and Spottswood,
At the head of his gallant band,
Is spurring toward the mountains
And the unknown Western land.

The gay young Knights of the Horse-shoe
Ride fast in a joyous throng;
And the great wild forest echoes
With the merry shout and song.

So they stand on the Blue Ridge Mountain,
And drink to the health of the king;
And the solemn haunts of the red men
With the Saxon voices ring.

The deer flies to his covert,
And the panther to his lair,
When the shrill neigh of the coursers
Rings on the mountain air.

Rings in the crimson sunset
Of the long-forgotten years,
When the glens gave back the laughter
Of the gay young Cavaliers!

V.

We leave the Knights of the Horse-shoe
To go with another band,
On gayly-prancing horses,
Into the Southern land.

The chief of the good companions
Is a planter fair to see,
With curls on his stalwart shoulders,
And a bearing brave and free.

You may read in the ancient volume
Writ by the leader's pen,
Of a hundred gay adventures,
And the fair march back again.

The book lies under his portrait,
In the old house by the stream;
He smiles on the speaking canvas—
You may hear his voice, if you dream.

But better I love to ponder
On the sweet face by his side—
A maiden fresh as the roses,
In the flush of girlish pride.

With the dear fond smiles and the blushes,
And the modest shrinking grace;
And the fair young bosom hiding
Under the cloud of lace:

On the slender maiden figure
In the blue silk bodice low,
Or the rosy cheeks and the dimples,
And the arms and neck like snow.

Brave William Byrd, the planter,
Of Westover, by the shore,
Smiles still on the faded canvas,
As he smiled in the days before.

And the girl, with faint, sweet blushes,
Like the light of morning skies,
With the lips of fresh carnations,
And the tender, haunting eyes,

Is Evelyn Byrd, his daughter,
A flower of the elder day,
Who passed, like a bud of April,
From the sorrowful world away.

The father is like a marquis
Of the great old Norman race;
The child is a rose just blooming,
With a heaven in her face.

They live in the elder annals,
As they hang on Brandon wall—
The girl with her budding bosom,
And the planter noble and tall.

They shine like stars of the morning,
Through the mists of long-gone years—
You pass, as you gaze on the canvas,
To the days of the Cavaliers!

VI.

So I dream in the bright May morning
Of the great and splendid throng—
Of the fair or stalwart figures
I have known and loved so long.

From the valiant Walter Raleigh,
The "Shepherd of the Sea,"
Who laid the broad foundation,
To the men who made us free:

The men of the Revolution,
Who live on the storied page—
The great old race of giants
Of the great heroic age!

I hear the mighty footsteps,
And look on the flashing eyes;
For they shine through the cloud of battle
As the stars shine in the skies!

Ah! yet—I would rather wander
With the tender Indian maid,
And look on her slender figure
As it flits through the woodland shade:

Or go with the beautiful Evelyn,
In the twilight dim and gray,
When she thinks, with smiles and blushes,
Of the true heart far away!

VII.

So I pass to the long-gone summers
Of the unremembered years,
And share in the joys and sorrows,
In the April smiles and tears:

With the Cavaliers and the maidens,
In an idle smiling dream,
I wander away to the forest,
Or sail on the rippling stream:

I hear, as I sit and ponder
On the trellis'd porch of the hall,
The tinkle of fairy laughter
From under the oak-trees tall:

And stroll with the bright-eyed damsels,
As they list to the flattering tale
Told by the gay young gallants,
In the moonlight weird and pale:

The Comedy plays before me,
And there, on the shining shore,
With the foolish, murmuring lovers,
I live in the days before!

UNITED STATES.

THE complete official returns of the votes for Presidential Electors have not yet been announced. We can not therefore prepare a perfectly accurate table of the votes for the respective candidates.—California and Oregon have probably given Lincoln a small plurality over either of his opponents. In New Jersey, several combinations were made of the various electoral candidates, the result being that 4 Lincoln and 3 Douglas electors received the highest number. In all the other Free States, the Lincoln electors were chosen. Of the 183 electoral votes of the Free States, Mr. Lincoln receives 180.—In Virginia, Mr. Bell received a small majority; but the votes of some districts were rejected by the canvassers on account of informality. The result was that the Governor certified to the choice of 9 Bell and 6 Breckinridge Electors. These latter, however, considering that Mr. Bell had received the highest vote, resigned, and their places having been filled, the 15 votes of the State were cast for Mr.

Bell, who also received the 12 votes of Kentucky and the 12 of Tennessee; 39 in all. The 9 votes of Missouri were cast for Mr. Douglas, which, added to his 3 from New Jersey, make his electoral vote 12. The remaining Southern States cast their 72 electoral votes for Mr. Breckinridge.—The popular vote for the several candidates can be estimated only approximately, from the fact that in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania about 550,000 votes were cast for "Fusion" candidates, opposed to Mr. Lincoln. From the data afforded by local elections it is estimated that these "Fusion" votes, if cast directly for the Presidential candidates, would have been distributed as follows: for Mr. Douglas 350,000, for Mr. Bell 130,000, for Mr. Breckinridge 70,000. We add these Fusion votes to those actually cast for these candidates in the above proportions. The following table presents an approximation to the actual result; although the official announcement may vary from it by a few thousand votes in any instance:

	Popular Vote.	Electors.
For LINCOLN, votes directly cast .....	1,825,000	180
" DOUGLAS, votes directly cast .....	925,000
"     " on "Fusion" tickets .....	350,000	12
" BRECKINRIDGE, votes directly cast .....	680,000
"     " on "Fusion" tickets .....	70,000	72
" BELL, votes directly cast .....	620,000
"     " on "Fusion" tickets .....	130,000	39
Total vote .....	4,600,000	303
From this table it appears that each electoral vote cast for Lincoln represents about 10,100 voters; each for Breckinridge, 10,400; each for Bell, 18,700; each for Douglas, 106,000.

The feeling at the South in favor of secession from the Union has assumed a magnitude wholly unexpected. In South Carolina it appears to be altogether unanimous. In Mississippi, Alabama, and Florida it is largely predominant. In Georgia, Arkansas, and Texas, notwithstanding the opposition of some of the most distinguished citizens, it is in the ascendant. The Message of Governor Gist, of South Carolina, to the Legislature of that State, is a fair exponent of the extreme Southern sentiment. He looks upon the immediate secession of his own State as beyond question, and says that there is "no reasonable doubt but that Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas will immediately follow, and that the other Southern States will eventually complete the galaxy." He argues against his State waiting for a conference with the other Southern States. "It is too late," he says, "now to receive propositions for a conference; and the State would be wanting in self-respect, after having deliberately decided on her course, to entertain any proposition looking to a continuance in the present Union." In view of what he considers to be the fixed determination of South Carolina to secede at once, and at all events, the Governor suggests several topics of legislation: Direct trade with Europe should be encouraged, and the State should "guarantee an interest of five per cent. per annum upon the capital invested in a line of steamers, so long as they shall continue the service."—As the postmasters throughout the State will resign, he recommends an arrangement with Adams's Express Company to perform postal service.—He says that "The law prohibiting masters from permitting negroes to hire their own time, and make contracts, should be so amended, and such penalties attached to its violation, that no one would venture to disregard it." He suggests that both the owner and the hirer of the slave should be punished with fine or imprisonment. "It not unfrequently happens," he says, "that slave mechanics hire white men to work under their direction. . . . This state of things should not be permitted; there must be a distinction between the races, as marked as are their different colors; and it must be distinctively understood that the white is the governing race, without an exception, and without regard to disparity of intellect, merit, or acquirements."—The allegiance of citizens of South Carolina to the Federal Government ceasing as soon as the State withdraws from the Union, it is recommended that laws be passed, advising those who "should be so forgetful of their duty to their sovereign, and so reckless of her displeasure as to disregard her ordinances or obey any other commands than those of the constituted authorities of the State, that they will be dealt with as traitors and punished accordingly. . . . South Carolina must insist upon the implicit obedience of all her citizens, both native and naturalized, and no one can be permitted to put his individual construction upon the relation he bears to the State of his birth or adoption."—In order "to dispense with the necessity, as much as may be possible, of resorting to Lynch law and illegal executions," the Governor recommends the enactment of a law "punishing summarily and severely, if not with death, any person that circulates incendiary documents, avows himself an abolitionist, or in any way attempts to create insubordination or insurrection among the slaves."—To secure a proper supply of arms, Governor Gist recommends that South Carolina should accede to a proposition from Major Ripley to establish an armory either in Georgia, Alabama, or South Carolina, upon the condition that each of these States shall agree to purchase from him annually fifty thousand dollars' worth of arms for five years, and to extend their patronage for a short time thereafter.—Governor Gist also recommends that “the introduction of slaves from other States, which may not become members of the Southern Confederacy, and particularly the border States, should be prohibited by Legislative enactment; and by this means they will be brought to see that their safety depends upon a withdrawal from their enemies, and an union with their friends and natural allies. If they should continue their union with the non-slaveholding States, let them keep their slave property in their own borders, and the only alternative left them will be emancipation by their own act, or by the action of their confederates. We can not consent to relieve them from their embarrassing situation by permitting them to realize the money value of their slaves by selling them to us, and thus prepare them, without any loss of property, to accommodate themselves to the Northern Free-soil idea.”—This view is also embodied in the Message of Governor Pettus of Mississippi, who says: “As it is more than probable that many of the citizens of the border States may seek a market for their slaves in the cotton States, I recommend the passage of an act prohibiting the introduction of slaves into this State unless their owners come with them and become citizens, and prohibiting the introduction of slaves for sale by all persons whomsoever.”

This Message of the Governor of South Carolina presents views which will probably be indorsed by the Convention of that State, which meets on the 17th of December, and will be strongly advocated in other Conventions soon to be held in the extreme Southern States. As far as can now be judged, the border Southern States, Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, are disposed to act as mediators, discouraging all hasty action on the part of the South, while insisting upon action on the part of the Northern States which shall obviate all legitimate ground of complaint from the South.

The influence of these manifestations upon commerce and industry has been disastrous. A large proportion of the Southern Banks have suspended specie payments. It is therefore difficult to procure funds to send cotton to market, and though the ordinary supply is reduced, yet the current price has within a month fallen two or three cents per pound—equivalent to a decline of from 20 to 30 per cent. The price of the grain of the West has fallen in about the same proportion. National and State Stocks have been greatly depreciated. Thus the United States 5 per cent. loan of $10,000,000, which a few weeks since was taken at a little above par, has been sold at 90. State Stocks have declined still more. Missouri sixes, which sold November 10 at 76, brought 64 December 8. Railway Stocks have been still more depreciated. New York Central fell from 79 to 70; Erie from 32 to 24; Michigan Central from 59 to 43, and other leading stocks in equivalent proportions.

Congress convened on Monday, December 3, a large majority of the members of both Houses being present. The Representatives from South Carolina took their seats, but the Senators from that State were absent. The President's Message was transmitted on the 4th. It opens with an elaborate discussion of the state of the country. The long-continued and intemperate interference of the Northern people, says the President, has at length produced its natural effects; the different sections of the country are now arrayed against each other, and the time has come when hostile geographical parties have been formed. This does not proceed solely from the claims on the part of Congress or the Territorial Legislatures to exclude Slavery, nor from the efforts of different States to defeat the execution of the Fugitive Slave Law. All or any of these evils might have been borne by the South without danger to the Union, in the hope that time and reflection might apply the remedy. The immediate peril arises from the fact that the agitation of the Slavery question at the North has at length inspired the slaves with a vague notion of freedom. Hence a sense of security no longer exists, the feeling of peace at home has given place to apprehensions of servile insurrection. Should this apprehension pervade the masses of the Southern people disunion will be inevitable. It is the belief of the President that this period has not yet arrived. The American people might settle the Slavery question, and restore peace and harmony simply by leaving the Southern States to manage their domestic institutions in their own way. As sovereign States, they, and they alone, are responsible before God and the world for the existence of Slavery among them.—The election of any person to the office of President does not, of itself, afford just cause for dissolving the Union. In order to justify a resort to revolutionary resistance, the Federal Government must be guilty of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of powers not granted by the Constitution. The late Presidential election has been held in strict conformity with the express provisions of the Constitution. Neither are the apprehensions aroused by the antecedents of the President-elect sufficient to justify revolution. His position compels him to be conservative; and, moreover, his province is to execute, not to make laws. It is a remarkable fact that, with the possible exception of the Missouri Compromise, no act has ever passed Congress impairing in the slightest degree the rights of the South to their property in slaves; and no probability exists of the passage of such an act by the present or the next Congress. No act has passed, or is likely to pass Congress, excluding slavery from the Territories; and the Supreme Court has decided that slaves are property, and that their owners therefore have a right to take them to the Territories, and hold them under the protection of the Constitution. The Territorial Legislature of Kansas did indeed pass, over the veto of the Governor, an act prohibiting slavery in that Territory; but the Supreme Court has decided that no Territorial Legislature possesses the power to pass such an act; and this will be declared void by the Judiciary when presented in a legal form. This power does not belong to any Legislature, whether State or Territorial, but solely to the people when forming or amending a State Constitution. Neither Congress nor the President is responsible for the State laws designed to defeat the execution of the Fugitive Slave Law. All courts, State and National, before whom the question has been brought, with the single exception of a State court in Wisconsin, whose decision has been reversed by the proper appellate tribunal, have decided in favor of the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Law. These State laws, having been passed in violation of the Federal Constitution, are null and void; and it is to be hoped that they will be repealed. At all events, it will be the duty of the President faithfully to execute the Fugitive Slave Law as well as others; and it is not to be presumed, in advance, that he will fail to perform this duty.—The President then proceeds to argue against the doctrine that secession is a constitutional remedy for any wrongs. The Constitution contains no sanction for such a measure. The Government created by it derives its powers directly from the people, was designed to be perpetual, and was invested with all the powers necessary to carry out its laws. "To the extent of its delegated powers," says the President, "the Constitution of the United States is as much a part of the Constitution of each State, and is as binding upon its people, as though it had been textually inserted therein;" and "all Senators and Representatives of the United States, and all members of State Legislatures, and all Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, are bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution." The right of resistance on the part of the governed against the oppression of their governments is indeed admitted. "It exists," says the President, "independently of all constitutions, and has been exercised at all periods of the world's history. Under it old governments have been destroyed and new ones have taken their place. It is embodied in strong and express language in our own Declaration of Independence. But the distinction must ever be observed, that this is revolution against an established government, and not a voluntary secession from it by virtue of an inherent constitutional right. In short, let us look the danger fairly in the face: Secession is neither more nor less than revolution. It may or it may not be a justifiable revolution, but still it is revolution."—The President then gives his views of the powers and duties of the Government in the present crisis. The Executive is bound by oath to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. But the only laws which define his action are those of February 28, 1795, and March 3, 1807. These authorize him, after he has ascertained that the Marshal with his posse comitatus is unable to execute civil or criminal process in a particular case, to call forth the militia and employ the army and navy to aid him in performing this service. But this duty can not be performed in a State where no judicial authority exists to issue process, where there is no Marshal to enforce it, and where, if there were such an officer, the entire population would resist him. This state of things now exists in South Carolina, where all the Federal officers through whose agency the laws can be executed have resigned, and whose places it is now impossible to fill. These obstacles do not lie in the way of the collection of the revenue at Charleston; this is still collected at that port, and should the Collector resign, his place might be filled. The property of the United States in South Carolina has been purchased, with the consent of the Legislature of that State, for the erection of forts, etc., and Congress has the power of exclusive legislation therein. It is not believed that any forcible attempt will be made to expel the United States from this property; but in case such an attempt shall be made, the officer in command has orders to act strictly on the defensive; and in this case the responsibility for consequences will rightfully rest on the heads of the assailants.—The President then discusses the question whether Congress has the constitutional power to coerce a State into submission which is attempting to withdraw, or has withdrawn, from the Confederacy. He concludes that "so far from this power having been delegated to Congress, it was expressly refused by the Convention which framed the Constitution;" and even if Congress possessed this power, it would be unwise to exercise it.—This portion of the Message concludes by recommending conciliatory measures. That which the President suggests is an "explanatory amendment" to the Constitution on the subject of slavery. Several instances are cited in which a similar course has been pursued. The amendment suggested by the President, which might originate either with Congress or the State Legislatures, is confined to the final settlement of the true construction of the Constitution on three special points:

- "1. An express recognition of the right of property in slaves in the States where it now exists or may hereafter exist.
- "2. The duty of protecting this right in all the common Territories throughout their territorial existence, and until they shall be admitted as States into the Union, with or without Slavery, as their Constitutions may prescribe.
- "3. A like recognition of the right of the master to have his slave, who has escaped from one State to another, restored and 'delivered up' to him, and of the validity of the Fugitive Slave Law enacted for this purpose, together with a declaration that all State laws impairing or defeating this right are violations of the Constitution, and are consequently null and void."

Passing to our foreign relations, the Message represents them, with a few exceptions, as highly satisfactory. This is especially the case with respect to Great Britain, France, Russia, Austria, Brazil, China, and Japan. With none of these nations, Great Britain only excepted, exist any questions of difference; and with Great Britain only that of the sovereignty over the island of San Juan, which is now under negotiation. With Spain our relations are more complicated, though less dangerous, than before. The President repeats his former recommendation for the acquisition of Cuba by fair purchase.—With Mexico our relations remain wholly unsatisfactory, the distracted condition of that republic preventing any satisfactory adjustment. It is believed that the treaty now before the Senate will prove advantageous.—With the republics of Central America our relations are, upon the whole, satisfactory.—The state of things in Utah and Kansas is presented in a gratifying aspect. The destitution in the latter Territory, occasioned by the failure of crops, is referred to the consideration of Congress, with a recommendation that if any constitutional measure for relief can be devised, it should be adopted.—No slaves have within the year been unlawfully introduced from Africa; and a strong sentiment prevails against the crime of setting on foot military expeditions against States with which we are at peace.—In view of the deficiency of our revenues, the President urges a revision of the existing tariff, recommending specific instead of ad valorem duties. He repeats his former recommendations of a law appointing a certain day, previous to the 4th of March, in each odd year, for the election of representatives to Congress throughout the Union; for an act to favor a railroad to the Pacific; and for a law authorizing the Executive to employ our naval force for the protection of American citizens in Mexico and Central and Southern America.

In the House of Representatives, upon the motion of Mr. Boteler, of Virginia, by a vote of 145 to 38, so much of the Message as relates to the perilous state of the Union was referred to a Select Committee, to consist of one member from each State.

Some members from the South declined to vote on this resolution: one from South Carolina on the ground that his State was, except as a matter of form, out of the Union, and therefore the delegation took no interest in the question; and several members from other Southern States, because their Legislatures had called conventions to consider the matter, and they did not wish the aid of Congress.

The Secretary of the Treasury reports that the entire expenditures of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1860, were as follows:

Civil, foreign intercourse, etc.....	$37,969,571
Interior Department.....	3,955,686
War Department.....	16,409,767
Navy Department.....	11,513,150
Public debt.....	17,613,628
Total.....	$77,462,102

The revenue, from all sources, was—

Balance, July 1, 1859.....	$4,339,275
Customs.....	53,187,195
Public lands.....	1,778,555
Treasury notes and loans.....	20,775,200
Miscellaneous.....	1,011,054
Total.....	$31,091,809

—Leaving a balance on hand July 1, 1860, of $3,629,207. Before January 1 over a million and a quarter will be required to pay interest on the public debt, five millions to redeem maturing Treasury notes, and large sums for the current expenses of Government. The Secretary recommends that Treasury notes should be issued for ten millions of dollars, to be secured by a pledge of the public lands. He estimates the expenditures of the ensuing year at $60,000,000, and the revenues at $63,000,000. These estimates, however, are made irrespective of the present revulsion, which must materially reduce the receipts of Government.—The Secretary of War reports that the army has been actively employed against hostile Indians. Its strength is the same as last year. He recommends the rifling of our smooth-bore cannon, and that the entire army be supplied with breech-loading arms.—The Secretary of the Navy reports that the Commission appointed to examine the sailing-vessels of the United States recommend the conversion into steamers of three line-of-battle ships, but do not advise the application of steam to brigs, sloops, and frigates. He urges an increase of the navy. During the year 12 slaves have been captured by our vessels, and 3119 Africans liberated.—The Secretary of the Interior reports that, during the year and a quarter ending September 30, 16,385,361 acres of public lands were proclaimed for sale, 9,649,471 surveyed, and 12,060,053 sold. There are 11,284 pensioners, who draw $1,001,018. During the year 5638 patents have been issued, and 84 caveats filed.—The Postmaster-General reports the following statistics of his Department from 1858 to 1860, with estimates for 1861-'62:

Years.	Expenditures.	Revenues.	Deficiencies.
1858.....	$12,721,636 56	$3,186,792 88	$4,534,843 70
1859.....	14,964,493 33	7,968,494 07	6,996,009 26
1860.....	14,874,772 89	9,218,067 40	5,656,705 49
1861.....	15,665,135 04	9,676,711 00	5,988,424 04
1862.....	14,955,535 23	10,398,934 60	4,566,600 63

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

In Mexico the Liberal party still retain the ascendancy which they had gained. After the capture of Guadalajara, its defenders were incorporated into the army of their Liberal opponents. Marquez, the most dashing of Miramon's officers, who had advanced from the capital to relieve Guadalajara, was defeated, and his troops joined their former enemies. Puebla, the only strong place besides the capital remaining to Miramon, it is presumed has fallen into the hands of the Liberals, whose forces were again concentrating upon the City of Mexico, with favorable prospects for its reduction.—The previous pages of this Number of the Magazine contain an article descriptive of the new Chiriqui route across the Isthmus of Panama. The Report of our Government Expedition abundantly confirms the views advanced in this paper, and apparently establish the fact that this route furnishes a means of transit combining the requisites of good ports upon both oceans, and a practicable railway route between them.—Buenos Ayres has at length re-assumed its place as one of the States of the Argentine Confederation. This was formally accomplished on the 21st of October, when the Governor took the oath of allegiance. The event was celebrated by a solemn Te Deum in the Cathedral, and by public rejoicings in the city of Buenos Ayres. Commander Page has concluded the work of surveying the principal branches of the Rio de la Plata to a distance of more than two thousand miles from the mouth of that river. The result is, that great streams hitherto wholly unknown to the world, are shown to be accessible to steamboat navigation, and a rich and valuable region is opened for colonization and commerce.—Between Peru and the United States a diplomatic rupture has occurred, growing out of the refusal of the Peruvian Government to make indemnity for the capture of two American vessels seized and confiscated on the charge of taking guano contrary to the laws of Peru. Our Minister, Mr. Clay, has demanded and received his passports.

EUROPE.

The Prince of Wales, after a long voyage, has reached home. Leaving Portland on the 20th of October, on the 6th of November he had arrived within a day's sail of England, when a heavy gale arrested his course for more than a week, causing great anxiety for his safety. The vessels, however, arrived on the 14th, having suffered nothing beyond a deficiency in supplies; and on the following day the Prince reached Windsor Castle.—What is positively known of the progress of affairs in Italy may be summed up in a few words. The career of the Garibaldian and Sardinian troops has been one continued triumph. The union of Naples to Piedmont was submitted to the popular vote; and the result was 1,102,499 Ayes to 9371 Nays. Victor Emanuel has formally assumed the sovereignty of the Kingdom of Italy. There appears to be little disposition on the part of any of the Great European Powers to interfere in Italian affairs. But serious disagreements exist between Garibaldi and the Sardinian Government as to ulterior measures. Garibaldi has for the present withdrawn from the scene of action. In his farewell address to his army he says, significantly: "Once more I repeat my battle-cry, 'To arms, all of you!' If March, 1861, does not find a million of Italians in arms, then alas for Italy! Let the March of 1861—or, if necessary, February—find us all at our posts." The point of difference appears to be that Garibaldi wishes to make an attempt to drive the Austrians from Venice, while Victor Emanuel and his councilors hesitate at taking this hazardous step, preferring, for the present at least, to limit their efforts to the consolidation of the kingdom of Italy.

THE EAST.

The war in China has fairly commenced. On the 24th of August the French and English attacked the Chinese forts near the mouth of the Pei-ho, from which they had been so disastrously repulsed. These were carried after severe loss on both sides, the Chinese manifesting a bravery and skill of which they have heretofore shown no examples. Fruitless negotiations were then instituted; and upon their failure the Europeans advanced upon Peking. At the latest dates they were encamped near the Chinese capital.

Coins, Medals, and Seals, Ancient and Modern, Illustrated and Described. Edited by W. C. PRIME. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) Among the pursuits more or less intimately connected with various important branches of knowledge, the study of numismatics occupies a high rank. The illustrations which it affords of numerous historical problems, of the manners and customs of ancient nations, and of the establishment and progress of political institutions, recommend it to the attention of the liberal scholar; while the collection of coins, on a systematic plan, is not only a source of valuable information, but forms an elegant and fascinating amusement. In many portions of this country the taste for the pursuit has, within a few years, become a passion. Large and expensive collections have been accumulated; and what, in the first instance, was usually regarded as a harmless monomania at best, now receives a large share of attention from intelligent amateurs in every walk of life. The publication of this comprehensive manual, accordingly, takes place at an opportune moment. The author is well known by his admirable volumes of Oriental travel, which evince not only the ready tact of a sagacious observer, but an enthusiastic spirit of antiquarian research. In the course of his historical studies an interest was naturally awakened in the subject of coins; and the present work is the result of wide reading and investigation, as well as of successful experience in collecting a valuable numismatic cabinet. It is intended to present, in a cheap and condensed form, the outlines of the science, which are essential to its intelligent study, but which novices, fresh to the pursuit, could not otherwise obtain except with great labor and expense. The effect of the work will doubtless be to encourage an enlightened taste for numismatics; while it will throw cold water on the blind zeal of accumulating rare and curious, but worthless pieces of metal. The volume is profusely illustrated by representations of ancient and modern coins, which, with the judicious comments of the editor, compose an attractive introduction to the science, that can not fail to be of eminent utility to the youthful student.

Some interesting details are given in the volume with regard to the comparative value of different United States coins, which, if duly heeded by the inexperienced collector, would often save him from getting his fingers burned. The dollar of 1794, for instance, is now very scarce, and commands a high price. In an ordinary state of preservation it is worth from $4 to $5, and in fine condition is rated at a much higher figure. Most of the dollars from 1794 to 1804 are not worth any premium on the weight of the silver, unless in extra fine condition. Only two or three specimens are known of the dollar of 1804. The dollars of 1836, 1838, and 1839 are rare, according to the dates, and sell from $6 to $18, according to date and condition. In 1851 and 1852 no dollars were issued for circulation, and the specimens struck at the Mint are very rare, commanding from $15 to $18 each at auction. The Mint proofs of the dollar of 1858, which were never issued for circulation, are sold from $4 to $5. The dime of 1796 is rare, selling from $1 50 to $2 50. Rarest of all is the dime of 1797, which commands from $7 50 to $8 50. The cent is a favorite coin with collectors, and often sells for an extravagant price. The rarest is the cent of 1799, which, in good condition, is worth about $10. Of this there are many counterfeits, altered from the cents of 1797 and 1798, which are often not easily detected even with the aid of the best magnifying-glasses. In 1815 no cent was coined, and any alleged specimens that are exhibited are counterfeits.

In one of his chapters Mr. Prime offers some practical hints to young collectors, which are none the less instructive on account of the pithy brevity with which they are expressed. Confine your attention to one class of coins at a time. Without rejecting other coins or medals not belonging to this class, give no time, labor, or money to their accumulation. Do not content yourself with poor specimens. Take the first specimen you can find of any coin, good or bad, but always exchange it for a better specimen at the first possible moment. Never pay the slightest attention to a coin whose date is doubtful. Having completed one series of coins, commence another series, and complete that. You will thus obtain, in time, an interesting and valuable cabinet. Arrange your ancient, foreign, and colonial coins by States, your regular series of United States by dates, your tradesmen's cards alphabetically, and your political tokens according to your own fancy. Clean your coins very carefully—the brass ones with spirits of hartshorn and prepared chalk; the silver with soap and water and a soft brush; and those of white metal with alcohol, or soap and water, or the hartshorn and chalk. Never pay a big price for worthless coins. Few coins are worth a high price. Even the rarity of a coin is no test of its real numismatic value. As soon as this is made the standard you cease to be a numismatist, and become a speculator.

The practical, common sense character of Mr. Prime's book may be seen from the preceding samples, and we will only add that its value is much increased by the excellent indexes with which it is accompanied.

Methodism Successful; and the Internal Causes of its Success, by Rev. B. F. TEFFT, D.D., LL.D. (Published by Derby and Jackson.) The singularly rapid and extensive progress of the Methodist persuasion, since its establishment by the pious zeal of John Wesley, is vigorously set forth in this interesting volume. It gives a general view of its history and present condition, a sketch of several of its most eminent preachers and divines, and a philosophical analysis of the causes and conditions of its development. The secret of its success is to be found, according to Dr. Tefft, in its character as a system of religious faith and experience. Methodism, in his view, is not an artificial aggregate of opinions and practices, gradually built up from a small and insignificant beginning, but a natural and legitimate growth from the single point of the necessity of personal religion. Methodism as an idea, as a movement, as a system, may be resolved into the personal religion of the founder, multiplied into the numerous body of his adherents, who, in every thing which they have accomplished, have been governed and propelled by this common and all-controlling force. This idea is expanded with great variety of illustration, forming a volume of uncommon interest, not only to the student of religious opinions but to the general reader.

The Odyssey of Homer, literally translated, with explanatory notes, by THEODORE ALOIS BUCKLEY, forms a new volume of "Harper's Classical Library." The edition includes the Hymns and Minor Poems that have been attributed to Homer, completing all that tradition has connected with his name. The text of Ruhnken, Ernesti, and Hermann has been followed, with few unimportant variations. An interesting feature of the volume is found in the frequent quotations that are given from the paraphrases of Chapman, Congreve, and Shelley. The Life of Homer, which has been falsely ascribed to Herodotus—and which is, in fact, the earliest memoir of Homer extant—is presented in a lively version by Mr. Kenneth Mackenzie.

Life of Andrew Jackson, by JAMES PARTON. (Published by Mason Brothers.) In this volume Mr. Parton brings to a close the elaborate work in which he has undertaken to portray the life and character of the hero of New Orleans and the unrelenting foe of the United States Bank. The present installment extends over an eventful period of American history, reaching from the nomination of General Jackson to the Presidency in 1823 to the close of his life, in 1845. It consequently includes the exciting controversy relative to the canvass of 1824 and 1828; the policy of the new Democratic Administration; the reign of terror among the office-holders; the dissensions in the cabinet; the re-election of President Jackson; the development of Nullification; the war upon the Bank; the French imbroglio; the retirement to the Hermitage, and the peaceful close of a militant and stormy career. The biographer has performed his task with unabated alacrity and boldness unto its completion. He has evidently fortified himself by a thorough study of his subject, explored every available source of information, gained possession of the testimony of voluminous documents, and, without dismay at his vast accumulation of materials, has wrought them up into a singularly spicy narrative, with scarcely a line of dullness from the beginning to the end. Whatever differences of opinion may be called forth by his estimate of the salient events in the life of Jackson, or his appreciation of the peculiar traits of his character, no one will deny him the merit of rare diligence of research, conscientious fidelity of statement, and piquant energy of description.

A new edition of Lord MACAULAY'S Critical, Historical, and Miscellaneous Essays, with an Introduction and Biographical Sketch, by E. P. WHIPPLE, is published by Sheldon and Co. The essays are arranged in the exact chronological order of their composition, and comprise several pieces, of unquestionable authenticity, which have never before been included in any edition of Macaulay's miscellaneous writings. The Introductory Essay, by Mr. Whipple, consists of an interesting biography of Lord Macaulay, and a judicious critical estimate of his literary merits. Mr. Whipple remarks that, in losing him, England lost the man who, beyond all other men, carried in his brain the facts of her history. The strongest impression derived from his writings is that of the robust and masculine character of his intellect. He was a stout and tough polemic, thoroughly furnished for combat, and who neither gives nor expects quarter. No tenderness to frailty interferes with the merciless severity of his judgments. His love for the beautiful and true generally took the form of hatred for what was deformed and false. He found a grim delight in holding up to public execration the meanness, baseness, fraud, falsehood, and corruption which he abhorred with his whole heart and soul. His progress through history was marked by the erection of the gallows, the gibbet, and the stake; he seemed to consider that the glory of the judge rested on the number of the executions; and he has hanged, drawn, and quartered many individuals whose cases are now submitted to a rehearing at the bar of public opinion.—The other leading features of Lord Macaulay's character are commented on by Mr. Whipple in a manner that does equal credit to his candor and his acuteness.

The Children's Picture Fable-Book contains nearly two hundred well-known fables, in a version suited to the capacity of the youngest, and illustrated by a profusion of irresistibly-spirited engravings, from designs by Harrison Weir. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Travels in the Regions of the Upper and Lower Amoor, by THOMAS WITLAM ATKINSON, is published in a handsome octavo volume, with numerous illustrations, by Harper and Brothers. A summary of a portion of this admirable book of travels has been given in a previous number of our Magazine, enabling the reader to form an imperfect idea of the variety and richness of its contents, and the remarkable animation and graphic power of the narrative.

A neat pocket edition, in blue and gold, of WILLIS'S Poems and of Mrs. OSGOOD'S Poems (issued by Clarke, Austin, Maynard, and Co.), will attract the attention of purchasers of gift-books for the holiday season. On the poetical fascinations of these favorite writers it would be superfluous to descant at this time of day.

Bob and Walter: with the Story of Breckneck Ledge (published by Phinney, Blakeman, and Mason), is one of the most charming juvenile stories of the season, and will delight the heart of more than one youthful reader.

Evan Harrington; or, He would be a Gentleman (published by Harper and Brothers), is a spirited novel, illustrative of the distinctions of rank in English society, and remarkable for the vivacity of its narrative and the dramatic raciness of its dialogue.

A new series of Tales and Sketches, entitled Studies from Life, by Miss MULOCK, the popular authoress of "John Halifax, Gentleman," is published by Harper and Brothers. They exhibit the same knowledge of the world, penetration into motives, and grace and facility of expression, which have given her such an eminent rank among the imaginative writers of the day.

Clarke, Austin, Maynard, and Co. have published an attractive edition of DICKENS'S Little Folks, consisting of a series of selections from the writings of the great novelist, in his own language; in which are described the fortunes of Little Nell, Smike, Oliver Twist, Little Paul, Florence Dombey, and other of his celebrated juvenile characters. It is brought out in twelve volumes, and is illustrated by Darley.

NATIONAL LIFE.—Modern civilization owes a great deal to the little city of Geneva, as a strong-hold of Protestant freedom and a nursery of manly culture. The name won for this home of his adoption by that somewhat hard and intolerant, yet powerful and devoted reformer, Calvin, has never been lost; and while, in the eighteenth century, the masters of the New Illuminism, Voltaire and Rousseau, gave Geneva a kind of note that might well have shaken the bones of Calvin and Farel in their graves, even those great free-thinkers have done much to revive the interest in the great social and religious questions of our age, and the Genevan thinkers and scholars now take a leading position in Christendom. Some of the questions which they agitate from their point of view come very near to us in our different position, and we have rarely been more interested in any philosophical discussion than that which has recently taken place between Comte Léon de Gasparin and M. Bungener, upon what they call Individualism and Multitudinism in the Church. Substituting Society for the Church, and bringing into survey dominant tendencies in our own national life, we may take some good hints for our own guidance, and perhaps say a wholesome word to the times upon the relations of the Many and the One, or of Individualism and Multitudinism in America.

There can be no doubt that we are Many; and probably no nation on the face of the earth is made up of such various materials as ours. The diversity that Rome and her rival empires had in their colonies and tributaries we have in our own body politic; and the varieties of blood, from the phlegmatic Chinese to the excitable Irishman, are less than the varieties of creed, which range from the absolutism that claims unquestioning allegiance to the Pope, to the thorough-going rationalism that makes out each man to be his own priest, Bible, and Church. Our political faiths differ quite as widely; and while there is great enthusiasm in certain quarters for statute law and national union, there is, on the other hand, no small disposition to make each man a law to himself; and the transcendental philosopher who went to jail to prove his conscientious objection to taxes, did but carry out consistently an idea by no means uncommon in our land. Without seeking for any new theory of society, we may find in the obvious principles of our common nature the grounds of mutual difference and mutual association. Look at that score of boys who are sauntering home from school. They have just left the government of their teacher or teachers, and are all on the qui vive with the sense of liberty and the love of fun. Watch them, and note the certainty with which they substitute one government for another, and go to the empire of play from the empire of study. Now they divide into two parties, under exact laws and rigorous leadership, for the games of cricket or foot-ball; and again they march together, under a captain, as a juvenile military corps, and every offender against the rules of discipline is stigmatized as an offender against the common welfare. After the plays are over the boys tend homeward, each with his own step and expression, pleased to resume their own individual liberty, yet quite sure to awaken the next morning with fresh spirit for new studies and new sports, that shall bring the many and the one pleasantly and profitably together. It will not be amiss to note some of the causes that control these two tendencies among us, and tend on the one hand to separate, and on the other hand to unite, us children of larger growth.

We tend to become many, obviously, first of all, because we are, by position and history, so free to follow our individual dispositions; and while, in other countries, the first truth taught the child is that the individual belongs to the State, the first truth generally taught here is that the State belongs to the individual. Our history presents to us a picture of companies of emigrants from leading nations of Europe, who came hither at different times and for different purposes, and who organized governments for protection and defense. The different colonies were brought together not so much by any predetermined theory as by mutual necessity; and we became a nation because assailed by common enemies and occupying a common soil. Our fathers indeed had, for the most part, one language and one ancestral tradition; yet not all of the colonies were English, and they that were so were not sufficiently united in Church and State opinions and usages to agree upon a common platform, unless moved to it by the pressure of a common danger. No friendship was heartier than that between the best men of Massachusetts and Virginia, yet it was something far more imperious than the feeling of good-fellowship that brought the Roundheads of the Bay State and the Cavaliers of the Old Dominion to stand shoulder to shoulder, and to fight through the long and weary war of liberty under the lead of Washington. Probably no movement that ever took place on earth did so much, in the same time, to make a nation of scattered colonies as the War of Independence. Yet it must not be forgotten that the primitive colonies had very marked idiosyncrasies, which must be expected to appear more emphatically after the pressure of common danger was removed, and new opportunities and competitions presented themselves. Moreover, in each colony itself the germs of stubborn nonconformity that came from the old fields of European strife could not be expected to bear their fruit at once; and we may reasonably believe that the State and National loyalty inspired by the Revolution did much to keep in check personal and sectional eccentricities. As history usually reads, and human nature develops its mingled elements, we ought to be prepared to see stubborn opinions and wills in conflict with old precedents; and we surely ought not to wonder that uncomfortable feelings should arise in a new and expanding country, whose people have hardly entered into the full sense of their liberty, and taken a full survey of their domain, after observing the difficulty which older nations, bound together by the dangers and victories and usages of a thousand years, encounter in preserving their harmony and integrity. The old nations need constantly to renew their peace by reviewing their history, and reforming their policy, and refreshing their patriotism. Why should not we do the same? What folly can be greater than to regard liberty—the very liberty that makes us free to act—as if it were so manifest a destiny as to dismiss free agency, and keep us in our position by an iron fatalism?

We shall see more clearly the need of revising and quickening our national life by taking a glance at the material, political, and social causes that tend to separate and disintegrate us. We have no eye to any party questions or interests, but we propose merely to have a little kindly conference that may promote good neighborhood. The most obvious or likely cause of alienation of our people from the central government would at first seem to be the marvelous expansion of our territory, and the consequent remoteness of such large numbers from the seat of national government, and, in fact, from any strong-hold of civilization. Men depend very much upon vicinity for incentive and guidance; and although for a time after they leave their old home in the midst of a thick population they cling to it all the more fondly, and even exaggerate its charms in the enchantment of distance, yet ere long they find themselves in the main engrossed by the stern realities before their eyes, and the backwoodsman is in danger of a kind of barbaric individualism that needs effective counteraction. A certain school of thinkers, indeed, glory in this very isolation, as giving not only self-reliance but education. Yet, if we interpret human nature fairly by the light of philosophy and experience, we shall see clearly that as man rises in culture and dignity his associations with his own kind multiply and rise; while, on the other hand, as life sinks down into the low plane of merely animal appetite, sociality vanishes, and man, like the beast, thinks more of being amply fed than of any high social satisfaction. In fact, the lowest instincts, and only they, are merely private, and he who is wholly ruled by them, and who needs only to be clothed and sheltered and fed, is properly called an idiot or private person; while, as the true man rises in the development of his powers, he forms constantly new associations with his race, and in every book and art, example, lesson, he finds himself in closer fellowship with the living and the dead. We are not of course ready to apply any harsh epithets to our border population, yet we do regard them as in danger of rudeness and semi-barbarism in the absence of the mighty power of public opinion and social usage, that do so much to keep our passions in check, and bring us up to a wholesome standard of average decency and self-control. Here, in the midst of habitual social refinement and positive Christian institutions, a certain measure of good behavior becomes a social necessity; and there is a great deal in our manners and conduct that comes to us from the common life, like the quiet of Sunday with its church-going, clean clothes, and serious lessons. The more remote we are from the centres of civilization the more of this social influence we lose, and the greater is the need of keeping and strengthening all the ties that bind the backwoodsman to his nation and his race. Now we hazard nothing in saying that the national post-office, with its conveyance of letters and papers to all parts of the land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Gulf of Mexico to the St. Lawrence, is an immense power in promoting civilization and repelling barbarism. It seems to us a very simple institution, and we take it as a matter of course, like the green grass or the falling water, yet it is the product and expression of our national power, and without its aid the distant parts of the country would be virtually severed from the great capitals, and millions of men now within a few days' communication with their kindred and friends, would be virtually driven into exile beyond reach of the cheering word that now comes to them almost on the wings of the wind. A postage stamp costs three cents, and is soon defaced, but what a world of meaning there is in its face! It is the coinage, not of gold, but of the higher currency of human thought and feeling. That little piece of paper virtually says to every one of us: "You belong to a great nation that cares for each one of you, and bears word from each one of you at will to every city, village, and outpost in the land." The head of Washington is justly stamped upon every national letter, and if every man in America would take out the old family Bible the next time he receives a letter from home or distant kindred, and will put the letter upon the Bible and solemnly ask himself how much he and humanity owe to the great providential fact which that red vignette commemorates, he will need no new apostle of patriotism to rebuke his languor and quicken his national enthusiasm. The mere fact that the letter or paper came to him speaks volumes; but we must also remember the worth of the contents of the letter or the paper. Letters keep household affections alive, and newspapers are the circular letters of the whole nation. It is this double communication, secured by national power in conjunction with the new locomotive forces that are doing so much to annihilate distance, that is counteracting the isolation of our border population, and bringing ever nearer the main currents of our national life. Something of this communication might remain apart from the national jurisdiction; but even if the message reached its destination, it would lose much of its worth in ceasing to be associated with the imperial hand that now bears it on its way. The familiar post-mark itself is a cipher of loyal fellowship that interprets at once our whole public history, and with every mail that comes into the village every villager feels himself bound with new ties to the whole nation. We who live generally in the crowd can hardly appreciate the socializing power of our public lines of conveyance, unless we can remember some season of absence from home, when a letter was more than a cordial to our homesickness, and seemed to bring meat and drink and friends at once within its marvelous seal. When we consider, moreover, how rapidly the best thoughts that concern the nation and mankind are circulated in our mails, and the remotest sections are in constant conference with the centres of intelligence and activity, we take more encouraging views of the unity of our people.

As national communication does so much to correct the estrangement growing out of extension of territory, we should look to better public spirit to correct the sharp individualism that is apt to grow out of the absorbing pursuit of gain and the disposition to measure worth by wealth, in the absence of the old hereditary titles of honor. With us, what is called business is the absorbing pursuit, and the pursuit becomes narrow and belittling when it is followed merely for private ends, apart from large associations with the country and the world. Surely our national life tends much to enlarge and elevate business, by connecting it with the great interests and destinies of the nation; and while we do not think that trade of itself creates patriotism, and that he is a true lover of his country who looks only to the gains to be made in her markets, we are quite certain that he is not only a better merchant, but a better citizen, who carries national feeling into his business, and identifies the prosperity of his country with his own. For our own part, we are always encouraged at seeing the interest taken by our men of business in leading public questions, for it assures us that not only are they giving their keen judgment to public affairs, that they may secure their private interests by the general welfare, but that they are educating a powerful habit of practical forethought, and running lines of substantial connection along which currents of patriotic feeling can not but travel in due time. Any sensible man who will study the bearing of the stability and prosperity of our Government upon the business of the country will find himself becoming somewhat of a statesman as well as a political economist: and we regard commerce, agriculture, and manufactures as three great national bureaus that are watching with careful eye over the public welfare throughout all changes of parties and cabinets. We hope to see the bond between business and government more instead of less, for we have great confidence in the judgment of a people that are trained to think carefully for themselves and their children, and test every public measure by its bearing upon their welfare and the prospects of their children. True, indeed, that traffic may make men mercenary, yet the mercantile spirit that looks to sure and constant gains from honorable industry is much better than the military spirit that burns to grasp fortune or fame in a single battle, and measures success by destruction. Let the mercantile spirit be enlarged and exalted by the beautiful arts, the sciences, humanity, and religion, and we need have no fears that business will make us drudges or misers. We regard the true idealist to be he who brings the best ideas and energies to bear on actual affairs, instead of forsaking things actual to lose himself in the clouds. Reality is found only when truth is carried out or made actual; and America will gain in ideal wisdom, as well as in material wealth, when she solves the great problem of her industrial prosperity, and the closest alliance is cemented between the farms, work-shops, homes, and schools of the people and the Government of the nation.

It may be that the practical interest taken by our people at large in public affairs, on account of their bearing on private welfare, does something to make up for the absence of that national feeling which in other countries comes from the spirit of caste and the combination of privileged officials and hereditary dignitaries. Were it not, in fact, from the active part taken by the people at large in the choice of rulers and the administration of government, they might sometimes be in danger of forgetting that we have any rulers or government, since the process of election is more conspicuous than the fact of somebody's being elected; and our civil functionaries are comparatively withdrawn from public notice as soon as their success is certain. Certainly our official personages do not of themselves, as in the Old World, form a distinct class, who embody in themselves the sentiment of loyalty. Our Members of Congress go from the ranks of the people, and return thither without retaining any peculiar social caste; and even the functionaries, the most stable in the tenure of their office, as our army and navy officers, are too poorly paid and too few to do much to concentrate in themselves the dignity of the state. It is all the more important, then, that the national sentiment should be distributed widely throughout the homes and business of the people, and that we should trace out carefully the ties of connection between each citizen and the whole nation. In this way the public spirit of the old times of patriotism was nurtured. The town meeting was the germ of the State Legislature and the National Congress; and every town meeting now, as it fixes the annual tax for schools and roads, carries in its presence something of the dignity of its providential mission, and speaks of the whole nation to which it belongs.

When we consider the political and social causes that tend to divide our people, we can not but place two of these in the front rank—party-spirit and the spirit of sect, or reform movement—the one busying itself with measures directly political, and the other appealing more directly to moral and religious principles. So far as the existence of parties is concerned we can not regret it, for where there is any interest there will be differences of opinion and feeling, and parties are but the embodiment of such difference. In fact, where there are no parties, we make them for our own pleasure, and do not really enjoy our sport unless we divide our ranks, and so take sides. Indifference is one of the first dangers of a republic, and the neglect of suffrage by so large a portion of our prosperous citizens, in our great cities, at our ordinary elections, gives us some hint of what the apathy of the people at large might be without the stimulus of party-spirit to lead them to the polls. The trouble with party distinctions is not that they exist, but that they are allowed to be so exclusive and absorbing, that vast numbers of people seem to think of the point in which each party differs from its opponents, and to forget the many points in which they agree together. It is a comforting thought, however, that the points of divergence so vary in each age, and almost in each national election, that no permanent lines are drawn, and no hereditary grudges are transmitted. Party-spirit never raged higher than in the old times of Federalism and Democracy; yet it would be somewhat difficult for any of the champions of those famous factions of a half century ago to define his position by the present lines of demarkation, and there seems to be little fear of any feuds of York and Lancaster dividing us by the prestige of great names. What disastrous strifes may arise from sectional interests of a permanent character is quite a different question, yet one that by no means compels us to a gloomy solution, since parties are constantly changing, and it is the policy of the opposition to approach as near its rival platform as it can without positively accepting it. Rival factions are said generally to differ from each other in number but about five per cent., and of course the minority is obliged to agree as much as possible with the majority, so as to give the least offense and conciliate the most favor. The whole history of our country thus far leads us to believe that sectional strifes will be overruled by new points of policy or principle, and in the readjustment of parties new and more auspicious combinations will be made. The present aspects of opinion in this country already indicate the new formation, and encourage the hope that, if extreme opinions are held in different portions of the Atlantic States, there is a great reconciling power between that must at last harmonize alarming antagonisms and keep the peace and unity of the nation. The great West is probably destined to carry out this wholesome conservatism, and combine with our ruling commercial cities in checking ultraisms from whatever quarter, no matter whether the theorist exaggerates the prerogative of individual opinion or of State absolutism. The West is likely, we think, to cure us of one disposition which seems to run in the blood of many of us—the disposition to legislate too much, and to interfere with the personal liberty which is an American instinct. We are to learn, as we never have learned yet, that a republican government is peculiar, not only in the tenure, but in the extent of its power, and its jurisdiction is limited in the range of its application as well as in the responsibility of its officers. The majority rules indeed, but it should rule only in those matters that come within its sway. If the question be who shall be Mayor of the city or Governor of the State, the majority must decide; but the majority has not right to decide upon all other questions and regulate a private citizen's expenses, tastes, table, or costume. It will be a new day when we learn to let many things alone that have given us a great deal of trouble, and we may be assured that no course leads to so much antagonism as the attempt to force an agreement. In the celestial space each orb moves freely in its own orbit, and the magnificent distances between the various members of our system teach us the wisdom of leaving more earthly bodies to walk each its own predestined way. We are not willing to do even what we like on compunction, and even the welcome dinner-bell would cease to draw us to the grateful repast if rung by an enemy who had mastered the city, and forbade our dining at any other hour. We are not fond of being tied into an easy-chair, or tethered to the cherished friend with whom we so gladly walk; and, in fact, the first principle of social as of physical health consists in the distribution of vital forces throughout their appropriate centres, and not forcing the hands to do the work of the feet, or the ears to take the place of the eyes. All the members move together happily only when they move freely, and if the legs are sometimes a little antic, it is better to teach them discretion by due liberty than to check the trouble by tying them or by cutting them off. This obvious principle is, we believe, destined to settle many vexed and ominous questions among us. The great instincts and habitudes of our people will have their way, and it is the true wisdom, and we believe the true humanity also, to leave each section free to develop its activities and institutions upon its own ground, and leave the will of Providence and the mighty forces of civilization to work out the great future of the country and the race.

It is very hard for some people to consent to this doctrine, so set are they upon legislating upon all things for the whole world, and making the ballot-box but a new form of the old despotism of the bullet and the bayonet. But we must remember that there are some things which we did not make and can not unmake. Our country, in its institutions as well as in its soil, is a great Providential fact, and we make a sad mistake when we consider it as wholly flexible beneath the shaping hand of personal opinion. If we were thirty-three allied tribes instead of so many confederated States we could more readily understand the complex and stubborn elements of our organization. We ought surely, then, to be wise enough to see the truth now, and shun the folly of undertaking to think for communities as free as we are, and quite as much bent upon following their own convictions. The tendency to deprive others of their rightful jurisdiction, and to legislate for them as far as votes can possibly do it, comes from a habit of mind that is full of force and full also of dangers. It comes from the doctrine that the State, or nation, or community, is only an aggregation of individuals, and thus the only criterion is the majority of individual opinions. Accordingly the State is nothing, and has neither body nor soul to give it unity, and the many can not be one except in the aggregation of voices. This doctrine may keep men on the alert, and quicken discussion; but it can not create nor conserve the best forms of social polity, and it has not been held by the master builders of our fabric. The founders of our Constitution did not create our Government out of their own theories and opinions, but they embodied the rights and usages of the people under the old colonies, and the nation was thence defined not merely by the figures of the census, but the consolidated and continuous life contained in its laws and organization. This life made us more than we made it, and the abortive attempts that have so often been put forth to create new institutions by mere vote without root in the life of the community, ought to teach us the folly of our too prevailing dogmatism, and the wisdom of leaving men more to themselves and their institutions. It is not always easy to set down in writing the vital Constitution of a State or nation; for there is a great deal of unwritten law that is as powerful and authoritative as any upon the statute book; yet we are not long in finding out when the common instincts of a people are outraged, and it is altogether idle to expect by our metaphysics or rhetoric to change their character or institutions.

Our national life is acted upon very strongly by authors, orators, and reformers, who aim to bring our people up to their own ideal standard of perfection, and we should be sorry to think that their labor is wholly in vain. It is not easy to classify the countless and heterogeneous opinions and plans that are set before our people by those who claim to be the keepers of the general conscience. Yet there is one line of distinction that runs more or less distinctly through the great host, and makes two main classes of them—we mean the line between experience and enthusiasm, tried institutions and speculative ideas, or perhaps between practical conservatism and theoretical radicalism. Some persons evidently speak and act as if the true root were already planted and all the branches were to grow from it in due order, while others speak as if there were no one root, but each branch must be a root in itself. The one tendency regards the many as one in the unity of a central state or church, while the other tendency keeps the many from being one by a watchful and jealous individualism, that makes all association an act of opinion or choice depending wholly upon the will of the individual. It would be wrong to deny that great powers have been exhibited and great services have been rendered by both of those types of character. Without going into any ecclesiastical or theological controversy, consider the most strongly marked types of Church life in this country—the Catholic and the Independent we may call them more fitly than by any other name. The Catholic Church begins with the assertion of its own divine origin and authority, and trains its children within its fold without waiting for their assent or their personal experience. The Episcopal Church, at least in England, follows the same idea, and asks as much allegiance from the nation as Rome asks from the world. Now we can not surely deny that some good fruits have come from this principle of Catholicity in spite of its dangers, and not only ought we to be glad to see the continued union of the Roman Catholic and Protestant Episcopal Churches in the United States, but we may recognize in their constitutional basis a truth that may be accepted in all our civil and religious relations—the truth that all order and all liberty must grow from a Providential root, and only by some organic law can the freedom of the individual be saved from the tyranny of the mass. We believe that the Catholic and Episcopal bishops have done much good in showing the importance of central organization, and checking the excessive individualism that is doing so much to disintegrate our people. Yet we can not, in spite of all the excesses of Independency, for a moment consent to deride its work or regret its existence. Puritanism, with its intense subjectivity, its determination to bring every principle and quality to the test of personal conviction and experience, has been an immense power in America, and our most original literature and our most kindling eloquence have been nurtured in its school. At present the organs and champions of Independency are, perhaps, the most conspicuous features of the American Church, and there are single men in their ranks who are an institution in themselves. Yet we confess generally to a feeling of dissatisfaction and unrest under their words and in their presence. They give altogether too much prominence to present impulses and opinions, and do not strengthen and comfort us by the calm wisdom that speaks the voice of ages, and the broad fellowship that invites all men to come together under the smile of her who asks to be the mother of us all. The intense subjectivity of Independency is constantly making new tests of salvation, and imposing new terms of fellowship, and sometimes claiming for the congregated consciences of the brethren an authority that prelacy dare not claim for its priesthood. In this country the disposition to dictate how men shall eat, and drink, and amuse themselves, for example, has been carried to an extreme unknown in Europe, and not a few persons have sought protection for personal liberty under the broad wing of the Mother Church, that offers a fixed and impersonal order without the intrusion of pertinacious and exacting individualism. The hope is, that the two parties will learn something from each other; and our common national life will be enriched by a religion at once comprehensive and free, quickening personal thought without captious dogmatism, and favoring central fellowship without spiritual despotism. Already we note most interesting developments in the religious life of the people, and never in the world have more original and earnest statements of conviction and experience been made to the general ear of a great nation than among us. In our day the alliance between the pulpit and the press has been cemented, and whatever of note is preached on Sunday is sent broadcast over the land in print on Monday. It will be well for our wisest and most gifted preachers to recognize their great opportunity, and a new day will come to the nation when they see that the great topics of civil ethics may be discussed without inflaming party passions, and a preacher may prove himself to be a patriot without degrading himself into a partisan.

We have glanced at some of the material, civil, social, and religious elements of our national life. These go to form what may be called our national consciousness. We need to make this consciousness a little clearer to ourselves, and he is a wise man who really knows his own mind. In humdrum, everyday life many a good man is hardly aware that he is dependent for his happiness upon his family, perhaps thinking that he could be content to live much of the time alone; but no sooner has he gone a day's journey from home than he comes to himself and his home, and counts the weary hours that keep him away. Thus we undoubtedly have more national feeling than we are usually conscious of, and it is good for our citizens to see our flag flying in a foreign port, or hear a strain of our music in some distant land, to reveal to us how closely we are one people, and how much we love our own country. We find that our consciousness is not only a sense but a purpose; and while it perceives the extent of the domain and the range of the population, it also plans for the whole country, and we find ourselves insensibly joining our own little personal efforts, in fancy if not in deeds, with the consolidated and continuous working force of the whole nation. In fact, we all feel that we are thinking and working in a great concern, and we measure our dignity not only by the amount of our partnership, but the wealth and worth of the whole firm. Our national consciousness should be estimated not only by its extent, but by its intensity; and we must remember that, as we are united not only by our territorial lines and census tables, but by ideas, affections, associations, principles, and men, we are not only congregated but assimilated. This assimilation may be stronger in some of the States, in their relation to State institutions, than to the national life. Yet there is much of national feeling every where, and they who scold most at the nation as such, would be sadly grieved to lose the opportunity of scolding and being scolded, and might mourn as the henpecked husband did, who felt so lonely when his wife died, and he so missed the stimulus of her tongue. Our law, education, literature, statesmanship, history, industry, religion—all are more or less national, and the very quality of our mind is American in a sense that recognizes the whole nation in its most familiar associations, ideas, and purposes.

We may well consider what must be the consequence of a disturbance or rupture of the old national ties. Not only our habitual contemplations but our enterprises must feel the disturbance, and the active force as well as the intellectual sensibility of our people suffer the shock. Nor do we estimate the evil result merely by trying to measure surfaces and count costs. Mischief is to be regarded in its quality more than its quantity; and where there is the most life there may be the worst form of perversion and death. The corruption of the best thing is always the worst, and the most sensitive and complex organization always suffers the most when lacerated. In proportion as men are near each other by ties of kindred or affection, they are most odious to each other when estranged. No quarrels are like family quarrels, no wars are like civil wars. When, therefore, we consider the great comfort, mutual protection, and progress that we have enjoyed as a nation, let us not forget that all our good neighborhood may but imbitter animosity, and the lines of mutual association may be lines of hostile contact. How much thirty millions may enjoy together who are in the main good friends, we have good reason to know. How much thirty millions of people may suffer together, who are imbittered by feuds, crazed by jealousies, or inflamed by sectional strifes, we can not tell, and hope never to know.

In surveying the various currents of our national life, one conviction of a cheering kind is quite predominant, and with the statement of this we close this article. Regarding the material, civil, social, moral, and religious lines of association together, they are so interlaced together as to afford no room for cleavage. We split easily the log whose fibres run in parallel lines, but not the log that is full of knots and seams. We saw a few weeks ago some most amusing and abortive attempts to split the trunk of an old sycamore-tree. The axe was blunted and broken against the granite rocks which the root had seized in its embrace, and no wedges could make any headway between the tough and interlaced fibres of the wood. The stump was bored, and powder was to be brought to bear against the obstinate log; but the juices of the tree deluged two of the borings, and the third, as it exploded, opened the seam just wide enough to show how stout were the ligatures and how desperate the attempt to break them. The old scarred sycamore trunk still stands, and held out new buds in triumph after all this hard handling. The oak is a stouter tree than the sycamore, and we trust that there are growths in the garden of God and in the keeping of humanity that are stouter than the oak. When good and true and brave men grow together into loyal citizenship in a vital nationality, the fibres that cross and interlace each other at every knot are so joined by God that they can not be put asunder.

Editor's Easy Chair.

A HAPPY New-Year, and a welcome to Eighteen Hundred and Sixty-One! The century is getting into its ripe maturity; it has crossed the table-land, and begins to step upon the downward slope. Yet, as it looks back over its own life and into the latter years of its predecessor, how much it will see of actual gain to the world.

There are philosophers who are a little doubtful of any real advance in the condition of mankind. It is all circular, they say. You lose upon one side what you gain upon the other. You invent medicine and plasters to cure wounds and disease, but it is only because you have developed diseases, and because you have so ruined your bodies that wounds become mortal. The Indian needs no medicine and no plasters. He is not ill, and his flesh heals of itself when wounded.

The reply to this argument is brief—it is not true; and if it were true, what of it?

It is not true; for when the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, the first of white men, they found that disease had swept off vast numbers of Indians, and the poor savages suffered sadly from the toothache.

Then, if it were true, what of it? Is there no advance in the man who walks Plymouth streets to-day over Samoset and the red denizens of the old forest?

In like manner, you may show the germs of modern thought and art and universal civilization in the Greeks. You may challenge philosophy to confound Plato, or sculpture to surpass Phidias, or architecture to rival the Parthenon. You may silence our orators with Demosthenes; you may abash our statesmen with Pericles; you may smite our poets with Homeric song. But the question of human condition is not of a few select and superior persons; it is of all mankind. In the latter days of France, a century ago, you might show colossal fortunes and a splendor of life such as no modern nobleman displays; but the real point is the condition of the multitude of men.

And the claim for this century is that the average level of the whole race is lifted. Single persons may be no wiser, or richer, or better than single men before; but the great mass of human beings know more, have more, and enjoy more than ever before.

Turn back to the recent numbers of this Magazine, and, in Thackeray's sketches of the Georges, see what the good society of England was. Then compare the court of George First, Second, Third, or Fourth with that of Victoria. What would our late visitor, the young Prince of Wales, have been in the halls of his ancestors? There is misery enough in England, doubtless; immorality enough, and corruptibility among public men; but look through Hogarth, and is it a picture of English life to-day? Read the books of a century ago, when Samuel Johnson was the great literary Englishman, and Horace Walpole pooh-pooh-ed at Oliver Goldsmith, and how do they compare—not in genius or power, but in Christian humanity—with the books that England reads to-day: with Dickens, and Thackeray, and Carlyle, and Charlotte Brontë, and the Brownings, and Macaulay?

We are none of us likely to be suddenly caught up as saints just yet. But we need not sigh for Greece nor the golden age. It is golden only because it is gone. Many a man abuses his wife at home, and is dreadfully homesick when he goes away. Socrates was not Greece, nor Pericles, nor Homer. And it is the glory of our age, and especially of our country, that it will be known in history not for certain great men so much as for the condition of all men. See, in writing history, how this spirit shows itself, by the care with which historians describe the condition of the people. The most interesting chapter of Macaulay is thought by many to be the one in which he shows us just how far the multitude had gone in the great pursuit of intelligent content. And the chapter also shows, by contrast, how far we have gone.

If we could only make Christendom really Christian! And it is because that is being done—slowly enough, if you please, but surely—that we can cordially grasp hands and congratulate as the years roll by.

For ourselves, especially, we have nothing to deplore. Upon the whole, no nation was ever more healthy at heart, and none ever developed more rapidly. Anomalies and exceptions will gradually and peacefully be eliminated from our system. The common sense and conscience of the people have always shown themselves to be awake in any great crisis. Our danger is our prosperity, but at present we shall be able to control even that; and we shall control it always, if our good sense keep pace with our opportunities.

And to our especial good friends into whose homes this Easy Chair rolls quietly every month, let us offer an especial good greeting. The old acquaintance does not grow weary, it seems, but every year and every month it is more closely cemented. Invisible, unknown friends! always considerate and kindly, with whom the Chair, also invisible, so cordially converses, it hails with you Eighteen Hundred Sixty-One, and wishes you, most heartily, a Happy New-Year!

ONE of those guides, philosophers, and friends, the daily newspapers, for which we are all so grateful—and which, if we may take their word for it, have superseded statesmen, philosophers, and preachers—alludes lately to that unhappy class of our fellow-beings, the Lyceum lecturers, as "itinerants." The word suggests tinkers, peddlers, scissor-grinders, organ-grinders, and all the professional pedestrians. It is meant as a term of reproach, mingled with contempt. Itinerants! pah! People who peddle lectures! People who humbug the public! Charlatans! Mountebanks! Harlequins! Clowns! Zanies! Itinerants!

Well, this is really dreadful! It is not new, but it is dreadful! It is not new, for we hear it regularly every winter; but it is truly lamentable that these impostors, peddlers, tinkers, grinders, should lay waste the public mind and pick the public pocket with their shallow pretenses—as utterly worthless as calicoes at twenty cents a yard that will not wash, or maudlin newspapers at two cents apiece.

Poor fellows! Itinerants! As calmly as possible, let us inquire what is an itinerant. It is a traveler. It is a luckless wight who goes from place to place. Christ sent his disciples into all the earth; and the Methodist Church, not afraid of imitating its Master, founded the order of Itinerant Preachers. They were neither afraid of traveling to preach the Gospel, nor of calling themselves travelers. They must settle the matter with the newspapers.

A mercantile house sends its agents all through the land, to "tout" for customers, or to dun debtors and collect bills. These gentry are itinerants.

The publishers send out canvassers and commission agents to sell books. These are itinerants.

The missionary societies send out preachers into foreign countries, "from pole to pole." They are itinerants.

The great religious societies dispatch their emissaries, colporteurs, accredited agents. They are all itinerants.

Then come the unhappy fellows who have been invited to go to a hundred places, and to speak to thousands of people, who pay them most generously, and thank them too. And these are your itinerant lecturers.

They are a kind of peripatetic newspaper, but they speak to a much larger audience than many journals. A lecturer in good practice will speak sixty or seventy times in a season, to an average audience of a thousand persons. When he returns he will have talked to seventy thousand people. If he has had any thing to say, and has said it so as to lodge in the minds of his hearers, he has done no unprofitable work either for himself or his audiences, and he may congratulate himself upon a very respectable itinerancy.

But the point of the sneer seems to be that these lecture fellows go about: they travel. The argument, probably, is that Ethiopian Minstrels and "Big Shows" travel—argal, lecturers are Ethiopian Minstrels, and the Lyceum a big show. The argument is ingenious, but perhaps perfectly sound. Let us apply it in another way—thus: bitter, sour, disappointed, and despised people walk down Broadway every morning. But the editors of certain newspapers walk down Broadway every morning. Therefore the editors of certain newspapers are bitter, sour, disappointed, and despised.

The argument is pleasant to handle, but it is not conclusive. It works both ways. It is a sword sharpened on the edge and the back.

If a man has something to say which he puts into such a form and delivers so satisfactorily that multitudes of people want to hear him, and honor him, and reward him well, it seems a pity that they can not hear him because he would have to travel to reach them; and if he traveled he would be an itinerant.

Perhaps the critics who are so troubled by the fact that itinerancy is essential to getting from one place to another will explain how it may be avoided. It might be easy enough to explain how they themselves avoid it. Smith always avoids dining with Jones when Jones omits to ask him. But that is a purely theoretical solution of the difficulty. Assuming that Jones does ask Smith, how is Smith to enjoy the dinner, or Jones Smith's society, unless Smith goes to Jones's house? A ready wag might suggest that they could go to Delmonico's. But that would not help; for they must be itinerants that they may get to Delmonico's.

Ah! if the newspapers which grudge the lecture fellows their little fee and the transient applause could only by experience know those beds, those steaks, those chill chambers, those startings before light, those autograph albums, those dreadful days in cars, those jokes (especially that most reverend witticism upon the eve of leaving the hotel for the hall, "There'll be no fun until we arrive, as the fellow said when he was going to be hung"), those cheerful laughs with which this well-known old favorite of a joke is received, those explanations of the small audience, those other explanations palliative of the want of applause—all faithful, kindly, and generous as they are—if the newspapers knew these things as they are known by the itinerants, they would spare them the "twit" of their vagabondage. They would feel that justice is done even in this life. They would emulate the charity of my Uncle Toby, and say to the hapless itinerant, "Go, insect; there is room enough in the world for thee and me!"

LAST month we had a word about the pictures of Mr. Jarves; the collection of the old masters which he has made in Italy, and which he hopes may find a permanent home in New York, as the foundation of a historical gallery of painting.

Mr. Jarves has collected the pictures to illustrate the progress of Christian art in Italy. He begins with the Byzantine specimens, and proceeds regularly through to the Caracci, Domenichino, and Guido. Without claiming that he has the greatest works of the great painters, he says that he has characteristic pictures by all of those who appear in the gallery; and every body who knows will not deny that he says truly. His hope is that when the collection has been seen and studied, it will be felt that the works ought to be retained in the country, because no gallery we have is like it, and because the student of art, and civilization, and Christianity may here see what otherwise he could not know until he reached Italy. As other pictures by the same men or by other artists are procured, they can be slipped into their proper places upon the line, and the gallery and the city be enriched.

The gallery will have the charm of novelty to the great mass of spectators. The quaint old manner of the early masters is entirely new to our collections. What may be called our popular idea of painting is illustrated in the rooms of the Dusseldorf Gallery, which open out of those in which the Jarves collection is deposited. The brightness and smoothness which mark the Rhine school are most agreeable to those who are not familiar with the older and religious art. But they are like sweet wines, which presently pall. The others, if at first obscure, are like the deep twilight, in which, as the eye becomes accustomed to the lesser light, it detects the lovely outline of a thousand forms at first unseen.

Thus a picture of Fra Angelico's, of which there are specimens in the Jarves Gallery, may seem at first formal, hard, and childish; but as you look on and on, and in and in, you catch some glimpse of that beauty of holiness, and that peace which passes understanding, which is the fruit of the Christian faith. They are so full of quiet, too—like cloisters and convent gardens. The broad, still, sunny days of Italy stream over you again as you stand before the pictures. The wild life that heaved outside the walls of the church and chapel and convent in which they hung, and the raging passion that seethed in the breasts of those bending, cowed, and mitred men, the loud uproar, the romance, the apparent denial of all principle and death of religion which belong to the medieval and early modern times—all these things return as you look, and the pictures flame and blush and throb with a life which is not their life, and a charm which is beyond them.

And yet, how is it not their life? Is not a picture justly credited with all that it awakens—all that the spectator sees in it? If you see Venice in a portrait of a Doge by Titian, did not Titian put Venice into the picture? No two persons see precisely the same meaning in any work. Every thing, then, that every body sees the painter put there. His genius may work half-unconsciously to himself, as the music of an orator's voice, of which he is himself unconscious, may be the most persuasive eloquence of all his speech to many a hearer; while others are moved only by the linked logic of his thought. The orator shall have the glory of both; and so shall the painter be worthily honored for all that blazes or hides upon his canvas.

But apart from the pure romance of these Jarves pictures, there is the scientific value—that is, the assistance they furnish to the study of the progress and development both of the spirit and the methods of art. With the Hand-book of Kugler, or Mr. Jarves's own handsome and well-illustrated volumes of Art-Studies, you may pass many and many a morning with these pictures, and live back again, as it were, into the very infancy of art and the spring of modern history. There is no study more fascinating or instructive; and when you have finished, you are as well prepared to meet and understand the profuse treasures which Italy contains as if you had learned in all the galleries there, instead of one modest gallery here. When we can understand the progress of Christian art from the beginning, experimentally, in New York, then New York has another claim to be considered a metropolis.

Of the authenticity of Mr. Jarves's specimens it is very hard to speak finally. This, however, is very clear, that if there be a man who understands the difficulties of obtaining really fine works, and how to overcome those difficulties, Mr. Jarves is doubtless the man. He is curiously intimate with all the dodges and tricks of the imitative art; and there can be no reasonable doubt that his pictures are what he believes them to be, and the most eminent connoisseurs in Europe agree with him.

Even if they were not so, it would not be so serious a matter. Such accurate copies as they would then appear to be would be as useful as the originals in studying both the originals themselves and the art they depict. A picture so closely reproduced from the original that you can not tell the difference, is about as good for study as the original, and for this reason—that what is admirable in the original is either the sentiment, the treatment, the color, or the drawing. If these are so faithfully reproduced that the sharpest eyes can scarcely distinguish them from the model, they are the same for the student's purpose. And this is true of the Jarves Gallery. There is no reasonable doubt that they are what they are called—works of the oldest and most famous masters, from the early Byzantine down to the Bolognese school. But if they are not, they are still as useful, and the collection is by far the most interesting that has ever been brought to the country.

New York ought to retain it. Let us hope that she is a metropolis, and will retain it.

A FRIEND asks the Easy Chair what he considers to be the characteristic of a Christian nation. The Easy Chair replies, Christianity. The answer seems to be very obvious. If you then ask what is Christianity, the Easy Chair refers you to the teachings of Christ.

Now there is a growing fear in many minds lest Christianity, or religion, should be secularized. Is not that the very thing we all want? Is it not because religion is supposed to have more relation with Gothic architecture, and white cravats, and solemn faces than with men doing their daily duties, that men are so really irreligious, or rather, think that they are so? Is it not true that the Christian principles are popularly regarded as holding the same relation to our conduct that the regalia—the crown and ball and sceptre—hold to a king's daily life? He is to sit in them and hold them upon state occasions; but he is not to use the crown for a hat, nor the sceptre for a cane. So the Christian precepts are to be paraded upon great solemnities—in sermons, at prayer-meetings, at funerals, upon tombstones; but they are not to regulate conduct in the office, the street, and the stock-exchange.

The king says, "I will wear the crown and hold the sceptre and ball upon all proper occasions; but really, as a general rule, I must be allowed to wear a dressing-gown and a loose coat and slippers, like other people." So any citizen of a Christian State is very apt to say, "Oh! certainly; Christianity, and doing as you would be done by, and all that sort of thing, are very well; they are good to teach the children and the women and servants on Sundays—all very creditable and very well; but in this world we must take men as they are, and look out for number one."

There are a great many people who sincerely wish that Christianity were a practicable rule of life. But, they say, if we should try it, we should not only be well laughed at, but we should be starved out. It would become actually a question of life and death.

Therefore, when "a friend" asks the Easy Chair further, "What State can you name which is a Christian State?" the Easy Chair as promptly and confidently answers, "None whatever."

Of course there are men and women whose lives blossom with religious graces, but they do not compose a religious State. There are traders in the Sandwich Islands, but you could not call it a great commercial nation. What kind of character is described by the term "Man of the world?" St. John or Talleyrand? George Washington or Aaron Burr? To know the world, is a phrase which means simply to believe that every man has his price, and every woman too.

The point in which the Christian ethics differ essentially from any other is in the grand doctrine of self-sacrifice as opposed to selfishness. But does "a friend" seriously suppose that that is the controlling principle of society in any so-called "Christian" State? Selfishness is probably as much the pivot of general action as it was in any country anterior to the Christian era: not that society has made no advance. It has, undoubtedly. The statement and formal recognition of the new principle is itself an advance. At the same time, nobody would probably consider the Emperor Constantine a better man than Marcus Aurelius.

If you wish to know the real principle of action in our society, sink a shaft of observation any where, and study the results. Let us suppose that you and I are cotton-dealers in New York. You are a seller, if you choose, and I am a buyer; and I have just heard of a sudden and enormous rise of price. To complete the illustration, I suppose also that my correspondent in New Orleans, who has telegraphed the rise to me, has also informed me that he is the first to transmit the news; and just as I read his dispatch the telegraph breaks down, and I am, consequently, perfectly sure that you have not received the news, and that, although you are enterprising and sagacious, and would have known as much as I do if the telegraph had held up, you suppose, and all the other traders suppose, the ruling price of today to be what it was yesterday.

When I enter your office I am aware that, if you knew all that I do, and all that I know you do not know, you would ask two cents more for your cotton. But I offer to buy at the current market-rate, and you are satisfied, and sell. Is that regarded as unfair? Are you not even a little surprised that the question should be asked? You can not say that my superior sagacity in acquiring information entitles me to the advantage. There is no question of sagacity—it is all luck. I suppose that you had as good and prompt a correspondent as mine, and that he was hurrying to telegraph you first, and would have done so, but he tripped in the street and fell, so that mine passed him and reached the office first; and when yours arrived the wires were down.

To hesitate in such a case would be very squeamish, would it not? It is the chance of war, do you say? Yes, it may be the chance of war; but it is not Christian. That is to say, it is not doing as you would be done by; unless, indeed, you say that, if you were a foot-pad, you would do precisely as the foot-pad does.

And that is what is meant by saying that Christendom is not yet Christian. It is easy to call ourselves so; but the question is of facts, not of words. It sounds the least bit like a sermon, perhaps. But why not? It is good to begin the year with a sermon. Or shall we regard all plain speech of religion and Christian duty as material for sermons and tracts only? Yes; and so we return to the text that we will not take it up into life, forgetting that faith is to social and national systems what the oxygen in the air is to the human and vegetable, the very secret of life.

There is occasionally evidence of the general feeling of these truths in thoughtful minds every where. It is so now. There is a careful, and candid, and charitable inquisition into the moral laws of life. In this country more than elsewhere, we are perpetually brought in contact with them. And it is one of the pleasant and frequent signs of the times that the most eminently popular and successful preachers are those who urge, with the most fiery eloquence, that we should make religion a life, and not a word; a fact, and not a fume.

And so again, a Happy New Year, and let's try it.

THE other day the Easy Chair, which, after the summer's heats, is very fond of rolling about the country to breathe the cool autumn and early winter air, quietly turned out of State Street in Albany to the studio of the sculptor Palmer. The studio is in a very quiet corner, and of that aspect which reveals its purpose at once to a familiar eye. Those odd-looking buildings, with one huge window like a Cyclops—buildings which prefer all their light in two or three great draughts, instead of a distribution into innumerable sips, they are easily read by one who has been much with artists and hung around the rooms where, as in a kind of outer brain, the ideas of grace and beauty take form.

Vol. XXII.—No. 128.—S

It was a happy touch in Thackeray's "Newcomes," that of Clive's life in Rome among the artists. There may not be much of it in the book, but there is a great deal of it in the reader's mind. There may be but a whiff of violet odor in the air; but if you wooed a girl in a garden, among the violets, long ago, there is more than a whiff of emotion in your mind. The delight of artist life in Italy is hinted by Thackeray, and by Dickens in "Little Dorrit," and by Hans Christian Andersen in the "Improvisatore." It is a Bohemian life, but something more and something better than we understand by that word in New York. Ah, well! those Campagna days—and days among the mountains, and on the shore, and in old cities, and in quaint osterias, and wherever the wayward spirit of romance enshrines herself—you remember them all, and Browning has sung them for us. Browning, who has sucked up Italy as a bee sucks nectar—both storing it in honey.

They try Bohemia in New York. Yes, and you might try the tropics here, if you choose. But your figs grown with great pains under glass, and your figs bursting with crimson pulp through purple skins as the sun blisters them with kisses on hot high walls over which lizards dart and sprawl, and behind which ilexes and olives shimmer and twinkle in convent gardens, and shadow cloisters of many-colored marbles, mossy, stained—they are both figs, doubtless, but they are not exactly the same. Bohemia is not drinking, and swearing, and sneering, and smoking—and yet a fair share of all of them are not unknown there. Tobacco is a comfortable weed, although a popular speaker may denounce it as the nastiest thing ever brought by the nastiest devil upon the earth. The charmed secret of tobacco eludes anathemas. There are people, dear Sir, who have routed the eating of flesh, horse and foot, quite as triumphantly as you fall upon the smoking weed. As for wine, it gets little quarter from those who are opposed to it. Nor can you make a sufficient argument for coffee or tea; perhaps not for any stimulant, or cordial, or narcotic. The argument for it, which persuades, is the abstinence from abuse. I laugh to discover that the authors of the famous tobacco-defending papers in the magazines are all smokers. But the argument is not necessary. Tobacco is not good to eat nor to drink—it is only good to smoke. If you overdo it, why, then you fail to enjoy. "Yes, Sir, but all use of it is abuse." Good-morning, Sir.

No, Bohemia is not simple beastliness as drunkenness is. It is not stupefaction or delirium, as tobacco and coffee may be. It is not filth of imagination or speech. It is not an affectation of disbelief in men and women. It is not profanity, and vulgarity, and coarseness of every kind. It does not necessarily dine in dark places and sup in doubtful ones. All these may be there, for they are everywhere; but the blithe realm of Bohemia is not measured or described by them. It is the lawlessness within law, the camp within the castle court.

All artists are popularly supposed to be, ex officio, Bohemians. But it is not so. There are many who would scorn the name, not understanding it. Many also who would smile to think themselves included. Such a man was the late Charles Leslie, one of the simplest and sweetest of human beings. He would have been incredulous had you called him a Bohemian. Yet he was one. So was Washington Irving, his companion for some years. So especially was Charles Lamb. Tommy Moore, again, seems not to have been one. His delight was bounded by the conventional circles. He pined for them, and perished outside of them. But your Bohemian leads a charmed life, passing in and out of those circles at pleasure.

I did not mean to go to Bohemia when I began. We were coming to Palmer's studio, in the quiet corner upon the hill at Albany. And now we have mounted the stairs and are in his room. It is lighted by one huge window. The walls are of a neutral tint, and expose the colorless busts upon the ledge over the stairway, and the plaster cast of the "White Captive." The sculptor himself is modeling a portrait-bust in clay. The dull brown clay is quick with life. Vitality has flowed into it from the creative fingers. I look into the face, and am sure it could answer my gaze.

But as we chat my eyes float around the room and rest at last upon the "White Captive." It is only the cast, but it is perfect, and the work may be as well studied in the plaster as in the marble. Palmer intends to duplicate it and send it to England, which has already learned to respect our sculpture. It was a rare pleasure to stand by while the sculptor went over every part of the work, showing how the slightest causes produced the most striking effects; how the playing, glancing lights and softened glooms steeped the figure with actuality. I told him of the objection, which he had often heard, that it was not the figure of an unmarried woman. But his quiet, incredulous smile as he carefully justified every detail—the consciousness of knowledge with which he made us all see that he was right and the critics either captious or not sufficiently intelligent—were very triumphant. The truth is, that few medical men are so capable of pronouncing upon certain points and shades of anatomical precision so surely as a deeply accomplished sculptor. The appearance is naturally secondary in the contemplation of the surgeon; but it is first and all in that of the sculptor. The surgeon studies with an internal, the sculptor with an external, purpose; and that exactly discriminates the value of their verdict upon such a case as this.

As the sculptor went over it inch by inch, and through his words the secret significance of the figure streamed into my mind, I could not but recall the story of Turner and the critic, who assured him, after looking at one of his pictures, "Why, Mr. Turner, I never saw this in nature." "No? My dear Madame," he replied, "don't you wish you could?"

There was also, in another room, the bust of a statue Palmer is now finishing for a Baltimore gentleman, "The Child's first Grief." A young girl holds a nest in her hand from which the birds have flown. The tender, appealing dawn of sadness in the child's mind, the pathetic inexplicability of loss, are exquisitely rendered. The fact is as common as all grief, but this individual isolation of it is very touching. And this is the humanity of Palmer's sculptures, that they make you feel how infinitely multiplied is the emotion which, viewed and treated singly, is so full of power. The attitude of the whole figure is of a corresponding simplicity. The arms dropped at full length; the hands caressing the nest incredulously; the eyes with an expression of sad wonder, rather at the first pang of real grief than at the flight of the feathered darlings.

Around the room were several portrait busts—the cherub heads which, cut in the singularly soft Carrara marble, people the dusk studio with what the poets would call a white stillness of lovely life. There was also the cast of the pediment for the Capitol, thoroughly American and appropriate. One of the figures—a stealthy, creeping savage, the personification of the true American Indian, not the Indian of the novels—Palmer will perhaps reproduce as a statue. We shall then have a fit typical Indian—crafty, cruel, imbruted, relentless. In Greenough's group of the "Backwoodsman and the Savage," the savage is so puny, so feeble and unimportant, that a victory over him seems to be of no more importance than a victory over a wolf. He does not stand as a type of the race which disputed the soil with the whites. Palmer's will.

Our Foreign Bureau.

IT may be interesting to our readers, who, at best, I look through a glass of long range upon the events of Europe, to glance for once with us upon the part-colored news of a single day. Our stand-point shall be Brussels; our date the very last of October; our authorities the Independance and the Nord newspapers. A dirty sea-fog is sidling in from the north; the thermometer marks 50° Fahrenheit. A telegraph reports an insult to the Prince of Wales, and an attack upon him in the streets of New York; the assailant an Englishman, and reported insane. A million of people will discuss the matter with their breakfasts to-day.

The King (Leopold), with Madame the Duchess of Brabant and the Count of Flanders, set off at ten this morning for Liège and Verviers, their equipages having been dispatched yesterday. His Royal Highness the Duke of Brabant, being slightly indisposed, remains at the Palace.

The long session of the Swedish Diet has closed, and there is general discontent expressed at its inaction, while the papers and public opinion call loudly for a change in the national representation.

The Czar has hurried home from his trip to Warsaw, of which detailed accounts have now come in. The telegraph has brought no important rumors about the result of the Imperial interview, and Western Europe is none the wiser for the meeting. The Czar had his ovation upon entrance to the city, and so had the Regent of Prussia, who came the succeeding day, and who was most cordially received by his cousin the Czar. But, we are told, the Austrian Francis met only with coldest courtesy: no street cheers welcomed him; and at the grand ball which the Prince Gortchakov gave on the evening following the arrival of the Austrian Court the noble Polish ladies distinguished themselves by their absence. The three monarchs have met, and met socially; but politically, so far as appears thus far, each still moves in his own orbit. There has been no guaranty of Venetian Italy; no bargain as regards the Danube and the Bosphorus. The young Austrian monarch is represented as preoccupied and care-worn; all the more so, doubtless, now that his newly promulgated measures of reform are received so coolly. The retainers of the court have made a little factitious applause in Vienna. For the masses the Imperial proclamation is unintelligible; in the German and Slav provinces the people understand only that Hungary has gained more by force, and resistance, and bold talking than themselves have gained by long years of devotion. Even Hungary will not receive as a favor what it has so loudly claimed as a right. Its best men discard the terms and tenor of the new Imperial decrees; the official illumination which was ordered upon their promulgation was "made light of" by a shower of stones upon the windows of the Hôtel de Ville, and by a carefully guarded darkness in the fronts of every private mansion. The Hungarians have grown too swiftly into courage by the example of Italy to accept now any halting favor. As with the Bourbon King in the south, a constitutional programme comes too late. The General Benedek, who goes to take command of the vast armament which has been concentrated upon the Lombard frontier, does not leave a satisfied people behind him in Hungary. His letter, which complacently affirms this, appears, by singular coincidence, in the same journal of central Europe, upon the same day, with a declaration, by a distinguished Hungarian exile, of seven potent reasons why the late edicts of the Austrian Emperor must utterly fail of the pacification of Hungary: and by still more singular coincidence, the identical journal which prints the gratulatory letter of General Benedek and the protest of the Hungarian exile, tells us also of the jeers and hootings with which the people of Pesth have received the Imperial favors. There is a leaven in Hungary that has not yet come to the full of its fermentation.

The thermometer is at 50°, and a fog is sidling in from the sea, and we have not finished yet the first page of the day's journals. A turn of a paragraph takes us to St. Petersburg, where, strangely enough, people are going to see an agricultural show in one of the largest inclosures of the city—the Riding-School Michel. There are reapers of the American plan, and Worcester plows, and malachite vases, and all shapes of wood-craft, besides imported cattle and English draining tile. But it is, after all, more an Imperial exhibition than a popular one. The machinery is all from abroad, and attracts but little attention; while the street-folk congregate about the birds and the draught-horses from the Imperial farmeries, or from the estates of the Countess Kouchelev or the Prince Vassiltchikov. An American, judging from the reports, would remark with interest only certain rare bits of gold and copper of incredible weight, and a great array of hempen tissues, heavy fleeces, and soft furs.

The Russian is far more interested in the telegraphic report that Pischpek has surrendered, after a five days' siege, and that the redoubtable chief, Atabek-Datchi, has been taken prisoner. You will look vainly for these names in your geographies; they belong to that part of Central Asia which borders upon western Siberia, and the conquest is making more sure and safe the highway which Russia is planting across an unknown region to the Amoor, and the great commerce of the East.

By the side of this report of Russian successes in the East comes to us also a Russian appreciation of the great speech of Cavour upon the opening of the Piedmontese Parliament.

The Count, says the Russian, has not ventured to explain his disapproval of, and quasi opposition to the Garibaldi expedition for Sicily; he has not sought to explain his change of position, of which, perhaps, the Garibaldian successes are the best and only excuses. Indeed the chief of the Piedmontese cabinet, in announcing his views with respect to Rome, has given expression to an idea which would seem to excuse the tergiversations of any government at any, or all times. "A statesman," he says, properly "observant of the future, must change his course to meet its exigencies."

So it may happen that the Piedmontese action shall change again; for the King of Naples has not yet fired his last gun, or the people of Naples spoken their last word, nor Europe spoken as it has power to speak.

The Count recognizes the force of opinion, and of the opinion of the great governments of Europe; but he has the hardihood to suppose that while he refrains from attack upon Venice, or upon Rome itself, that he is safe. And can he fancy that his invasion of Emilia and of Naples is approved? Does he consider that he may have to answer for this invasion with cannon-shot, and not with eloquent phrases?

As yet, he says, it is not opportune to march to Rome; and so the political faith of Piedmont is one of opportunity! And does it occur to the Count Cavour that possibly Europe may think it opportune to declare strongly against a policy which so shocks those monarchs who are accustomed to respect the vested rights of brother monarchs?

We cite thus much (condensing a column or more into our score of lines) to show how slant the opinions of those who read the Journal of St. Petersburg.

Always under the same date, and in the same newspaper of Brussels, we find the result of the vote upon annexation in the city of Palermo. The registered number being 40,507, the actual voters counted 36,267. Of these, 36,232 voted Yes; 20 No; while 15 were faulty, and counted neither way.

A dispatch, dated Naples, says, "The capture of Capua, announced yesterday, is not confirmed. Victor Emanuel is at Steoni, with 25,000 men. A battle is looked for from hour to hour."

Another dispatch, dated Madrid: "The Government of the Queen has protested energetically against the Sardinian invasion of Naples, and given orders for the immediate withdrawal of the Spanish ambassador from Turin."

Russia, too, recalls her ambassador; and the Prince Gortchakov assures the Count Stackelburg that his Imperial Majesty has seen with profound regret the recent action of the Sardinian monarch; he has from time to time addressed to Cavour his friendly remonstrances. In the appreciation of his Majesty the action of Sardinia is in violation of those principles on which rests all healthful international relations, and is disturbing to those grand bases on which repose all the established governments of Europe.

Of course all this is apres coup; and you know how the Italian affairs have marched since the imperial and the royal protests. But we are still at our breakfast in Brussels, and a journal of one date supplies our news-talk.

To-night is promised L'Etoile du Nord, at the Theatre de la Monnaie; and at the Theatre du Parc, the Filles du Marbre.

Henri de Pène, in a racy feuilleton, tells us how the Parisians have been welcoming a new drama from Octave Feuillet, being almost the story of another "Poor Young Man." Like that, it first found shape in the pages of the Revue de Deux Mondes; and, with decorative alterations, has now come to the stage of the Vaudeville. There is a pretty Magdalen, on whom the interest centres, and who is a repentant and brilliant sinner of the Demi-monde. But her repentance and conversion, such as they are, find their whole force and consistency and beauty in the warmth and passionateness of a real affection—as if one genuine earthly love could cure forever all the damnable ones. A sentiment redeems all the bitter logic of a wicked life. The pretty women (such as Michelet studied to fill his repertoire of L'Amour) clap their pretty hands at this, and say, “Très bien! très bien!” It would be hard to say if the pretty women admire most the wickednesses or the repentance of the Magdalen. The story is a dexterous free-love compliment, garnished with tender and charming sentiment.

The heroine endears herself to a sympathizing audience by attempting suicide; and the lover, snatching the phial of poison from her grasp counts it the proof of her redemption, and the earnest of her return into the fold of good and respectable Frenchwomen.

The same graceful paragraphist gives us a piquant scene in the salon of M. Rossini. The great master has on occasions a large bevy of friends about him. It happened thus the other evening, when great news had come from Italy during the day. The master appeared abstracted—sleepily occupied with his own thought—when suddenly he advanced to the middle of the room, affecting all the ceremonious airs which a theatrical manager assumes who “has the honor” to address a few words of explanation to his audience.

After the three customary profound salutations, Rossini addressed his smiling and attentive friends in this style—“Mesdames et Messieurs, it is my pleasant duty to communicate to this distinguished assembly the following details in regard to the work which our Italian troop has had the honor to present to your notice: The libretto, I beg to state, is from the pen of an eminent personage, who particularly desires to remain anonymous; the music is from the hand of the illustrious maestro Mazzini; the decorations and mise en scene, as well as the choral accompaniments, have been directed by M. Guiseppe Garibaldi; and although it is unusual to name the prompter on such occasions, yet I venture to state that the duties of that post have been kindly assumed by his Excellency Count Cavour. The impresario—”

Just at this point in the master's salon discourse, the Chevalier Nigra was announced (Sardinian Ambassador).

“Ah! how is this, Chevalier; not yet off?”

“The Sardinian Ambassador has taken his passports a week since,” returns the Chevalier, “and is probably before this at Turin, in obedience to the usual diplomatic etiquette: the Chevalier Nigra, however, stays with his Paris friends, and has the honor to take you by the hand.”

It was not a hard or a severe quarrel that between the Emperor and the Savoyard King.

One more transcript from our Brussels breakfast paper, and we pass over news-gathering till to-morrow. M. Paul Marcroy, in the Revue Contemporaine, has been surprising those whose appetites have been whetted by stories of recent adventures and misadventures in the Alps and Tyrol, with a narrative of his wanderings in the Andes. Your own mountain climbings come back to you thus, by way first of Valparaiso and Cape Horn, then of Paris, then of our newspaper at Brussels. The adventurous traveler tries the ascent of the Urusayhua, a mountain of Peru, in the neighborhood of Cuzco. It looks uglier than the climb of Mont Blanc:

“At first sight both sides of the mountain appeared absolutely the same, and equally inaccessible; but upon closer scrutiny we found that, while to the right it presented an all but vertical plane, the left side displayed certain reddish lines which had much the appearance of a natural flight of stairs. We therefore resolved to attempt the escalade on this side. . . . On the third day we arrived at that point of the Urusayhua which I had often examined from below, and where, vegetation having ceased, the bare rock appeared; but what I had been unable to distinguish, and what appeared to me at this moment an insurmountable obstacle, was the expansion of the summit, which gave it, fifty feet higher up, the appearance of a mushroom. We had no longer to cope with a vertical wall, but with one projecting over our heads. For a moment we stood aghast; but on examining the rock I remarked certain projections, just large enough for a man's foot, and situated at intervals, so that, by a bold stride, one might pass from one to the other, and thus reach the opposite side of the mountain, where a further ascent might be practicable. The distance to be got over did not exceed thirty paces; but as the space was quite denuded of bushes or lianas by which to hold, the slightest false step must precipitate the adventurer into the valley where the torrent Huilcamayo was dashing along at the rate of ten knots an hour. Nevertheless I took off my shoes, fastened a rope round my body, giving the other end to Gaspard to hold, and gradually reached the third projection. As I was trying to get to the fourth, the rope I was dragging after me was caught by something. I turned my head to see what it was, and in so doing my eyes compassed the empty space below me! It was like a flash of lightning. A confused mass of verdure danced before me, intersected by the Huilcamayo glittering in the sun like a thread of mercury. I closed my eyes to avoid the horrible vision, but the vision remained in me, and I continued to see it. Then I was seized with a singing in my ears, an insupportable blast of heat rose from my entrails to my brain; then I felt my legs tremble and my wrists lose strength as if under the influence of an electric pile; an unknown force, superior to my will, made me open my eyes, and look again at that river of liquid silver which seemed to writhe in the sun. Dizziness, the demon of the abyss, had seized upon me, and was drawing me down. At this last moment, when thousands of red atoms were whirling before my eyes, I still had strength enough left to call—‘Gaspard! help!’ The brave fellow had seen the look I had involuntarily cast into the abyss, and, guessing what might occur, had, imprudently for himself, but happily for me, the daring to follow me. As my hands, convulsively closed, were about to lose their hold, he seized me by the nape of the neck, calling to me to take courage. I regained my self-possession, succeeded in retracing my steps, and, feeling the ground once more under my feet, I swooned away.” The adventurers at length reached the top of the mountain, which they found to consist of a space not more than 300 square yards, scooped out in the middle as if it had once been the bed of a lake. The only proof of the existence of the latter at some remote period was the peat formed of entwined branches of trees, whose enormous trunks lay scattered about in various stages of decay. And yet, even on this desolate spot, some beautiful flowers were in bloom—two kinds of heath of the vaccinium genus, an andromeda or marsh cistus, a gentian, a purple barberry, an actinophyllum, some lysipomias, a kind of wood-sorrel, and some thin blackish reeds. The descent of the plain did not take the tourists more than six hours.

Thus we finish our eggs and paper, and our readers have all the salient things of the morning's news at Brussels, in the end of October, when the thermometer is at 50° Fahrenheit, and a dirty sea-fog sidling in from the north.

AMONG recent deaths let us give honorable mention to that of Lord Dundonald, who, at the age of upward of eighty, prepared and published a two-volume vindication of his naval career. Scarcely a week after the publication of his second and last autobiographical volume the scene closed with him; and the reputation and fair fame that he so jealously struggled to defend became the property of his heirs.

It is a tale of olden time now, how the brave Captain Dundonald, in the year 1809, conducted a brilliant naval attack upon the French fleet in the Basque Roads, which would have resulted in the total destruction of the French shipping if only his naval superior, Lord Gambier, had been equal to the occasion. It is matter of by-gone gossip how fearlessly the young Captain expressed his contempt for the officers over him, and for the Admiralty, whose servant he could never humble himself to become. Of course he was ignored, and plucked, and brow-beaten. Of course he became more radical and earnest than ever under such tuition: so that it happened, as we might naturally suppose, that the most brilliant and promising officer in the British service received no command of importance; and it happened that he chafed under neglect, and gave wanton expression to his indignation; so that finally he was deprived of all position, and disgraced.

It is a humiliating story: fervid and effervescing genius on the one part, and cool, calculating, heartless dignity on the other. If Dundonald had been given due range, there is little doubt but he would have made his name second in the naval career of England only to that of Lord Nelson. As affairs turned, his name has scarce been spoken publicly; until, in these latter days, with the weight of four-score years of ignominy resting on him, he has risen to the gravity of exculpation, and has gained a verdict for skill and patriotism, which, long ago, those who knew him best had given him in their hearts.

England, by her officials, gives slow remuneration for his worth by a pompous procession and an interment in Westminster Abbey. Whole garlands of red tape will be woven in prodigal generosity for the bier of the veteran who, fifty years ago, was strangled by two tight strands of it. If he could have had only the humility to suffer quietly the indignities thrust upon him by his superiors—if he could only have attached himself to a party with unquestioning determination—if he could only have lowered himself to the resolve of being more another man's man and less himself—he might have come to great honors in life; but not to half so many large and sincere ones at his death.

He is a notable type of worth that fails of success. He does not kill himself, like Haydon the painter; he never affected the martyr, like Barry; but with the strength of sterling manhood he bravely lived down detraction: and you and we, here and now, will fling a little bunch of flowers (in words of cheer) upon the dead hero's tomb.

Quite other death has been that of the Duchess of Alba, the sister of the Empress. There was unusual attachment between the sisters; and now, the court journalists tell us, the Empress is passing a month in Scotland, incognita, in the hope of wearing off, by change of scene, the desolating sense of her loss.

Other paragraphists intimate that the Empress, always a dévoté, is now stirred into an access of religious zeal, which can not brook her husband's political measurement of the Papal position and prospects. She leans to the priesthood more than Louis Napoleon, and the monarch advises Scotch air as an offset to the confessional graces of the Archbishop of Paris.

Then there is Sir Harry Smith, who belongs to the later necrologic lists—a brave man, who has almost outlived the story of his heroism, only because the Crimea, and China, and Italy are larger war-fields than the steppes of South Africa. We used to see his portrait in the magazines; he is graven now for all.

The princely Duke of Richmond is dead too; the ready and generous host of Castle Gordon, who traced back his patent of nobility to the royal frailties of Charles the Second and the French frailties of a courtly ancestress. He was a rarely good specimen of the insistent, conservative English country gentleman, who deplored free admission of grain, who sneered at Sir Robert Peel, who despised Cobden, who loved the smock-frocks and the clouted shoes of the British peasantry, who made speeches at agricultural shows, who poached the meadows of his tenants, who loved royalty, privilege, and wealth, and gave abundant crumbs to the poor, and at last came to sumptuous burial.

Speaking of British agricultural associations reminds us of the fact that the lesser ones, as well as the farmers' dinners, are becoming conventicles for the utterance and applause of extremist political Toryism. Those farmers who hear speech-making only once a year are capital subjects to whom to address the elegant old opinions of a half century ago on political topics. Down at Castle Hedingham (wherever that may be), a certain Major Beresford has latterly, we observe, been administering to the honest yeomen of the land a dose of most excellent Tory pap: he could not forbear a short glance at the new régime in Italy; but it was only to deplore the democratic taint of it, and to express his regret that disorderly men of little cultivation had overturned, in a turbulent manner, a fine old monarchy; speaking of the monarchy very much as he might speak of a fine old Stilton cheese. Somewhere in Bedfordshire again, a good clergyman, being invited to participate in a farmers' festival, took occasion to urge a more familiar association of the farmers and landlords with their tenants and laborers—declaring that they were treated with too great indignity, and could never appreciatingly work out improved agricultural designs until they were given more elevation of character. Whereupon a well-to-do Baronet took the poor clergyman stoutly to task for introducing agrarian views, and highly dangerous opinions to disturb a harmony that had existed for centuries. The vicar undertook a modest defense, but the landlords in the top-boots put him down. They are, of course, all good anti-Cobden men.

In the large towns, however, we find counterbalancing facts which count largely toward the progress of the work-people of England. Of such, and eminently honorable, is the benefaction of Mr. William Brown to the city of Liverpool for the purpose of founding a free library. To this end £40,000 have been given by the merchant prince; and the building, just now complete, has been opened with inaugural festivities. The inevitable Lord Brougham was present, and at a banquet given to the generous donor in St. George's hall, spoke to the toast in honor of the House of Lords. His lordship passed a warm eulogy upon the British peers as a body, and affirmed the necessity of such a privileged estate to the effective working of the Constitutional monarchy of England. He believed their own to be the safest and strongest Government in the world; and took occasion to express strong distrust of the permanence of any purely Republican or Democratic form.

To recur to Mr. Brown: Americans all know him as the senior of the firm which is represented by Brown Brothers in New York, and by Brown, Shipley, and Co., in Liverpool. An Irishman by birth, he lived for many years in Baltimore; as early as 1809 he returned to Europe, and established himself at Liverpool in business correspondence with his father's firm in Baltimore, and with his brothers in Philadelphia and New York.

The business of the house thrived and increased with the growth of the cotton-trade, until, in the year 1836, Mr. William Brown was able to purchase the Brandon estate and manor, near Coventry, of the Marquis of Hastings for £80,000. But in the next year, 1837, the house had well-nigh been overwhelmed by the general wreck of confidence and of business. The house held protested bills to the amount of £750,000.

"Had they possessed" (says a historian of the period) "less than the strength of giants they could not have extricated themselves. The British Government saw, and looked with apprehension as it saw, the struggle of this gigantic establishment. From Inverness to Penzance there was not a single town but would have felt its fall. In Sheffield and Birmingham, and the towns surrounding them—in Manchester, Leeds, and all the great factory communities, a large number of merchants and employers, and, as a matter of course, every man and woman employed, were less or more involved in the fate of this establishment. Mr. Brown in this emergency acted like a man of sense and spirit. He put himself in the mail-train for London. He asked an audience of the Directors of the Bank of England. That was an anxious day in the Bank parlor. Fortunately the Bank had, in Mr. Curtis, a chairman who had unlimited confidence in the candor and integrity of the Liverpool merchant and banker. Mr. Brown satisfied the directors that he only required temporary assistance; that, making allowance even for a ruinous depreciation of prices, he held securities more than sufficient to cover all his liabilities, if time were given him to realize them and obtain remittances. The Bank took the protested bills, and other securities offered, and then informed Mr. Brown that he might draw upon them for £1,950,000. The decision of the Bank of England gave unbounded joy in Liverpool and the manufacturing districts. A hundred firms breathed more freely for themselves, and acknowledged that they as well as Mr. Brown had been saved from bankruptcy.

"The Bank advanced Mr. Brown £800,000 in cash, and met a few bills. Meanwhile energetic measures were taken by the agents of the firm in the United States, who remitted money to Liverpool by every vessel. It is said that the Bank of the United States, by its chairman, Mr. Biddle, having received £1,000,000 of money from the firm, gave them a letter of credit for £400,000, for which they were to be charged 2½ per cent.; but the Bank of England, being informed that this credit was to cost £10,000, declined, in the most liberal manner, to receive it, stating that they were quite satisfied with the credit of the house, and the securities they held. In about six months Brown, Shipley, and Co. were enabled to discharge the loan with interest, and had the gratification to receive a letter from Mr. Freshfield, solicitor to the Bank, stating that he was ordered by the directors to inform them that they never had a more satisfactory transaction with any house."

LORD PALMERSTON has latterly been taking a triumphal journey into Yorkshire. He has spoken, too, in his apt and easy way, to the Leeds Corporation, who presented him an address of welcome, and before the annual meeting of the Ragged School Society and the Shoe-black Brigade. The status of the British Government, as respects Italian changes, is shadowed forth in a half dozen words:

"Our action is the action of opinion alone. We leave the Italians to deal with their own affairs, and all we hope and wish is that other countries will follow our example, and that the people of those regions, favored with many of the gifts of nature, should be allowed to arrange their internal affairs in the manner which may seem to them best adapted to their happiness and welfare."

Again, this bit of good British philosophy is worth quoting:

"You have been pleased in this address to refer to the loyalty of the people of this country. That loyalty is innate in the mind of every British subject; for if there is one peculiarity, perhaps, which belongs to the British character, it is a sentiment of gradations of rank. Every rank knows its own position; it is neither jealous of those above, nor does it treat without respect those who happen to be below it. There is a general consciousness that in human society there must be degrees, that the preservation of the grades is essential to the welfare of the community, and that feeling and sentiment is directed with increased intensity toward the Sovereign who sits on the throne."

WE can not pass over without mention a subject which has of late engrossed so large a share of public attention in England, as that of iron-plated vessels. The successful completion of the French-plated frigate, La Gloire, and the reported determination of the Emperor to lay down at once the keels of some half dozen others of equal size and power, has marvelously quickened the fears and the activity of the English naval authorities. Mr. Scott Russell, in a letter to the Times, corrects certain misstatements in regard to the French ship Gloire:

"We have been told that the Gloire is steel-plated. She is not. Her plating, like that used in this country, is merely good hammered iron, 4½ inches thick. The plates are of similar dimensions to those of the Trusty, and, like those of the Trusty, have been penetrated by steel bolts; and I can entirely bear out the testimony of your correspondents, Captain Halsted and Captain Sherard Osborn, by stating that the experiments made in France, as well as those made on the Trusty, the results of which I have carefully examined, prove that the plates are penetrable, but penetrable under rare and exceptional circumstances, so as to be practically shot-proof, and, I believe, in all cases perfectly shell-proof, which, after all, as your third naval correspondent says, is the important point. Another of your correspondents, Mr. Whitworth, after stating the ability of his shot and gun to penetrate such plates—a fact which no one who knows both can doubt—proceeds to say that ‘ships hampered by the weight of enormous plates must be unfit to carry a broadside of guns heavy enough,’ and also ‘can not be driven at the high speed which must hereafter give the superiority in naval warfare.’ On both points allow me to give an opposite opinion. The Gloire has been built by M. Dupuis de Lome after a most exact calculation of the effect of such plates both upon the weight and speed of the vessel; she is perfectly fit to carry a broadside of guns of as heavy a calibre as any that can be carried and worked in our own wooden ships; and she is driven at least at as high a speed as any vessel of similar dimensions in our own service. She has, therefore, proved that an exact scientific calculation can be made beforehand of the power of a ship to carry such a load, and of the velocity at which a given power will propel her. I have yet to learn that either a great weight or a powerful battery is such an enemy to speed and carrying power as not to be overcome by the judicious application of well-known principles of naval architecture. I may further add, in justice to M. Dupuis de Lome, that the Gloire, although a great success, must not be considered her builder’s chef-d’œuvre. She was built to meet the peculiarities of the circumstances in which a builder in France at that date inevitably found himself placed. Had he lived in an iron country like England, he would probably have adopted an entirely different construction, but, like a wise man, he made the best of the materials he had at hand, and has been rewarded with corresponding success.”

Vice-Admiral Sartorius (of British Navy) follows up the discussion at a later day, assuming the necessity of at once constructing an iron-cased navy, and claiming the superior efficiency of steam-rams, without heavy rigging, over the frigates now under construction. He says:

“It is well known there are a great variety of projectiles which are infallibly destructive to the wooden vessel, but one kind alone may injure the iron-cased vessel—that is, a peculiar shot not yet in general use. The timber-built ship is combustible from truck to water-lines; vulnerable from stem to stern. The iron-cased vessel may be occasionally vulnerable to shot, but is incombustible. The concentrated broadside of a line-of-battle ship may stave in the side of the iron-cased vessel, if the latter would be civil enough to cease all firing, and place herself exactly in the position desired by the liner. It is more probable that the iron-cased vessel will commence its fire the moment that she can strike, and half a dozen only of molten iron shells, or liquid fire, hitting (we know one alone has been sufficient), the wooden vessel must be in flames long before she could close upon her antagonist. At 800 or 400 yards the shot would drop off harmless from the iron sides; but every shot or shell would easily penetrate the wooden vessel at 3000 yards. As it is clear the iron walls must supersede wooden ones, let us examine which of the two actual arrangements of the former is the most efficient—the steam-frigate iron-cased, with the usual masts, yards, and sails of a line-of-battle ship, only using her guns; or the modification of the steam-frigate, which only uses artillery, and is expressly built for speed and strength, and weight sufficient to sink by concussion, and with a rig subordinate to that important quality. I give my reasons in the following observations to show why I think the latter (steam-ram) is infinitely superior for service, less expensive in construction, and much less in maintenance. The iron-plated steam-ram can make use of guns as the steam-frigate, equal in calibre, and, if required, equal in number. She can use more guns from each extremity than the frigate from her bow or stern; therefore, whether retreating or pursuing, the steam-ram is more formidable, even when she trusts to her guns alone. A single steam-ram can effect with her beak an amount of destruction in a few minutes which would take many steam-frigates to effect very imperfectly in as many days, if at all. She could get in among a fleet at night, sink two or three ships, and disperse the rest. She could run into a harbor—such, for example, as Cherbourg—by one entrance, and out by the other, sink some of the ships at anchor in the outer road by her beak, and set fire to others by her incendiary projectiles. The steam-rams should have both extremities the same (I proposed a screw and rudder at each end, and also paddle-wheels for Channel service); she could run in or out among the enemy’s vessels, and advance or back with the same velocity and quickness. If attacking at night, with masts lowered, she could not be seen until felt, could launch out her incendiary projectiles into the town or harbor, and there would be no masts, sails, or rigging to obstruct her flight in every direction. Guarded by loop-holed and bullet-proof towers, to afford refuge to her people when boarded, and boiling water made to be ejected from them, it would be impossible to take the steam-ram. No steam-frigate could do all this. A steam-ram, when prepared for action (she has, of course, no bowsprit), with her masts lowered, the rigging—the little she has—frapped in amidships, and without any kind of outside projection, can clear instantly any vessel she may fall alongside of, or that she has run into. If boarded, the boarders must be killed or scalded. As no wreck can hang overboard, her screw can not be fouled.”

ANOTHER topic, which has proved a very fertile one for British paragraphists, has been the library of Mr. Mudie. We can explain best who Mr. Mudie is by transcribing here one of his advertisements:

CHARLES EDWARD MUDIE,

NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON; CROSS STREET, MANCHESTER; AND NEW STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

Mr. Mudie buys copies of a popular book by the thousand, not unfrequently engaging to take three-quarters or four-fifths of an edition on terms considerably below the usual trade price. These copies go into the hands of his subscribers in every quarter of the kingdom; and when withdrawn, or the books are supplanted by newer ones, they are offered for sale at something like one-fourth of the usual booksellers' price. Thus it will be seen that Mr. Mudie has an immense control over the book-market of England. What he does not choose to buy has dull chance of sale; whereupon the lesser literary lights raise the outcry that he is become the censor of the British press; and an uneducated tradesman of Oxford Street makes final decision upon the merit of all the literary work of the time. He determines for England (as well as himself) what books have "less than average ability," and what novels belong to the "higher class of fiction."

His being professedly a select library, as he says, can he not claim the right he uses? And if the right be allowed, how far is it liable to abuse; and to what extent can he do wrong to public taste or to the literary guild? These are the questions which bring out every week scores of replies. The truth is, we suspect, that Mr. Mudie, however untaught he may be, must have taken habitually a pretty accurate estimate of the public want, else his little shop (at first in Holborn, we believe) could hardly have made such enormous outgrowth. And whatever rights he may have, he also has duties, which always grow in weight with growth in power. If his whim may ruin a man he should look well to his whims. Tom Thumb may put his foot where he will; but the giant must show more consideration.

It is a little suspicious that the main attack on Mr. Mudie has sprung from those authors who have written unsalable books: these are proverbially petulant men, but usually console themselves with some eloquent new fixture of the old truth, that popularity is no measurer of merit. No more is Mr. Mudie. But the best conquest they can make of his monopoly is to write books that will sail in spite of him.

Of other literary topics, Mr. Sala's Temple Bar is one: Mr. Thackeray's new story another (which we trust there may be no heresy in hoping will prove better than "Lovel the Widower"). As for chirrupy Pip, he is a household companion all over two nations already.

Mr. Ruskin continues to explore transcendently the world of economics, making a great many more moral discoveries than moneyed ones. It is safe to say that his papers will not break down the Bank of England, or inaugurate any new theories of trade. It is a pity he should not keep to Art. Here and there he strikes out certain rare and radiant truths even when struggling with his economic problems; but they are only too rare and radiant. The vapor that carries a rainbow coiled in it does not feed the grass with the rainbow. If labor was all honest labor, and all credit sound credit, and all exchanges only needful exchanges, and all wants certain wants, and all Christians perfect Christians, we think Mr. Ruskin would make a successful fiscal manager; as the matter stands, we think he would make an execrably poor one. The man who has studied cattle only through such glorious shaggy outline of them as belongs to Rosa Bonheur's pictures, can not by pinching the flank of a fat bullock tell us how much tallow he carries to the hundred.

We leave this matter for a glimpse at a Papal horror of Leo XIIth's time, which a late Italian writer has furnished up, quite in the style of M. About:

"Mgr. Traietto, of a patrician family of Naples, a prelate of the most infamous character, was found one morning in his bed barbarously murdered. This crime, committed on a prelate, made Leo XII. tremble with anger. To him it was perfectly permitted to do what he liked with his tonsured cattle; but to laymen the same permission could by no means be extended. The example might become epidemic."

"Leo XII. gave formidable orders that the guilty person should be discovered at all cost. The sbirri and the gens d'armes were set into movement; confessors, nuns, devotees, were all on the watch."

"Mgr. Traietto had a domestic, a fine young man, married to a pretty Transteverine; they had children. This servant, after performing for his master all the necessary duties, went home in the evening to his own house. The police entered the dwelling of Ludovico, for so was the servant called, and found that he had got his master's watch. Interrogated how it came into his possession, he replied: 'My master gave it to me to carry to the watchmaker the evening before he was murdered.'

"No article was missing in the house of the murdered prelate, neither money, nor jewels, nor linen, nor clothes, nor papers—absolutely nothing. Neither was there any thing to prove the culpability of Ludovico. Between him and his master there was no discord, no anger, no rancor, no visible reason for vengeance. The tribunal, though composed of ecclesiastics thirsting to avenge the murder of an ecclesiastic, were still not willing to condemn one whom they did not deem guilty."

"Leo XII., for whom the crime was clear, being complete and consummate, cried in fury: 'We need an example; we need a terrible expiation.' The tribunal was compelled to condemn Ludovico. But it could not help adding to the sentence which the Pope forced it to pass, audito sanctissimo—an old formula of the Curia Romana—which signifies the votes are divided, and the Holy Father must decide. The Holy Father voted for death."

"The young wife and the children of Ludovico knelt to the Vicar of Christ to implore pardon for the husband and father, as the sovereign had yielded to the exigencies of justice, and voted for the capital punishment. Leo XII. gave the wife money as if to purchase the life of her husband, but rejected the demand for pardon; and as he desired that the penalty should be exemplary, a horrible punishment was exhumed from the Middle Ages."

"A lofty scaffold was erected in the Place du Peuple; it was arrayed in black. Troops of the line environed it. Strong patrols of carabinieri, police, and dragoons traversed the neighboring streets, and slowly circulated in the midst of the people who filled that fatal circus."

"It was a beautiful day in April, the beginning of Easter, and nine o'clock in the morning. Monks, peasants, young girls, priests, beggars, old hags, prelates, nobles, citizens, officers of the Government, comfortable proprietors—a crowd, gaudy, strange, most varied, most contrasted, most hideous, moved to and fro, pressed against each other, smiled, joked, prayed, made appointments, bargained—Rome in its uttermost diversity was there. Foreigners had remained for the sake of the spectacle. Women of highest rank and in highest toilet were there; Russian princesses, ladies from Great Britain, French countesses, disputed with each other about every window whence a good view could be obtained. Every body grew impatient; every body expressed his impatience to his neighbor; every body seemed ready to hiss the executioner and the officers of justice. There was almost a fear lest a pardon granted to the criminal should spoil the entertainment, so loving is man to his brother. At last the condemned person appeared.

"He was standing in a cart that was drawn by oxen; the cart was arrayed in red, the man himself in black sackcloth. On his right was a priest, on his left the executioner. Ludovico traversed the crowd with slow steps, and cried, without ceasing, in a voice which God must have heard and marked in his book of mercy, 'I am innocent; I am innocent!' Helped, or rather, I should say, dragged by the priest and the executioner, Ludovico mounted the scaffold. He was made to kneel, that is to say, the executioner put his hand on his shoulder and forced him to bend his knees. Ludovico obeyed; he did not weep; he scarcely prayed; but he called, in a choking voice, on his wife and children. The priest kept jabbering Latin in the ear of a man who scarcely knew the Roman patois; then he went a little affront. The executioner, Mastro Titta, remained standing beside the criminal.

"The crowd scarcely breathed; the men could have counted each beating of the heart of the young women beside them. At last Mastro drew from under his red cloak a large stick, shod with lead. He played with this cudgel as a drum-major plays with his long silver-headed cane, as a mountebank plays with his juggling rods. Then he took a firm grasp of it, whirled it twice round his head, and struck the criminal on the left temple. A cry of horror burst from the crowd. The victim fell like an ox, and the body began to struggle in its great agony. But the justice of the Vicar of Christ was not yet satisfied; the punishment was not yet complete.

"Mastro Titta threw away his cudgel into the midst of the crowd, assailed his victim afresh, drew a butcher's knife, and cut Ludovico's throat. Then, with the same knife, he made a deep circle all round the neck, as if to trace the line, and then cut the head off, which he held up to the people. The blood of this head reddened the executioner, while two jets of blood covered with hideous stains the robe of the priest. You are thinking, perhaps, that the brutality is finished? No; Mastro Titta cut the two arms from the shoulder-blades, and the two legs from the knees of the corpse, and, gathering up the feet, the hands, the arms, the legs, the head, the trunk, he threw the whole into a box at the bottom of the scaffold. He then pulled out a handkerchief, and proceeded very quietly to use it.

"I need say nothing of the horror of the people at the sight of this frightful execution. A yell of malediction, unanimous and irresistible, burst from the bosom of the multitude, which a quarter of an hour before was so joyous; a yell of malediction which the presence of the troops of the gens d'armes, of the police, could not restrain. Meanwhile the priest on the scaffold, with an air of supreme indifference, took snuff. The whole affair had not at all disturbed Pope Leo XII. He thought he had done his duty. A year afterward a young man of good family died in the hospital of Santo Spirito. He confessed that it was he who had murdered Mgr. Traietto, to avenge an infamous outrage which that prelate had inflicted on his honor."

Editor's Drawer.

THE Drawer greets its readers with wishes for the happiest of all the New Years. The Drawer seeks to make the world happy, and thus has a mission as noble and useful as that of any other department of this Magazine. The wisest of men, with the wisdom of heaven in him when he spoke, said, and we are willing to believe him, "There is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labor." Without a good digestion and a good conscience no man can enjoy any thing: with them both no man ought to be miserable.

In the year that is past the Drawer was largely indebted to its voluntary correspondents for their constant favors, by which the supply of entertaining anecdote and incident was kept up with unflagging spirit. The year to come ought to be more abundant. These pages reflect the current humor of the whole country: the farthest inhabited regions of Oregon and California, and the distant islands have contributed to this common fund, and all are welcome. "The more the merrier" is truer here than any where else.

An intelligent and gallant officer in the United States army writes to the Drawer, and he is always welcome:

"When the United States army started for Utah there was a scarcity of transportation, or, in other words, there were too few baggage-wagons. Now every soldier knows how like the apple of one's eye are these same baggage-wagons, drawn as they are by six mules, on the long marches across the plains.

"A Colonel of dragoons, who had command of one of the columns, restricted the officers very much in their allowance of baggage, and was most bitter if any one tried to exceed the just amount.

"One morning the Colonel met one of his Captains (a dragoon, of course), when he burst out as follows:

"'Captain, do you know what these artillery officers want to take across the plains?'

"'No, Colonel, I do not,' said the Captain, with an inquiring look.

"'Well,' said he, 'if you'll believe me, there's one of 'em wants to take across a box of books.'

"'Books!' exclaimed the Captain; 'what next, I wonder! Now, Colonel, I have but little to take across myself—nothing, in fact, but a barrel of whisky.'

"'Of course, Captain, of course; any thing in reason, any thing in reason; but the idea of carrying a parcel of books across that stretch is a little more than I can stand.'

From Sierra County, California, a reader of the Drawer writes:

"We have a Postmaster in Gibsonville, by name Schoelim, of the 'Jewish persuasion,' as John Phoenix would say, and, true to his national proclivities, he is always wide awake to drive a bargain.

"One day Wright, whose peculiarity of speech consists of a certain nasal twang, entered the store in which the Post-office is kept, and throwing a half dollar on the counter, said:

"'Schoelim, give me four bits' worth of ten-cent stamps.'

"The worthy incumbent responded by producing four ten-cent stamps, which is his usual custom.

"Now," said Wright, "Mr. Schoelim, be sure and make no mistake. We sent a long way for you to fill this office, and we want you to be perfect. Examine them well. We sent all the way to Jerusalem for a Postmaster, and we won't have any mistakes."

"Of course we celebrated the Fourth of July in an appropriate manner, with the thunder of anvils, the music of a brass band, an oration, a poem, etc. After the conclusion of the ceremonies at the pavilion, the President announced that the procession would form and march to the front of the North Star Hotel, and there be dismissed by a benediction. On arriving at the appointed spot, imagine the consternation of the leader of the band when Mr. Gaza, the marshal of the day, requested him to 'play a benediction.'"

THE following "Notices" can be seen in a conspicuous place in the entry near the head of the stairs connected with a range of offices in a neighboring city:

NOTICE TO PEDDLERS.

No Gold or Steel Pens wanted.
No Books or Maps wanted.
No Paper or Envelopes wanted.
No Essex R.R. Stock wanted.
No encouragement given to organ-grinders or monkeys.
No attention paid to subscription papers.

Five notices similar to the above have been stolen from the entry by some enraged peddler, Boot-man, or Monkey; and one who considers himself a clown or a Jackass will steal this.

A READER of the Drawer writes from a rural village in Missouri, and says:

"I must tell your humorship what I heard in a store in this place yesterday afternoon. I had stepped in to purchase some little article, when my attention was directed to an old lady who was examining a piece of calico. She pulled it this way and that, as if she would tear it to pieces, held it up to the light in different positions, spat on a corner and rubbed it between her fingers to try if the colors were good. She then stood still a while, seemingly not entirely satisfied. At last she cut off a piece with the clerk's scissors, and handing it to a tall, gawky-looking girl of about sixteen standing beside her, said, 'Here, Liz Jane, you take 'n chaw that, 'n see ef 't fades.' And Liz Jane put it in her mouth and dutifully went to work."

ONE of the new contributors to the Drawer tells a story of John Robinson, a friend of his, who is the cleverest of fellows, but will get drunk now and then. When half-seas over he was decidedly argumentative and dogmatical. He came home one night in this balmy state, and, stepping up to the mantle-piece, took a lamp and began to strike a match to light his lamp, though a lighted one was standing close by. His mother, sitting near, said to him, "John, why don't you light by this one, and save the matches?" John turned around and replied, "Mother, don't you know (hic) that matches are much (hic) cheaper than oil?"

MRS. MARTIN was tired of the Irish, and tried to get some other help, but could not succeed. She determined, in her desperation, to take a fresh one—a green one—just from the Green Isle, and try to make something of her. Bridget, just over, with a broad face and broader brogue, was duly installed, and for a while worked away with some fair prospect of getting into the ways of the house. One morning Mrs. M. went by the kitchen-door, and looking in, saw Bridget straining the coffee for breakfast through a stocking! Horror-struck she exclaimed, "Bridget, what on earth are you doing?" Bridget looked up with great composure, and replied, "Sure, Ma'am, and it's not a clane one!"

AN Irish admirer of the Drawer tells us of one of his countrymen in Dublin, a young man who took it into his head to join the army. Having purchased his commission, he stepped into his uniform, looked at the glass, and came to the conclusion that he was what every other young man would wish to be. Believing that beauty and good clothes were not made to be hid under a bushel, he started along the Liffy to see and to be seen. It happened that he met an old officer several times, whom he did not salute. The old fellow was a rough and ready sort of person, who had skirmished in many a well-fought battle, and detested dandyism from his very soul. Seeing that the young fellow paid no respect to his senior, the old man asked him how long he was in the army.

"Seven days," responded the young 'un, with a very supercilious air.

"Ah! yes, to be sure," said the old 'un; "I had forgotten that puppies do not see until the ninth day!"

"A SUBSCRIBER" in Tennessee relates the following, and vouches for its literal truth:

"As judicial decisions are very popular with the Drawer, I wish to relate one that I witnessed when the State of Tennessee, now so great and powerful, was in her infancy. My friend Mr. Brower, twenty-five years of age, who stood six feet six in his stockings—that is, when he had any stockings to stand in—became dissatisfied with the appellation of Bob Brower, and thought that if he could affix 'Squire' to his name it would add dignity to his character with the community at large, and especially with the ladies. A vacancy occurring about this time, my friend Mr. Brower and a Mr. Johnson offered themselves as candidates for the important office of magistrate. Mr. Brower, after treating his friends to a half barrel of R—G—whisky (the young ladies will please consider those initials as standing for right good), and having thrashed his opponent twice for telling the truth about him, was elected. Our new-made 'Squire,' although previously standing six feet six, seemed now two or three inches taller, and probably would have continued to increase in stature and dignity but for a case which was brought before him at this time. Mr. P— sued Mr. D— on an open account for work and labor done to the amount of five dollars. The Court was held in an old log school-house with the ground for a floor, and the three-'limbed' stool usually occupied by the teacher became for the time being the seat of justice. The plaintiff, after being solemnly and legally sworn by our worthy magistrate, stated that he had labored faithfully ten days for the defendant, at fifty cents a day, for which he was to have received five dollars in cash, which defendant now refused to pay. The defendant, on being asked what he had to say why judgment should not be 'gin in agin' him, swore that an agreement had been made with the plaintiff that he should receive his pay in oats. Just here the plaintiff pitched into the defendant, and bit and gouged him most scientifically. The magistrate tried in vain to restore order by 'moral suasion'; finally becoming discouraged, and recollecting that his dignity must be preserved, knocked the plaintiff down, at the same time exclaiming: 'I'm sworn to keep the peace and see that the laws are obeyed, and I mean to do it.' After all hands had had a fist in restoring order, the Court adjourned to the grocery on the opposite side of the road, and the crowd liquored at the expense of the Judge. Harmony being thus restored, the magistrate again took his seat, and after due deliberation thus addressed the litigants:

"Gentlemen (we are all gentlemen out here, that is, all of us who have the good luck to keep out of the penitentiary), 'Gentlemen, one or the other of you has sworn to a lie "sure."' Then turning to the defendant he said: 'You bring me five dollars' worth of oats.' And drawing a five-dollar gold piece from his pocket handed it to the plaintiff, and exclaimed: 'I wish I may be hung if that is not the last case that ever I try!'

"He forthwith resigned; and although he retained his title of 'Squire,' the State of Tennessee has never since enjoyed the benefit of his legal knowledge."

WE are indebted again to a valued contributor who sends the three that follow:

"A certain Judge of one of our courts was very punctilious in court etiquette, but dearly loving a joke or witticism. The nephew of the Judge was foreman of the jury, a man of great wit and humor, who knew his uncle's love of wit, and also his rigid ruling in court. The foreman was not present when the Court came in and the jury were called, but came in soon after. The Judge, in a very stern manner, addressed his nephew thus: 'Mr. S—, what excuse have you to give for keeping the Court waiting?' who, replied, in his usual comical manner: 'May it please your Honor, I overslept myself.' The Judge, turning to the Clerk of the Court, said, 'Mr. Clerk, fine Mr. S—;' who immediately arose and said, 'May it please your Honor, I never dreamed of that.' The Judge, after a short pause, showing by the working of his countenance that he appreciated and enjoyed the wit, turned again to the clerk, merely observing, 'Mr. Clerk, remit the fine.'

"THE officer who opens the court is called the 'crier.' On one occasion the said officer had lost his wife, who had led him an uncomfortable life, and he was of course absent from his post. When the Court came in, the Judge, as usual, said, 'Mr. Crier, open the court. A young and facetious lawyer addressed the Court as follows: 'May it please your Honor, Mr. B— can not cry to-day, as he has lost his wife!'

"A MEDICAL STUDENT, who had been screwed very hard at his examination for admission to the faculty, on a very warm day, was nearly overcome by the numerous questions put to him, when the following query was added: 'What course would you adopt to produce a copious perspiration?' After a long breath, he observed, wiping his forehead, 'I would have the patient examined before the Medical Society!'"

A SMART SON OF THE SEA—a stormy, stalwart sailor—says that so many sea words are spelled with an s at the start, that he sat down to see how many he could set in one sentence, and he soon scared up two score, and he might have secured sixty if he had studied steadily six or seven seconds more:

"The scow and shallop slowly swim upon the Sound, and sink when scuttled; while the skiff, the smack, and slight sail-boat are sculled and skim along the surging straits; and sometimes, in a spray, scud, or squall, strike the sandy, shelly shore, and are swamped in the seething surf. But the state-ly ship and the smoking steamer, the sloop and schooner sail securely on the smooth surface of the salt sea, steered by the strong seamen."

THE contest for the office of County Treasurer in a State "down South" was very exciting in the fall of last year, and seemed to turn as much upon the popularity as the qualification of the candidates. M— had announced himself very "early in the action" as a "solicitor" for the suffrages of his fellow-citizens; but owing to his general reputation for facetiousness and hoaxes, the great unterrified couldn't be persuaded that he was really out. Some two weeks prior to the election-day, becoming alarmed at the probable consequences of this unwarrantable opinion among the people, he determined to make the circuit of his county, and convince his constituents that he was a candidate. In his travels he stopped at the house of an old settler to spend the night. The old gentleman was uncommitted, and M— made himself very agreeable; told stories innumerable of himself, his horse, and his prospects, and had well-nigh exhausted his "larder" when a hap-hazard remark was made of bee-trees.

Cocking his head sideways, in a way peculiar to him, M— said,

"Speaking of bee-trees, reminds me of a slight experience I had in that way myself. You see, Sir, there was a large bee-tree near my house that had worried me a long time, being's I had a fondness for bee-hunting, and I determined to cut it down. I had a woman's curiosity to know what was inside of the 'holler' that grinned at me about forty feet up the tree. So one day we all got our axes and cut the tree down; and would you believe me," said M—, leaning patronizingly toward his host, and giving the confirmatory gesture with his right forefinger, "we got out of it sixty gallons of strained honey!"

"Ain't you mistaken in your figures?"

"No. We not only got sixty gallons of strained honey, but after we left the honey run out sixty yards down-hill and forty yards up!"

"I know that's a lie!" said his host.

"That shows your ignorance!" coolly replied M—; "it was wild honey, and you know there's no counting on the way it acts!"

In the early history of the still flourishing city of Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, in Texas, and about the time of the withdrawal of the United States troops from that country at the close of the Mexican war, the inhabitants mostly consisted of that class of half renegades, half gamblers, usually found in one of our frontier towns, with a small sprinkling of honest, and sometimes Christian citizens. Among the latter was a very honest, upright merchant, known as Uncle George Doane.

Uncle George was a man of sterling worth and unshaken integrity, and, withal, a devout member of the Methodist Church, but unfortunately possessed of a most fiery temper, easily aroused, and when aroused—and in combination with his well-knit frame and long, muscular arms—he was by no means a pleasant subject for even a courageous man to meet in a regular hand-to-hand “set-to.”

In Brownsville, at that time, was stationed one of those Methodist missionaries to whose superhuman exertions are owing so much of the religious zeal which is now manifested throughout the whole valley of the Rio Grande. Our worthy brother, Mr. Cravens, found a strong and energetic assistant, as well as a warm personal friend, in Uncle George. During a short absence of Brother Cravens from Brownsville Uncle George had a serious difficulty, arising from the shooting of a favorite dog of his by a bully known as Tom C——, who has since figured rather largely in Sonora and California, and latterly was one of the sixty-five men that followed the fortunes of General Walker in his first expedition against Nicaragua.

Uncle George, in his wrath, sought out the offender and publicly chastised him.

Brother Cravens, when informed of the occurrence, on his return, was heard to make the following very pithy remark, which has been a by-word in these “diggings” ever since: “Brother George Doane, unrestrained by Divine grace, can whip any man on the Rio Grande!”

“A FINE organ has been recently placed in the chapel of the new Henderson Institute, in the town of Danville, Kentucky, and a little darkey by the name of Hentz impressed into its service as ‘blower.’ He considers the bellows a bore, and, although entertaining a general idea that nothing can be done without him, always contrives to be missing when most wanted. Yesterday a free fight came off between him and another unprofessional Cuffee, whom Hentz finally annihilated with these withering words:

“‘Pooh!’ (with great contempt) ‘you’s nothing but a banjo boy; but I’—(here an effective pause)—‘I plays the organ!’ and exit Hentz, with a solemnity and dignity worthy of his position.

“FIVE-YEAR-OLD Josie fully verifies the adage about ‘little pitchers,’ etc. The other day the discourse of her elders turned upon the landing of the Pilgrims, and Josie’s mind became exercised upon the subject of her forefathers.

“‘Four fathers!’ she soliloquized; ‘I am sure I can’t think who they are. There’s father and my two grandfathers, that’s plain enough; but who can the other one be?’ and here she twitched her mother’s dress inquiringly.

“No immediate answer being given, she solved the problem for herself with a triumphant shout. ‘Oh! I know: it is “Our Father who art in heaven!” I HAVE got four fathers!’ And she walked off, disdaining farther information upon the subject.”

A CORRESPONDENT in Virginia writes that he has “no skill in telling a story,” and to prove it tells the two following, which he says have “the merit of being strictly true:”

“In a Western county of this State there resides a venerable and distinguished clergyman, who is universally beloved. But, as the sequel will show, he is a little ‘absent-minded’ at times. An aged couple lived within the bounds of his congregation, and a few months ago the old lady departed this life. The clergyman was sent for to officiate at the funeral, and unfortunately got the idea that it was the old man who had died. Accordingly the funeral sermon of the latter was duly pronounced, notwithstanding he sat near the minister; but being quite deaf, failed to hear a word that was spoken. One of the audience finally whispered to the preacher that the old lady was dead, and not her husband; whereupon the service was closed with the remark that every thing said in praise of Mr. Bean was equally applicable to Mrs. Bean!

“WHILE I am writing I may as well relate another: During the last ‘Gubernatorial canvass’ in this State, as our stump speakers call it, two young lawyers appeared at a country precinct of a neighboring county, on some public occasion, to advocate the claims of the respective candidates for Governor. The terms of the discussion had to be arranged, and each orator insisted vehemently that he could not ‘do justice to himself and his cause’ in less time than an hour and a half. Finding it impossible to agree in reference to a division of the time, mutual friends were called in to settle the matter. It was decided that A should speak an hour, and then B an hour; after which each was to have half an hour to reply. A commenced in grand style, and after speaking seven minutes gave way, announcing that he reserved the right to consume the remainder of his time when he came to reply. B spoke five minutes, and becoming unwell very suddenly, sat down with the same announcement made by his opponent. A declined to speak further, because his competitor ‘had opened up no new points in the discussion;’ and, for a similar reason, B surrendered his privilege of a rejoinder. Thus a discussion which was to have lasted three hours was finished in twelve minutes, and the audience dispersed; but A and B have not heard the last of it yet.”

THE Arkansas court scenes have often figured in the Drawer. Here is one more furnished by a Little Rocker:

“While the late Judge Johnson was holding a term of the Federal Court in this city, an important criminal trial having been called, among the jurors summoned was General B——, a conceited old gentleman, fond of using high-sounding words. When his name was called, he appeared in his usual pompous style. Judge J. put the customary inquiry, ‘Have you formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner at the bar?’ The General, looking very important, replied, ‘Well, I might say I have formed a sort of a problematical opinion.’ The Judge, immediately raising his hand and pointing toward the door of the court-room, exclaimed, ‘Now, Sir, you can please problematical out of this court-room, for you are too big a fool to serve on any jury.’”

“THE late Mr. Frederick Tropnell, one of the ablest lawyers in the State, was a candidate for the State Senate. Old Bob Triplet, a dissipated but jovial character, meeting Mr. Tropnell at the bar-room of the principal hotel, requested a loan of ten dollars.

“‘Bob,’ says Mr. Tropnell, ‘you have been borrowing money of me several times; before I lend you any more, I want to know whether you are going to vote for me or not.’

“Triplet, putting on one of his good-natured smiles, replied, ‘Fred, financially I am with you, but politically I am agin you!’”

THE colporter of Louisa County called on an old lady in his regular rounds, and introduced himself as a colporter.

"Ah!" said she, "and this is Col Porter. Well, I thought I knew all of old Jimmy Porter's boys, but the one they call Col I never saw before. Come, be seated, Col. How are you? I know your brothers."

Col accepted the seat, but soon departed, taking with him his package of books unopened.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:

"There resides near Bloomfield, Nelson County, Kentucky, a 'jolly old soul' known as Colonel Fielding Merrifield. The Colonel, some years since, was in Springfield, Washington County, Kentucky, and met one of Washington's hard-fisted sons, who asked him who might he be, and 'whar he lived at?' The Colonel replied as follows:

"'I live twenty miles from Springfield; four miles from Fairfield; half a mile from Bloomfield, just back of Tom Duncan's corn-field, and my name is Fielding Merrifield.'"

"I WOULD like," says a parent in Michigan, "to introduce one of our future great divines in the person of a little blue-eyed boy only two and a half years old. The other afternoon a good many ladies called upon his mother, and hearing them ask for her as he ran to the door with the girl, a new idea came into his head, for, as all dressed for sleep and kneeling at his mother's knee to say 'Now I lay me,' he knocked on the floor, saying, 'Mamma, see if the Lord is in first.'"

"A COUPLE of 'good uns,'" says a friend in Cincinnati, "have been bothering my head for some time, and in a moment of desperation I have determined you should have them.

"In the township in which I reside a very active politician, who can't write his own name, was elected constable as a reward for party services. A few days afterward a writ was placed in his hand to be served, and in due time he returned it to the magistrate. That worthy functionary, on examining the return indorsed thereon, with difficulty repressed a smile, and inquired of the constable who had written it. Anxious to conceal his ignorance, he replied, boldly, 'I did it, Sir. Isn't it well done?' Upon inquiring into it further, it was ascertained that he had got a well-known wag to act as clerk for him, who had made his return as follows:

"'Life is the time to serve the Lord—25 cents.'"

"I was in at my barber's, a jolly African, and he was giving me the titillations of a shampoo, when the conversation turned on Jones, a member of the bar. Bill inquired if I knew him. I answered, 'Very well.' Bill replied, 'He shaves wid me. He's got de littlest head I ever seed on any man.'

"We were all startled (and I lost a handful of hair) by a short, fat darkey lying on a settee grunting out:

"'Wat's use a man got fur a big trunk wen he hain't got many close?'"

THE following comes from Chicago; but we had many similar scenes and sayings in these parts just on the eve of the last Presidential election:

"During the Know-Nothing culmination of 1854 and 1855, which was felt in Chicago as much as any where else in the country, crowds were daily rushing to 'Phil Hoyne's Coort' (Recorder's), the favorite place for making citizens.

"One day, while the clerks were all busy in this laudable occupation, a son of Erin rushed in, in breathless haste, and exclaimed:

"'Mr. Hoyne, Pat Madden has just left for owld Ireland, and he said I might have his citizen paper; and here it is sure; plaze alter the name on it.'

"Phil respectfully declined, much to the disgust of the anxious candidate for citizenship.

"At another time, during the same season of excitement, a crowd was making tracks toward the court-house, when the foremost of them stopped a gentleman coming out and asked him 'where Mr. Hoyne's office was?'

"'What Mr. Hoyne do you mean?' says the person interrogated.

"'I want,' says the speaker, 'the Mr. Hoyne that makes American citizens out of Irishmen.'

"The crowd were accordingly directed to the citizen manufactory."

"An old correspondent of the Drawer begs leave to furnish you with the following result of extreme politeness on the part of President Buchanan:

"During the strife for the United States Marshalship of the Northern District of Illinois, in January, 1860, made vacant by the removal of C. N. Pine, the then Marshal, among numerous applicants Colonel Snowhook, a well-known Celt of this neighborhood, went to Washington backed by a host of friends. During a stay in Washington of over five weeks he made frequent calls on 'Old Buck,' who always treated him with great politeness; but the opposition was too much for the gallant Colonel, and he returned unsuccessful.

"In a conversation with his old friend Phil Hoyne, of 'Phil Hoyne's Coort' memory, shortly after his return, as to his hopes while at Washington, he remarked:

"'Pon my sowl, Phil, I was thinking the old gentleman was treating me with too much politeness to give me the office.'"

A FRIEND in Massachusetts writes:

"At the criminal term of the Superior Court now being held in Lawrence, Massachusetts, a little boy six years old was called as a witness in an assault case. The district-attorney, having some doubts whether a boy of so tender age knew the nature of an oath, proceeded to ask him a few questions, as follows:

"DISTRICT-ATTORNEY. 'Little boy, do you know what it is to testify?'

"LITTLE BOY. 'I suppose it is to tell the truth.'

"DISTRICT-ATTORNEY. 'Yes; but what would be the consequences if you did not tell the truth?'

"LITTLE BOY. 'I suppose I should be sent to jail.'

"DISTRICT-ATTORNEY. 'But would not God punish you?'

"LITTLE BOY. 'No, I guess not; dad's a Universalist.'"

THE late Judge Peters, of Connecticut, was a strong Democrat, and a violent opposer especially of every thing connected with the famous Hartford Convention. Roger Minot Sherman and Calvin Goddard, who had been members of that body, were once talking with Judge P. on the subject, when the latter, half facetiously and half in earnest, said:

"Well, gentlemen, if you had been tried before me for that matter I would have hung you both, not only without law and evidence, but, if need be, against both."

"That," said Sherman, making a low bow, "only proves your Honor's remarkable impartiality—that you would decide our case on the same principle that you do the greater part of the cases that come before you!"

In his religious views Judge Peters was understood to be a Universalist. On one occasion an offender had been convicted before him of two different crimes; when for the first the Judge sentenced him to the State Prison for life, and then for the second for five years more! As the Court was adjourned, Sherman, stepping up to him, said:

"Well, Judge, I am happy to see that you are changing your religious views, at least on one important subject."

"How so—how so?" said the Judge. "I don't understand you."

"Why," said Sherman, "it is plain from your sentence that you believe in punishment after death."

It is but just to the Judge, however, to add that he defended his sentence on the ground that the criminal might be pardoned for the first offense, and in that case would be held for the second.

SEVENTY years ago it was common on Long Island and in Connecticut to give children for names a whole text of Scripture. Thus, Mr. Crabb named a child "Through-much-tribulation-we-enter-into-the-kingdom-of-heaven Crabb." The child went by the name of Tribby. Scores of such names could be cited. The practice of giving long and curious names is not yet out of date. In Saybrook, Connecticut, is a family by the name of Beman, whose children are successively named as follows:

1. Jonathan Hubbard Lubbard Lambard Hunk Dan Dunk Peter Jacobus Lackany Christian Beman.
2. Prince Frederick Henry Jacob Zacheus Christian Beman.
3. Queen Caroline Sarah Rogers Ruhamah Christian Beman.
4. Charity Freeloove Ruth Grace Mercy Truth Faith and Hope and Peace pursue I'll have no more to do for that will go clear through Christian Beman.

"I WANT to report to you some of the experiences of a backwoods young doctor. His patients being of the excessively ignorant class, he gets more fun than fees.

"A few days ago I was called to a house, on a professional visit, where the inmates have a holy horror of 'calamy and laudamy.' While making my way into the good graces of the mother, by fondling upon my knee a certain breechless brat, I noticed a number of small bones attached to a string, and worn by the child as a necklace. Knowing the strange belief in charms that such people sometimes have, I immediately remarked,

"'I see your child, Madam, has had rheumatism.'

"'No, Sir,' says the worthy dame; 'them thar are rattlesnake bones, put thar to make Pete have a easy time a cuttin' his teeth. Last spring, when the boys was a plowin' down in the bottom, they plowed up a powerful big rattlesnake, and I jest tuck him and biled him three days and nights, beginnin' on Friday mornin'. I tuck the bones then and put 'em on a string, as you see thar, and made him wear 'em tel now. I recon, doctor, he wus about as sick a chile as you ever seed when them bones wus put on his neck; he begun to git better right off, and niver has bin sick from that day till now. You spake, doctor, about the rheumaty pains; I never hearn as 'twas good for them, but I expect it mout be, seein' it worked sich a powerful kure on the teething. The best thing as I ever seed tried fur the rheumatiz is to take four pieces of eel-skin, jist as wide as your three fingers, and tie one on both ankles and one on both wrists.'

"I remarked, 'No doubt that is very good.'

"'Yes,' she chimed in, 'I have knowed that to kure when all manner uv doctors' means has failed.'

"Here the conversation took a pleasant turn weather and cropward, affording the young Esculapian an opportunity to make his farewell bow. Just as I was mounting my pony Mrs. B—— sang out, 'Doctor, is this medacine you left for Betsy pisin?' Having assured her of its anti-'pisin' qualities, I rode back home, to await another call of the same kind."

SUBJOINED are a few Irishisms, of actual occurrence, worthy of preservation in the Drawer. They come to us from Pittsburgh:

"A contractor who was building a tunnel on a certain Ohio railroad observed, one morning, that the face of a member of his gang had its surface all spotted with bruises and plasters.

"'Ah! Jimmy,' said he, 'what have you been doin'?"

"'Not varry much, Sur,' answered Jimmy; 'I was jist down at Billy Mulligan's last night, Sur, an' him an' me we had a bit av a discooshen wid sticks!"

"THE same contractor entering his tunnel quietly one day, unobserved by his workmen, owing to the darkness of the hole, overheard one of the party lamenting his hardships since coming to America; drawing, for contrast, a bright sketch of his life in the 'ould country.'

"'Oh!' said the complainer, with a sigh, 'av I wos only bock agin to me father's palish!"

"'Your father's palish, is it?' responded a fellow-workman, with a jolly squint of his eye at the distressed 'noble scion.' 'Sure an' av ye wor there ye moight sthan' on the groun' an' reach yer han' down the chimbley and open the door av it!"

"A COAL-BOAT from Pittsburgh was some years since floating down the Mississippi toward New Orleans. As the crew lolled round in the sun, two of them drifted into a vigorous verbal passage at arms on the Slavery question. The contest waged hotly, and with more fervor of feeling than strength of argument. Finally, to clench his positions, the pro-slavery champion, Sam Stoner, took emphatic ground.

"'I tell you,' said he, 'a nigger's a beast—he hain't no soul! Now I tell you what it is. I kin prove from the Bible that a white man's got a soul, but who can show me any place where it says a nigger's got one?"

"Like many another, Peter Voss, Sam's opponent, knowing the contents of the good book only by hearsay, naturally credited his neighbors with all the Biblical knowledge they claimed, and was consequently staggered by this bold challenge. Big Pat, a blundering Erinite, the butt of the crew, who, while sunning himself at length on a board, had listened to the 'discussion,' now sleepily came to Peter's rescue, by asking,

"'An', Misther Sthoner, if a nager hasn't a sowl, how is it wid the half-an'-halfs?—Have they half sows?"

"Well, by thunder!" said Sam, after pausing a moment to recover from the blow, "I never thought of that before!"

THE following, from Mississippi, is equal to any thing in Arkansas:

"There once resided in the County of L——, in Eastern Mississippi, a young lawyer, whom I will designate as B—— H——, who was remarkable for nothing except his insolence to the Court and his diminutiveness in size, being just five feet and one inch. At a recent term of the circuit court for said county, Judge W—— presiding, the Court, for some discourtesy on the part of B—— H——, imposed a fine of $10 on him, which had been made the judgment of the Court, but remained unpaid; the Judge, proceeding with the business of the term, called the next case in its order—John C. Patterson, vs. Robert Blakeney; E. and C. for plaintiff, and 'W.' for defense.

"JUDGE W——. 'You perceive, gentlemen, that I was counsel for the defendant before I was elected to the office of Judge, and am therefore incompetent to preside in this trial. The cause must be continued, unless the parties can agree to try it before some member of the bar, to be selected by themselves.' (The statute authorized parties to appoint a special Judge to try cases where the Judge presiding is interested.)

"After a short consultation, E——, one of the counsel for plaintiff, addressed the Court: 'If your Honor please, the parties have agreed to call B—— H—— to the bench, to preside on the trial of this cause.'

"JUDGE W——. 'Very well.'

"He retired from the bench, and B—— H—— took the seat with an air of dignity which could find no parallel in the history of jurisprudence.

"B—— H—— (presiding). 'Mr. Sheriff, let us have order in court. Mr. Clerk, remit that fine that Judge W—— imposed on me this morning!

"The Clerk, believing it to be his duty to obey all orders from the bench, promptly entered the order setting the judgment for the fine aside, greatly to the amusement of the bar and the discomfiture of Judge W——. The joke was so good that Judge W—— let the last order remain undisturbed. B—— H—— has since been elected by the people to that office by an overwhelming majority."

"SOME two years since," writes a Missouri lawyer, "while trying a cause of the 'State of Missouri vs. P—— T——,' for breach of the peace—the prosecutor being an Irishman, full blown, and the defendant a German—an Irishman was called as a witness on the part of the prosecution. His national proclivities (seen plainly in the bent of his evidence) were all aroused by the insult to his fellow-countryman, and his testimony was about as follows: 'Ye see, Sir, I was a standen on Mr. Wiles's poorch, and I saw him strick him, and I runs oover to where he was, and when I got there I was sure he was dead, by the way he breathed, Sir!

"LAST night," says the same correspondent, "an Irishman bought a lamp from one of our merchants, and when about to pay for it discovered that he was minus a five-dollar bill which he was certain he had in his pockets a few moments before. Looking around, while searching his pockets for the missing bill, he remarked, in a very dolorous voice, 'And sure, Sur, if I haven't lost it, it's gone intirely, Sur!'"

A NORTH CAROLINA correspondent sends to the Drawer a very striking epitaph from the tombstone of a sailor. The monument is reared "to the Memory of Captain William Harker, born at Beaufort, North Carolina, March 26, 1791; died at Newbern, North Carolina, October 7, 1822, aged 32 years.

"The form that fills this stilly grave
Once tossed on Ocean's roaring wave,
Plunged through its storms without dismay,
And careless weltered in its spray;
Wreck, famine, exile, scatheless bore,
Yet perished on this peaceful shore.

"No tempest whelmed him 'neath the surge,
No wailing sea-bird screamed his dirge;
But fever's silent, hidden flame,
Consumed by stealth his hardy frame;
And softly as an infant's breath
He sank into the arms of death.

"The weather-beaten bark no more
Hangs shivering on a leeward shore;
But, wafted by a favoring wind,
Life's stormy sea hath left behind;
And into port securely passed,
Hath dropp'd his anchor there at last."

AN Eastern correspondent says: "I send you the following inscription found on the grave-stone of a person that, in his lifetime, had been a carpenter, singer, and a grafter on fruit-trees; and who in his last moments was neglected by his wife, and not receiving that attention in his sickness which some of his relatives thought he deserved, they wrote the following on his grave-stone, which may now be seen in the grave-yard of Dorchester, Massachusetts (the North Cemetery):

"Long fifty years full well he wrought
On buildings, fruit-trees, and the song;
With age, infirmity was brought,
He pined, neglected—was that wrong?"

ANOTHER correspondent writes: "I copied the following, while on a survey up the Kennebec, from an old grave-stone near Fort Halifax, in the vicinity of Waterville, Maine:

"Here lies the body of Richard Thomas, an Englishman by birth. A Whig of '76. By occupation a cooper. Now food for worms. Like an old rum-punchon, marked, numbered, and shooked. He will be raised and finished by his Creator in the last day.

"America, my adopted country, my best advice to you is this—Take care of your liberties."

"Near him lies his wife, upon whose tombstone is the following:

"How loved, how valued, avails thee not,
To whom related, or by whom begot:
A heap of dust alone remains of thee."

Two epitaphs from a grave-yard in New Jersey are added to the growing collection in the Drawer:

"She suddenly entered into rest,
A husband and two babes she left;
Her mother mourns, her friends weep,
While she in Jesus is asleep."

"Meet for the fellowship above,
He heard the call, Arise, my love!
I come, his dying looks replied,
And lamb-like as his Lord he died."

"THE Drawer is a great receptacle for quaint epitaphs, yet here is one I have never seen in print.

It is engraved upon a rough slab not a hundred miles from Philadelphia:

"Touch not this stone with pick or spade,
For here it is that I am laid;
'Tis here I was by Cupid smitten—
'Tis here I first received the mitten:
And, whether I did wrong or right,
I left this world Miss Blake to spite."

"ONE found in St. Philip's church-yard, Birmingham, probably over some stray son of the 'Emerald Isle.' The italics are my own in all:

"O, cruel Death! how could'st thou be so unkind
As to take her before, and leave me behind?
Thou should'st have taken both of us, if either,
Which would have been a comfort to the survivor."

"ON a tombstone in one of the cemeteries at Florence, Italy; said to have been translated by the sculptor, Greenough:

"Here lies a Cardinal who wrought
Both good and evil in his time;
The good he did was good for naught:
Not so the evil—that was prime."

"In Chatham church-yard, by a husband on the death of his wives:

"ON THE FIRST.

"The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

"ON THE SECOND.

"I called upon the Lord, and he heard me, and delivered me out of all my troubles."

"AMONG the remarkable sayings of small children, I think one uttered by a young daughter of mine is worthy of a place. When a little more than three years old she was visiting her grandmother, and having had a piece of cake and eaten it, she asked for more. Her grandmother said, 'No, you have had plenty; and "enough is enough."'

"The little girl at once replied, 'Well then, grandma, "Not enough is not enough;" and was immediately rewarded with a large slice."

"A BRIGHT little fellow, stopping with his parents and grandfather, some time ago, at a fashionable hotel, was not a little surprised at the display of glittering ware upon the table. The silver forks were a special object of curiosity—they are plentiful now where he lives. Imagine the 'feelinks' of the family when youngster called to his grandfather, sitting at the opposite end of a well-filled table,

"Oh, grandpa! grandpa! look here!" (holding a fork aloft, and raising his voice) 'tin forks, with SPOON HANDLES!"

"I READ your anecdotes of children," says a correspondent in Panama, "with interest, and take the liberty of sending you one:

"A few evenings ago a party of us were sitting on the sidewalk, enjoying the delightful breeze which our evenings here always afford, when a young five-year old came trotting along and joined us. Addressing one of us, he inquired, 'Mr. Brown, where's your little boy?' 'Why, in bed, of course, where you ought to be at this hour,' replied Mr. B. 'Ah! yes, I know,' says Charlie; 'but our clock's stopped, and ma says I may always sit up till it strikes eight!'"

DURING the last Presidential campaign, at the Wide-Awake celebration upon the occasion of Governor Seward's visit to Chicago, as the procession was passing along Michigan Avenue, some few of the Wide-Awakes were observed marching without having their lamps lighted; whereupon a little girl, about four years old, was heard to exclaim to her mother, "Oh! ma, see, there are the foolish virgins too! Just see! they didn't put any oil in their lamps."

"OF the many precocious children whose youthful witticisms have been handed down to posterity through the medium of your invaluable Drawer—the most interesting part of the Magazine to fond mammas—not one, I believe, has hailed from the Badger State. To show the world that Wisconsin wives can raise smart children, as their farmer husbands raise the largest grain-crop of any State in the Union, witness the following:

"My little four-year old, whose amiable weakness is pie, on being put to bed a few evenings since, and requested, as usual, to say his prayers, on coming to the part, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' stopped, and thinking a moment, said, 'Ma, why must I pray for bread, when I'd rather have him give me pie?'"

THE Sandwich Islanders read the Drawer, and write for it too. Here is the last letter from that quarter:

"HILO, HAWAII, August 22, 1860.

"DEAR DRAWER,—You are full of fun, and have often caused me to laugh immoderately. We have some original characters out here, and funny scenes often occur in our courts. The following may, perhaps, be found worthy to appear in the Drawer.

"Old Jack Wood,' who has resided at the islands upward of thirty years, having occasion to visit the woods near his place one day, came upon a party of natives, who were in the act of skinning one of his bullocks which they had shot, and not being able to come to terms with the thieves, returned home and entered a complaint against them before the District Justice. The parties being convicted by the Justice, appealed to the Circuit Court, which obliged Jack to come all the way to Hilo as a witness. On being called by the District-Attorney, Jack came forward, evidently much abashed, and took the oath. He seemed to feel the whole responsibility of the case, and being determined to do his best, took off his coat, rolled up his sleeves, and commenced a vigorous speech to the jury, but was soon stopped by the Court, and informed that he was not expected to address the jury, but simply answer the questions that might be put to him by the counsel. He was considerably nettled by the interruption, and answered pettishly.

"DISTRICT-ATTORNEY. 'Mr. Wood, tell the Court and jury whether you saw the defendants skinning one of your bullocks?'

"JACK. 'Yes, I did.'

"DISTRICT-ATTORNEY. 'Were there any other persons with you at the time?'

"JACK. 'Yes, there was.'

"DISTRICT-ATTORNEY. 'How many?'

"JACK. 'There was five of us.'

"DISTRICT-ATTORNEY. 'Who were they?'

"JACK. 'Wa'al, there was myself, my wife, my daughter, and the two donkeys!'

"The explosion of laughter that followed this statement made further proceedings impossible for some minutes."

FIGURES 1 AND 2.—VISITING COSTUME AND GIRL'S DRESS.

WE illustrate a dress designed for a DINNER or VISITING TOILET. While it may be made of any chosen material or colors, it is specially suited for plain fabrics of a single color. The corsage is high, with a somewhat rounded waist, and having revers or lappets; it is open one half its depth. The sleeves are funnel-shaped, cut open, the outside portions at the bottom being turned up and held in place by a tasseled cord, brought through, lacing the slashing of the upper sleeve. Under the opening made by the slashing a piece of the same is placed. The corsage is similarly laced, and adorned with a rosette passanterie. The skirt is set on in wide plaits. For in-door wear, open lace under-sleeves are worn; but for out-doors closed under-sleeves, as in the illustration, are preferred. The coiffure is of pearl netting.

In the GIRL'S COSTUME the jacket is of Magenta-colored velvet, lined with primrose-colored taffeta, the skirt being of merino to match.

In the BOY'S DRESS the jacket is of blue velvet, faced with a false canary-colored taffeta vest, trimmed with braid to match. The pants are light blue, embroidered at the sides.

The UNDER-SLEEVES are of lace, gathered in lozenges, and confined by velvet buttons to match the color of the dress.

headway. Tents were shivered and torn to shreds all along the wayside. I saw one party sitting at breakfast, with nothing but the four posts which had originally sustained their tent and a few fragments of canvas flapping from them as a protection against the wind. Nothing could withstand its terrific force. Cabins with bush tops were unroofed; frame shanties were rent asunder, and the boards flew about like feathers; the air was filled with grit and drift, striking the face as if the great guns, which are sometimes said to blow, were loaded with duck-shot. Nor did the wind confine itself to one channel. It ranged up hill and down hill, raking the enemy fore and aft. In one place two tents were torn up, as one might say, by the roots, and carried off bodily to the top of the mountain; in another, half a dozen might be seen traveling down hill, at the rate of forty miles an hour, toward the Flowery Diggings. What became of all the unfortunate wretches who were thus summarily deprived of their local habitations I never learned. Most likely they sought refuge in the coyote holes, which, in fact, appeared to be untenanted; for I don't think coyotes could live long in such a country.

A short distance beyond Gold Hill a trail strikes off to the right, which is said to cut off four or five miles of the distance to Carson City. That would be a considerable gain to a traveler making his escape from Virginia City, and whose every step was attended with extreme physical suffering, to say nothing of the mental disquietude occasioned by his proximity to that place. Besides, it avoided the "Devil's Gate," of which I had also an intense dread. What hordes of dark and inexorable imps might be lying in wait there, with pitchforks to impale a poor fellow upon, and kegs of blasting powder to blow him up; what accounts might have to be rendered of one's stewardship at head-quarters; what particular kind of passport, sanded over with brimstone and stamped with a cloven foot, might be demanded—it was not possible to conjecture. At all events, it was safer to incur no risk. The old adage of the "longest way round" did not occur to me.

I took the trail, and was soon out of sight of Gold City. The mountains were covered with snow, not very deep, but soft and slippery. In my weak state, with a racking rheumatism and the prostrating effects of the arsenic water, the labor of making headway against the fierce gusts of wind and keeping the trail was very severe. Every few hundred yards I had to lie down in the snow and await some relief from the paroxysms of pain. After an hour or two I reached a labyrinth of hills, in which the trail became lost by the melting of the snow. I still had some idea of the general direction, and kept on. My progress, however, was very slow, and at times so difficult that it required considerable effort of mind to avoid stopping altogether, and "taking the chances," as they say, in this agreeable region. Now all this may seem very absurd, as compared with the sufferings endured by Colonel Frémont in the Rocky Mountains, and doubtless is, in some respects. As, for instance: I was not shut up in a gorge of the mountains, a thousand miles from the habitations of man; I was not in a state of starvation, though thin enough for a starved man in all conscience; I was not at all likely to remain in any one position, however isolated, without being "spotted" by some enterprising miner in search of indications. But then, on the other hand, I was thoroughly dredged with arsenic, plumbago, copperas, and corrosive sublimate, and had neither mule nor "burro"—not even a woolly horse to carry me. Does any body pretend to say that the renowned Arctic explorers ever encountered such a series of hardships as this? Four or five months of perpetual night, with the thermometer 80° below zero, may be uncomfortable; but then the adventurer in the Polar regions has the advantage of being the furthest possible distance from certain other regions—say, from Virginia City.

About noon I came to the conclusion, that however willing the spirit might be the flesh had done its best, and was now quite used up; so I stretched myself on the snow under a cedar bush, and resolved to await what assistance Providence might send me. I was not long there when a voice in the distance caught my ear. I rose and called. In a few minutes a mysterious figure emerged from the bushes at the mouth of a cañon a few hundred feet below. I beckoned to him to come up. The singular appearance and actions of the man attracted my attention.

His face was nearly black with dirt, and his hair was long and shaggy. On his head he wore a tattered cap, tied around the chin with a blue cotton handkerchief. A tremendous blue nose, a pair of green goggles, and boots extending up to his hips, completed the oddity of his appearance. At first he approached me rapidly; but at the distance of about fifty yards he halted, as if uncertain what to do. He then put down his pack, and began to search for something in the pockets of his coat—a knife, perhaps, or a pistol. Could it be possible this fellow was a robber, who had descried me from the opposite mountain, and was now bent upon murder? If so, it would be as well to bring the matter to an issue at once. I was unarmed—having even lost my penknife by reason of a rent in my pocket. There were desperate characters in this wilderness, who would think nothing of killing a man for his money; and although I had only about forty dollars left, that fact could not possibly be known to this marauder. His appearance, to be sure, was not formidable; but then one should not be too hasty in judging by appearances. For all I knew he might be the—Old Gentleman himself on a tour of inspection from Virginia City.

"Hallo, friend!" said I, assuming a conciliatory tone, "where are you bound?"

Upon this he approached a little closer. I soon perceived that he was a German Jew, who had either lost his way or was prospecting for silver. As he drew near, he manifested some signs of trepidation—evidently being afraid I would rob him of his pack, in which there was probably some jewelry or old clothes. It is hardly necessary for me to say that I had no intention of robbing him. I had not come to that yet. There was no telling to what straits I might be reduced; but as long as I had a dollar in my pocket, I was determined to avoid highway robbery. Besides, it was beyond my strength at this particular crisis—a fact which the Jew seemed to recognize, for he now approached confidently. His first exclamation, on reaching the spot where I stood, was—

“Dank Gott! Ish dis de trail?”

“Where are you bound?”

“To Carson. I pe going to Carson, and I pe losht for six hours. Mein Gott!

It ish an awful country. You know the way?”

“Of course. You don’t suppose I’d be here if I didn’t know the way?”

“Dat is zo.”

“Come on, friend; I’m going in that direction. But don’t walk very fast—I’m sick.”

“Zo? Was is de matter?”

“Poisoned.”

“Mein Gott! mein Gott! Das is awful.”

“Very—it makes a fellow so weak.”

“Mein Gott! Did dey poison you for your money?” And here the Jew put his hands behind him to see if his pack was safe.

“Oh no, it was only the water—arsenic and copperas.”

“Zo!”

This explanation apparently relieved him of a very unpleasant train of thought, for he now became quite lively and talkative. As we trudged along, chatting sociably on various matters of common interest, it occurred to me from time to time that I had seen this man’s face before. The idea grew upon me. It was not a matter of particular importance, and yet I could not banish it. His voice, too, was familiar. Certainly there was something about him that possessed an uncommon interest.

“Friend,” said I, “it occurs to me I’ve seen you before.”

“Zo? I dink de same.”

Some moments elapsed before I could fix upon the occasion or the place. All at once the truth flashed upon me. It was Strawberry Flat! I had slept with the man! This was the identical wretch who had robbed me of my stockings! In the excitement produced by the discovery and the recollection of my blistered feet, I verily believe, had I been armed with a broadsword or battle-axe, after the fashion of Brian de Bois Guilbert, I would have cloven him in twain.

“Ha! I remember; it was at Strawberry! You slept with me one night,” said I, in a tone of suppressed passion.

“Das is it! Das is it!” cried the Jew. “I shlept mit you at Sthrawberry!”

The effrontery of the villain was remarkable. Probably he would even acknowledge the theft.

“Friend,” said I, calmly and deliberately, “did you miss a pair of woolen stockings in the morning about the time you started?”

"Look here!" quoth the wretch, suddenly halting, "was dey yours?"

"They were!"

At this the abominable rascal doubled himself up as if in a convulsion, shook all over, and turned almost black in the face. It was his mode of laughing.

"Well, I daught dey vos yours! I daught to myself, mein Gott! how dat fellow will shwear when he find his sthockings gone!"

And here the convulsions were so violent that he fairly rolled over in the snow, and kicked as if in the agonies of death. It was doubtless very funny to rob a man of his valuable property and cause him days of suffering from blistered feet; but I was unable to see any wit in it till the Jew regained his breath and said:

"Vel, vel! I must sthand dhreat for dat! I know'd you'd shwear when you missed 'em. Vel, vel! das is 'goot! Here's a flask of first-rate brandy—dhrink!"

I took a small pull—medicinally, of course. From that moment my forgiveness was complete. I harbored not a particle of resentment against the man, though I never again could have entertained implicit confidence in his integrity.

In due time we reached the banks of Carson River at a place called Dutch John's, distant about four miles from Carson City. I have an impression that John was an emigrant from Salt Lake. He had brought with him a woman to whom he was "sealed," and was the father of a thriving little family of "cotton-heads." Some of the stage-drivers who were in the habit of taking a "smile" at John's persuaded him that he was now among a moral and civilized people, and must get married. To be "sealed" to a woman was not enough. He must be spliced according to Church and State, otherwise he would wake up some fine morning and find himself hanging to a tree. John had heard that the Californians were terrible fellows, and had a mortal dread of Vigilance Committees. The stage-drivers were rather a clever set of fellows, and no way strict in morals; but then they might hang him for fun, and what would be fun to them would be death to him. There was some charm in living an immoral life, to be sure; yet it would not do to enjoy that disreputable course at the expense of a disjointed neck. On the whole, John took the advice of the stage-drivers, and got married. Next day he rode through the streets of Carson, boasting of the adroit manner in which he had escaped the vengeance of the Vigilance Committee. I am happy to add that he is now a respectable member of the community. Not that I recommend his whisky. I consider it infinitely worse than any ever manufactured out of tobacco-juice, Cayenne-pepper, and whale-oil at Port Townsend, Washington Territory, where the next worst whisky in the world is used as the common beverage of the inhabitants.

Leaving John's we came to the plain. Here the sand was heavy, and the walking very monotonous and tiresome. This part of Carson Valley is a complete desert. Scarcely a blade of grass was to be seen. Shriveled sage-bushes scattered here and there over the sand were the only signs of vegetation. Even the rabbits and sage-hens had abandoned the country. All the open spaces resembled the precincts of a slaughter-house. Cattle lay dead in every direction, their skulls, horns, and carcasses giving an exceedingly desolate aspect to the scene. Near the river it was a perfect mass of corruption. Hundreds upon hundreds of rotting carcasses and bleached skeletons dotted the banks or lay in great mounds, where they had gathered for mutual warmth, and dropped down from sheer starvation. The smell filled the air for miles. Thousands of buzzards had gathered in from all parts to the great carnival of flesh—presenting a disgusting spectacle as they sat gorged and stupefied on the foul masses of carrion, they scarcely deigning to move as we passed. In the sloughs bordering on the river oxen, cows, and horses were buried up to the necks where they had striven to get to the water, but from excess of weakness had failed to get back to the solid earth. Some were dead, others were dying. Around the latter the buzzards were already hovering, scarcely awaiting the extinction of life before they plunged in their ravenous beaks and tore out the eyes from the sockets. On the dry plain many hundreds of cattle had fallen from absolute starvation. The winter had been terribly severe, and the prolonged snows had covered what little vegetation there was. Those of the settlers who had saved hay enough for their stock found it more profitable to sell it at $300 a ton and let the stock die. Horses, oxen, and cows shared the same fate. Many lingered out the winter on the few stunted shrubs to be found on the foot-hills, and died just as the grass began to appear. It was a hard country for animals of all kinds. Those that were retained for the transportation of goods were little better than living skeletons, yet the amount of labor put upon them was extraordinary. In Virginia City it was almost impossible to procure a grain of barley for love or money. Enormous prices were offered for any kind of horse-feed, by men who had come over on good horses, and who wished to keep them alive. At the rate of five dollars a day it required but a short time for the best horse to "eat his head off." Hay was sold in little wisps of a few pounds at sixty cents a pound, barley at seventy-five cents, and but little to be had even at those extravagant rates. A friend of mine from San Francisco, who arrived on a favorite horse, could get nothing in the way of feed but bread, and he paid fifty cents a loaf for a few scanty loaves about the size of biscuits to keep the poor animal alive. It was truly pitiable to see fine horses starving to death. The severity of the weather and the want of shelter were terribly severe on animals of every kind. Good horses could scarcely be sold for a tenth part of their cost—though the distance across the mountain could be performed under ordinary circumstances in two days. But where all was rush and confusion there was little time to devote to the calls of humanity. Men were crazy after claims. Every body had his fortune to make in a few months. The business of jockeying had not grown into full vogue, except among a few who were always willing to sell at very high prices and buy at very low—a remarkable fact connected with dealers in horse-flesh.

The walk across Carson Valley through the heavy sand had exhausted what little of my strength remained, and I was about to give up the ghost for the third time, when a wagoner from Salt Lake gave me a lift on his wagon and enabled me to reach the town. Here my excellent friend Van Winkle gave me another chance in his bunk, and in the course of a few days I was quite recruited.

The courteous reader who has followed me so far will doubtless be disappointed that I have given so little practical information about the mines. Touching that I can only say, as Macaulay said of Sir Horace Walpole, the constitution of my mind is such that whatever is great appears to me little, and whatever is little seems great. The serious pursuits of life I regard as a monstrous absurdity on the part of mankind—especially rooting in the ground for money. The Washoe mines are nothing more than squirrel-holes on a large scale—the difference being that squirrels burrow in the ground because they live there, and men because they want to live somewhere else. I deny and repudiate the idea that any man really has any necessity for money. He only thinks he does—which is a most unaccountable error.

But then you may have some notion of going to Washoe yourself—just to try your luck. Good friend, let me advise you—don't go. Stay where you are. Devote the remainder of your life to your legitimate business, your wife, and your baby. Don't go to Washoe. If you have no money, or but little, you had better go to—any other place. It is no retreat for a poor man. The working of silver mines requires capital. A poor man can not make wages in Washoe. If you are rich and wish to speculate—a word in your ear.

"The undersigned is prepared to sell at reasonable prices" [this I quote from one of my advertisements] "valuable claims in the following companies:

The Dead Broke,	The Fool Hardy,
The Rip Snorter,	The Ousel Owl,
The Love's Despair,	The Grab Game,
The Ragged End,	The Riff-Raff.

The titles to all these claims are perfect, and the purchaser of any claim will have no difficulty whatever in holding on to it."

I hope it will not be inferred from the desponding tone of my narrative that I deny the existence of silver in Washoe, for certainly nothing is farther from my intention. That there is silver in the Comstock Lead, and in great quantities, is a well-established fact. How many thousands of tons may be there, it is impossible for me to say, but there must be an immense quantity—beyond all calculation in fact, as the ore is scattered all around the mines in great heaps, and every heap is said to be worth a fortune if it would only bear transportation to San Francisco at an expense of $600 per ton. The best of it is sorted out and packed off on mules every day or two, partly to get the silver out of it, and partly to show the speculators in San Francisco that the mines have not yet given out. The yield per ton is estimated at from $1200 to $2500. During the time of my visit to the mines but little work could be done on account of the number of speculators who were engaged in trying to sell out, few of them being disposed to engage in the slow operation of mining. Some said it was on account of the weather, but I suspect the weather had very little to do with it. The following is a rough estimate of the Companies who claim to hold in the Comstock vein:

Besides about forty miles of outside claims, said to be on a direct line with the Comstock, and to be richer if any thing than the original vein.

When I left, the prices asked for a share in any of the above companies ranged from $200 to $2000 per running foot, and it was alleged that the purchaser could follow his running foot through all its dips, spurs, and angles. Some of these companies numbered as high as two or three hundred. I know a gentleman who sold out all his assets and invested the proceeds, $800, in 8 inches of the Central, and another who mortgaged his property to secure five feet in the Billy Choller. These gentlemen are, in all probability, at this moment worth a million of dollars each.

In short, the whole country looks black, blue, and white with silver, and where there is no silver there are croppings which indicate sulphurets or copperas.

HONEST MINER.

The Flowery Diggings were in full flower; and if they have since failed to realize the expectations that were then formed of them it must be because the Mammoth lead gave out, or Lady Bryant did not sustain her reputation.

To the honest miner I have a word to say. You are a free-born American citizen—that is, unless you were born in Ireland, which is so much the better, or in Germany, which is better still. You live by the sweat of your brow. You are God's noblest work—an honest man. The free exercise of the right of suffrage is guaranteed to you by the glorious Constitution of our common country. Upon your vote may depend the fate of millions of American freemen, nay, fate of Freedom itself, and the ultimate destiny of mankind. I do not appeal to you on the present occasion for any personal favor. Thank Fortune, I am beyond that. But in the name of common sense, in the name of our beloved State, in the name of the great Continental Congress, I do appeal to you if you have a claim in California HOLD ON TO IT! Don't go pirouetting about the country in search of better claims, abandoning ills that you are well acquainted with, and flying to others that you know nothing about. If you do, you may find it "a gloomy prospect."

"A GLOOMY PROSPECT."

I was now, so to say, permanently established at Carson City. In other words, it was questionable whether I should ever be able to get away without resorting to the intervention of friends, which was an alternative too revolting for human nature to bear. The only resource left was "The Agency." I had forgotten all about it hitherto, and now resolved to call at the Express office, and see what fortune might be in store for me. Surely the advertisement must have elicited various orders of a lucrative nature. Nor was I disappointed. A package of letters awaited me. Without violating any confidential obligations, I may say, in general terms, that the contents and my answers were pretty much as follows:

A.—Wishes to know what the prospect would be in Washoe for a young man of the medical profession. Has a small stock of drugs, and proposes to engage in the practice of medicine, and at the same time keep a drug store.

Answer.—Doctors are already a drug in Washoe. Brandy, Whisky, and Gin are the only medicines taken. Bring over a lot of good liquors, prescribe them at two bits a dose, and you will do well. Charge, $10—please remit.

B.—Has about twenty head of fine American cows. Would like to sell them, and wishes a contract made in advance.

Answer.—Could find nobody who wanted to pay cash for cows. Money is scarce and cows are plenty. Have sold your cows, however, for the following valuable claims: 25 feet in the Root-Hog-or-Die; 40 feet in the Let-her-Rip; 50 feet in the Gone Case; and 100 feet in the You Bet. Charge, $25, which please remit by Express.

C.—Would like to know if a school could be established in Washoe with any reasonable prospect of success. Has been engaged in the business for some years, and is qualified to teach the ordinary branches of a good English education, or, if desired, Greek and Latin.

Answer.—No time to waste in learning here, and no use for the English language, much less Greek or Latin. A pious missionary might find occupation. One accustomed to mining could develop what indications there are of a spiritual nature among the honest miners. No charge.

D.—Wishes to invest about $1500 in some good claims. Has three or four friends who will go in with him. Is willing to honor a draft for that amount. Hopes I will strike something rich.

Answer.—Have bought a thousand feet for you in the very best silver-mines yet discovered. They are all in and about the Devil's Gate. Several of them are supposed to be in the Comstock Ledge. They are worth $50,000 this moment; but if you can sell them in S. F. for an advance of $2000 do so by all means, as the silver may give out. Charge, $400 or nothing.

E.—Has been in bad health for some time, and thinks a trip across the mountains would do him good. Please give him some information about the road and manner of living. How about lodgings and fare? Is troubled with the bronchitis, and wishes to know how the climate would be likely to affect it.

Answer.—Hire a mule at Placerville, and if you are not too far gone the trip may benefit your bronchial tubes. The road is five feet deep by 130 miles long, and is composed chiefly of mountains, snow, and mud. Lodgings—from one to two hundred lodgers in each room, and from two to four bedfellows in each bed. Will not be troubled long with the bronchitis. The water will probably make an end of you in about two weeks. Charge—nothing.

F.—Is a lawyer by profession, and desires to establish a business in some new country. Thinks there will be some litigation at Washoe in connection with the mines. Wishes to be informed on that point, and would be obliged for any general information.

Answer.—About every tenth man in Washoe is a lawyer. There will doubtless be abundance of litigation there before long. Would advise you to go to some other new country, say Pike's Peak, for instance. Respecting things generally, Miller and Rodgers are going up and whisky down. Charge, 50 cents. Please remit.

G.—Thinks of taking his family over to Washoe. How are the accommodations for women and children? And can servants be had?

Answer.—Keep on thinking about that or something else, but don't attempt to carry your thoughts into effect. If you do, your wife must wear the—excuse me—she must wear male apparel. For accommodations, yourself and family might possibly be able to hire one bunk two feet by six; and you might seduce a Digger Indian to remain in your domestic employ by giving him $2 in cash and a gallon of whisky per day. Charge—nothing.

H.—Has a house and lot worth about $10,000. Would like to trade it for some good mining claims. Can not sell the property for cash on account of a difficulty about the title; but this you need not mention, as it can probably be adjusted for a reasonable consideration.

Answer.—Have traded your house and lot for 100 feet in the Pine Nut, 50 do. in the Ousel Owl, 50 do. in the Salmon Tail, 25 in the Roaring Jack, and 25 in the Amador. These are all good claims, and it will make no difference about the title to your house and lot, as each claim in the above-mentioned companies has also several titles to it. Charge, $500. Please remit.

I.—Is in the stove business, and understands that cast-iron stoves bring a high price in Washoe. Has some notion of sending over a consignment. Please state expenses and prospect of success.

Answer.—Stoves are very valuable in Washoe, especially cooking-stoves. It costs from 25 to 50 cents per pound to get them over on mule-back, at which prices they can be sold for claims, but not for money. If you have any very young stoves that can be planted, as the Schildbergers planted the salt, a good crop of them can be sold. Charge—nothing.

J.—Is inventor of a process for extracting silver out of the crude ore, without smelting. The machinery is simple, and would easily bear transportation. Could the patent-right be sold in Washoe?

Answer.—Nothing is more needed here than just such an invention as yours. Bring it over by all means. If you can extract silver out of the general average of the ore found here, either by smelting or otherwise, you will do a splendid business. Charge, $50. Please remit.

K.—Understands that lumber is $800 a thousand in Virginia City. Can be delivered at the wharf in San Francisco from the Mendocino Mills for about $20 a thousand. Would it be practicable to get any quantity of it over, so as to make the speculation profitable?

Answer.—You are correctly informed as to the value of lumber in Washoe. A balloon might be constructed to carry over a small lot; but in case you found that mode of transportation too expensive, I know of no other way than to remove a portion of the Sierra Nevada Mountains in the rear of Placerville, or run a tunnel through underneath. It is possible that the price of labor might be an obstacle to the success of either of these plans, in which event, if you can contract to put one board on the back of each man leaving San Francisco he may be able to earn his board, and you may be able to get your lumber over cheap. Charge, $25. Please remit.

I have thus given an average specimen of the letters that came pouring in upon me by every mail. It kept me busy, as may well be supposed, to attend to the numerous requests made by my correspondents; but the trouble was, no money came. There was a great deal, to be sure, for future collection, and as long as that was due it could not be lost by any injudicious speculation. It was some consolation, therefore, to reflect upon the large amount of capital that had accrued in the various operations of the Agency.

At this crisis, when fortune had fairly begun to smile, the weather changed again, and for days it stormed and snowed incessantly, covering up the whole valley, and blocking up every trail. A relapse of rheumatism and my poison-malady now seized me with renewed virulence. I had scarcely any rest by night or day, and soon saw that to remain would be a sure way of securing a claim to at least six feet of ground in the vicinity of Carson. The extraordinary number of persons who had invested in silver mines, and who were anxious to sell out in San Francisco, suggested the idea of changing my Agency to that locality. I therefore notified the public that there was a rare opportunity of selling out their claims to the best advantage; and it was not long before I was freighted down with "indications," powers of attorney, deeds, and bills of sale.

As soon as the weather permitted I set forth on my journey homeward, taking the stage to Genoa, in the hope of finding a horse or mule there upon which to cross the mountains. It was doubtful whether the trail was yet open; but a thaw had set in, and the prospect was that it would be practicable to get over in a few days. The stage from Genoa to Woodford's had been discontinued, in consequence of the expense of feeding the horses. All the saddle trains had left before the late snow, and there was not an animal of any kind to be had except by purchase—an alternation for which I was not prepared.

In this unfortunate state of affairs there was nothing left but to try it again on foot. It was with great difficulty that I could walk at all, much less carry my blankets and the additional weight of a heavy bundle of "croppings." The prospect of remaining at Genoa, however, was too gloomy to be thought of. So I sold my blankets for a night's lodging and set out the next morning for Woodford's. By dint of labor and perseverance I accomplished about eight miles that day. It was dark night when I reached a small farm-house on the road-side. Here a worthy couple lived, who gave me comfortable lodgings, and cooked up such a luxurious repast of broiled chicken, toast, and tea, that I determined, if practicable, to remain a day or two, in order to regain my strength for the trip across the mountain.

The kindness and hospitality of these excellent people had the desired effect. In two days I was ready to proceed. Fortunately an ox-wagon was going to Woodford's for lumber, and I contracted with the driver, a good-humored negro, to give me a lift there for the sum of fifty cents.

I had the pleasure of meeting several San Francisco friends on the road, and gave them agreeable tidings of the mines. The trail had just been opened. A perfect torrent of adventurers came pouring over, forming an almost unbroken line all the way from Placerville. By this time the spring was well advanced and the excitement was at its height. The news from below was, that the whole State would soon be depopulated. Every body was coming—women, children and all. Of course I wished them luck, but it was a marvel to me what they would do when they reached Washoe. Already there were eight or ten thousand people there, and not one in fifty had any thing to do or could get employment for board and lodging. Companies were leaving every day for More's Lake and Walker's River, and the probability was that there would be considerable distress if not absolute suffering. But it was useless to talk. Every adventurer must have a look at the diggings for himself. There must be luck in store for him if for nobody else. For my part I had taken a look and was satisfied.

The ox-team traveled very slowly, so that there was a good opportunity of seeing people pass both ways. The difference in the expression of the incoming and the outgoing was very remarkable; being about the difference between a man with fifty dollars in his pocket and one who wished to borrow that amount. There was that canny air of confidence about the former which betokens the possession of some knowledge touching the philosopher's stone not shared by mankind generally. About the latter there was a mingled expression of sadness and sarcasm as if they were rather inclined to the opinion that some people had not yet seen the elephant.

As my ox-carriage crept along uneasily over the rocky road, I was hailed from behind, "Hello dare! Sthop!" It was my friend the Jew again! I had lost sight of him in Carson, and now by some fatality he was destined to be my companion again.

"Mein Gott! I'm tired valking. Can't you give me a lift?" The driver was willing provided I had no objection. Now I had freely forgiven this man for the robbery of my stockings. I was not uncharitable enough to refuse help to a tired wayfarer; yet I had a serious objection to his company under existing circumstances. His boots were nearly worn out, and mine had but recently been purchased in Carson. If this fellow could embezzle my stockings and afterward unblushingly confess the act, what security could I have on the journey for the safety of my boots? I knew if he once started in with me he would never relinquish his claim to my company until we reached Placerville; for the fellow was rather of a sociable turn, and liked to talk. It seemed best, therefore, under all circumstances, to have a distinct understanding at once. The treaty was soon negotiated. On my part it was stipulated that Israel should ride to Woodford's on the ox-wagon, provided he paid his own fare; that we should cross the mountain together for mutual protection, provided he would deposit in my hands his watch or a $10 gold piece, as security for the safety of my boots; and, finally, that he would bind himself by the most solemn obligations of honor not to steal both the security and the boots. To all of which the Jew assented with one of those internal convulsions which betokened great satisfaction in the arrangement. The watch was covered with pewter, as I discovered when he handed it to me; but I had no doubt it was worth eight or ten dollars. Besides, the treaty made no mention of the quality of the watch. It might possibly be an excellent time-piece, and at all events seemed to be worth a pair of boots.

Toward evening we arrived at Woodford's. Between two and three hundred travelers from the other side of the mountain had already gotten in, and it was represented that there was a line of pedestrians all the way over to Strawberry. The rush for supper was tremendous. Not even the famous Heenan and Sayers contest could compare with it, for here every body went in—or at least tried to get in. At the sixth round I succeeded in securing a favorable position, and when the battle commenced was fortunate enough to be crushed into a seat.

In the way of sleeping there was a general spread-out up stairs. By assuming a confidential tone with the proprietor I contrived to get a mattress and a pair of blankets. The Jew slept alongside on his pack, with a covering of loose coats. Nature's balmy restorer quickly put an end to all the troubles of the day, notwithstanding the incessant noise kept up throughout the night.

In the morning I awoke much refreshed. It was about seven o'clock and time to start. I turned to arouse my friend Israel, but to my surprise found that he had already taken his departure. A horrible suspicion seized me. Had he also taken— Yes! of course! my boots were gone too! And the security? The watch? I looked under my pillow. Miserable wretch! he had also taken the watch. I might have known it! I was a fool for trusting him. When I picked up the old pair of boots bequeathed to me as a token of remembrance by this depraved man—when I held them up to the light and examined them critically—when I reflected upon the journey before me, it was enough to bring tears to the sternest human eye.

No matter! I would catch the dastardly wretch on the trail. If ever I laid hands upon him again, so help me— But what is the use of swearing. No man ever caught another in this world with such a pair of boots on his feet—and here I examined them again—never! One might as well attempt to walk in a pair of condemned fire-buckets.

There was no help for it but to await some chance of getting over on horseback. Fortunately, a saddle-train which had passed down to Genoa during the previous day returned a little after daylight. For the sum of $30, cash in advance, I secured an unoccupied horse—the poorest animal perhaps ever ridden by mortal man. There is no good reason that I am aware of why people engaged in the horse-business should always select for my use the refuse of their stock ; but such has invariably been their practice. I have never yet been favored with a horse that was not lame, halt, or blind, or otherwise physically afflicted.

I had not ridden more than a mile from Woodford's before I discovered that the miserable hack upon which I was mounted traveled diagonally—like a lugger beating against a head-wind. His fore feet were well enough—they traveled on the trail ; but his hind feet were continually undertaking to luff up a little to windward. When it is borne in mind that the trail was over a bank of snow from eight to ten feet deep, and not more than a foot wide, the inconvenience of that mode of locomotion will at once be perceived. Every few hundred yards the hind feet got off the trail, and went down with a sudden lurch that kept me in constant apprehension of being buried alive in the snow. Another serious difficulty was, that my horse, owing perhaps to the defect in his hind legs, had no capacity for short turns ; so that whenever the trail suddenly diverged from its direct course he invariably brought up against a rock, stump, or bank of snow.

I appealed to the captain or commander of the train to give me a better animal, but he assured me positively this was the very best in the whole lot ; and that I would find him peculiarly adapted to mountain travel, where it was often an advantage for an animal to hold on to an upper trail with his fore feet while his hind ones were searching for another down below. In short, on this account solely he had named him "Guyascutas."

As there seemed to be no way of impressing the captain with a different opinion of the merits of Guyascutas, I was obliged to make the best of a bad bargain, and jog on as fast as spurs, blows, and entreaties could effect that result.

In reference to the Jew, whom I expected to overtake, and for whom I kept a sharp look-out, it may be as well to state at once that I never again put eyes on him. Whether he secreted himself behind some tree or rock till the saddle-train passed, or, overcome by remorse for the dastardly act he had committed, cast himself headlong over some precipice, I have never been able to ascertain. He is a miserable wretch at best. In view of the future I would not for all the wealth of the Rothschilds stand in his—Well, yes, for that much money I might stand in his boots, provided no others were to be had ; but I should regret extremely to be guilty of such an act toward any fellow-traveler as he had committed.

It was four o'clock when we got under way from the Lake House. A mule-driver from the other side of the divide had cautioned us against starting. There had been several snow-slides during the day, and it was only a few hours since the trail had been cut through. A large train of mules heavily laden must now be on the way down the grade, and fifteen other trains had left Strawberry since noon.

Those who have passed over the "Grade" can best appreciate our position. Two of our horses had already died of starvation and hard usage. There was no barley or feed of any kind to be had at the Lake House. The snow was rapidly melting, and avalanches might be expected at any moment. Only a day or two ago one of these fearful slides had occurred, sweeping all before it. Two mules and a horse were carried over the precipice and dashed to atoms, and the driver had barely escaped with his life.

It was considered perilous to stop on any part of the Grade. The trail was not over a foot wide, being heavily banked up on each side by the accumulated snow. Passing a pack train was very much like running a muck. The Spanish mules are so well aware of their privileges when laden, that they push on in defiance of all obstacles, often upsetting the unwary traveler by main force. I was struck with a barrel of whisky in one of the narrow passes some time previously and knocked nearly senseless, so that I had good cause to remember their prowess.

It was put to the vote whether we should make the attempt or remain, and finally, after much discussion, referred to our captain. He was evidently determined to go on at all hazards, having a stronger interest in the lives of his horses than any of the party.

At the word of command we mounted and put spurs to our jaded animals.

"Now, boys," said the captain, "keep together ! Your lives depend upon it ! Watch out for the pack trains, and when you see them coming hang on to a wide place ! Don't come in contact with the pack-mules or you'll go over the Grade certain."

There was no need of caution. Every nerve was strained to make the summit as soon as possible. It should be mentioned that the "Grade" is the Placerville state road, cut in the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevadas, and winding upward around each rib of the mountain for a distance of two miles. It was now washed away in many places by the melting of the snow, and some of the bridges across the ravines were in a very bad condition. From the first main elevation there is still another rise of two or three miles to the top of the divide, but this part is open and the ascent is comparatively easy. In meeting the pack trains the only hope of safety is to make for a point where the road widens. These places of security occur only three or four times in the entire ascent of the Grade. To be caught between them on a stubborn or unruly horse is almost certain destruction at this season of the year.

The only alternative is to dismount with all speed, wheel your horse round, and if possible get back to some place of security.

In about half an hour we made a point of rocks where the trail was bare. Our captain gave the order to dismount, and proceeded a short distance ahead to reconnoitre. The whole space occupied by our twelve horses and riders was not over six or eight feet wide by about thirty in length. Should any of the animals become stampeded they were bound to go over. The tracks of several which had recently been pushed over the precipice by the pack trains were still visible. Our captain returned presently with news that a train was in sight. Soon we heard the tinkling of the bell attached to the leader, and then the clattering of the hoofs as the mules descended with their heavy burdens. One by one they passed. Whisky, gin, and brandy again! Barrels, half-barrels, and kegs! The vaqueros made the cliffs resound with their Carambas and Carajas, their Doña Marias and Santa Sofias!—a language apparently well understood by the mules. This was a train of forty mules, all laden with liquors for the thirsty miners. The vaqueros reported another train within half a mile of twenty-five mules, and others on the Grade.

After another train had passed, our captain gave the word to mount and “cut for our lives!” Scarcely five seconds elapsed before we were all off, dashing helter-skelter up the trail. The horses plunged and stumbled over the rocks, slush, and mud in a manner truly pitiable for them and dangerous for us. In some places the mules had cut through for hundreds of yards, and the trail was perfectly honey-combed. But there was no time for humanity. Dashing the spurs into the bleeding sides of our animals, we pushed on as if all the evil powers of Virginia City were after us.

“Go it, boys!” our captain shouted; “neck or nothing! I see the train! Two hundred yards more and we’re all safe!—Caraja! Here’s another train right on us!”

It was a palpable truth! The pack-mules came lumbering down around a point not fifty yards from us.

"Dismount all! Wheel! and cut back for your lives!" This was the order. In a moment we were all plunging rantically in the snow. Some of the horses were stampeded, and one man had gotten his riata around his leg. The mules had also commenced a stampede, when, by dint of shouting, plunging, and struggling, we got clear of them, and went tearing down the trail to our old station. The train soon passed us. Whisky again, of course. "How many trains more, Señor?"—to the vaquero. "Carambo! muchos! muchos!"—and on he went laughing. This was hard. We could not stand here much longer, for the tremendous bank of snow above us began to show indications of breaking away. Two trains more passed in rapid succession, and then our captain rode ahead again to reconnoitre. It was growing dusk. The prospect was any thing but cheering. At a given signal we mounted once more. Now commenced a terrible race. Heads, necks, legs, or horse-flesh were as nothing in the desperate struggle to reach the next point. This time we were in luck. The haven was attained just soon enough to avoid a train of forty mules. From the vaquero we learned that another was still on the Grade. We might be able to pass it, however, half a mile further on. At the word of command we again mounted, and put spurs to our jaded animals. It was not long before we heard the tinkling of a bell. Now for it! halt! The mules were on us before we could turn; and here commenced a scene which baffles all description. Some of us were overturned, horses and all, in the banks of snow. Others sprang from their horses and let them struggle on their own account. All had to break a way out of the trail. The mules were stampeded, and kicked, brayed, and rolled by turns. The vaqueros were in a perfect frenzy of rage and terror combined—shrieking Maladetto! Carambo! and Caraja! till it seemed as if the reverberation must break loose the snow from above and send an avalanche down on top of us all. Bridles got foul of stray legs and jerked the owners on their backs; riatas were twisted and wound around horses, mules, and whisky-barrels; packs went rolling hither and thither; men and animals kicked for their bare lives; heads, legs, and bodies were covered up in the snow-drifts; and nobody knew what every body else was doing, or what he was doing himself. In short, the scene was altogether very lively, and would have been amusing had it not been intensified by the imminent risk of slipping over the precipice. It was at least a thousand feet down into Lake Valley, and a man might just as well be kicked on the head by twelve frantic horses and twenty-five vicious mules as undertake a trip down there by the short cut.

All troubles must end. Ours ended when the animals gave out for want of breath. Upon picking up our scattered regiment, with all arms and equipments used in the melée, we found the result as follows: Dead, none; wounded by kicks, scratches, sprains, and bruises, six: mortally frightened, the whole party, inclusive of our captain; lost a keg of whisky, which some say went down to Lake Valley; but I have my suspicions where that keg went, and how it was secreted.

From this point over the summit we met several more pack trains, and had an occasional tumble in the snow. Nothing more serious occurred. It was quite dark as we commenced our descent. The road here was a running stream of mud, obstructed by slippery rocks, ruts, stumps, and dead animals. It was a marvel to me how we ever reached the bottom without broken bones. My horse stumbled about every hundred yards, but never fell more than three-quarters down. Somehow people rarely get killed in this country, unless shot by revolvers or bad whisky.

The crowds were thicker than ever at Strawberry. From all accounts the excitement had only just commenced. Five thousand were represented to be on the road from the various diggings throughout California. I had bargained for a bed, and was enjoying the idea of a good supper—the savory odor of which came through the cracks of the bar-room door—when our captain announced that he could get no feed for his animals, and we must ride on to "Dick's," fourteen miles more. This was pretty tough on a sick man. The ride since morning had been quite hard enough to try the strength and temper of a well man; but add fourteen miles to that, of a dark night and raining into the bargain, and the sum total is not agreeable. It was useless to remonstrate. The captain was inflexible. He could not see his horses starve. One was just giving his last kick, and three more were about to "go in." I might stay if I pleased, suggested the captain, but the horses must go on. As I had paid thirty dollars for the ride, and had barely enough left to get to San Francisco, there was no alternative but to mount. By this time three of the party were so ill as to be scarcely able to sit in their saddles.

It is wonderful how much one can endure when there is nobody at hand to care a pin whether he lives or dies. I rather incline to the opinion that many people in this world die from the kindness and sympathy of friends, who, if thrown upon their own resources, would weather it out.

I have an impressive recollection of the fourteen miles from Strawberry to "Dick's." My horse, Gyascutas, broke down about half-way. The rest of the party pushed on. About the same time the old tortures of rheumatism and neuralgia assailed me in full force. It was pitch dark. There was no stopping-place nearer than "Dick's." The weather was cold, and a drenching rain had now penetrated my clothes to the skin.

A distinct recollection of my feelings a month ago, as I tramped along over this road with my pack on my back, afforded me ample material for philosophical reflection. Was it now somebody else—some decrepit old foggy who had lost his all, and had nothing more to expect in this world? Or could it possibly be the glowing enthusiast, just freed from the trammels of office, and inspired by visions of mountain life, liberty, and wealth? If it was the same—and there could hardly be any mistake about it, unless some mysterious translation of the spirit into some other body had taken place at Virginia City—the visions of mountain life, liberty, and unbounded riches were certainly of a very different character.

In addition to the peculiarity in the hind-quarters of Guyascutas, which caused him always to take two trails at the same time, I had now reason to suspect that he was entirely blind of one eye, and afflicted with a cataract on the other. Every hundred yards or so he walked off the road, and brought up in some deep cavity or against a pile of rocks. The mud in many places was up to his haunches, and if there was a comparatively dry spot any where in existence, he was sure to avoid it. I think he disliked me on account of the spurring I gave him on the Grade, and wanted to get rid of me in some way; or perhaps he considered his own course of life beyond further endurance.

The result of all the stumbling, and running into deep pits, banks of rock, and mud-holes, was that I had to get down and walk the remainder of the way. If a conviction had not taken possession of my mind that the captain would compel me to pay for the horse, in the event of failure to produce him, I would cheerfully have left him to his fate, and proceeded alone; but under the circumstances I thought it best to lead him. At last the welcome lights hove in sight. It was not long before I was snugly housed at Dick's, where a good cup of tea brought life and hope back again. This, I may safely say, was my hardest day's experience of travel in any country.

Next day poor Guyascutas was so far gone on his long journey that I had to leave him at a stable on the road-side, and proceed on foot. By night I was within six miles of Placerville. Here I overtook a fellow-traveler, and bargained with him for his horse. From Placerville, by stage to Sacramento, the journey is devoid of interest. I arrived at San Francisco in due time, a little the worse for the wear, but still equal to any new emergency that might arise.

The citizens of San Francisco were on the qui vive for news from Washoe. Almost every man with a dollar to spare, and many who had nothing to spare, had invested, to a greater or less extent, in claims—from thousands of feet down to a few inches. Conflicting accounts had recently come down. The public mind was in a state of feverish excitement. Was Washoe a humbug, or was it not? Was there silver there, or was it all sham? What was the Ophir worth at this time? How about the Billy Choller and the Miller? These were but a few of the questions asked me on Montgomery Street. It required an hour to walk fifty yards, so great was the pressure for news. Could I tell any thing about the Winnemuck, or the Pine-Nut, or the Rogers? Did I happen to know what the Wake-up-Jake was worth in Washoe? What about the Lady Bryant—was it true that it had gone down? Whereabouts was the Jim Crack located, and what was Dead Broke worth? In short, I looked over more deeds, and answered more questions of a varied and indefinite nature, in the brief space of three days, than had ever been put to and answered by any one man before.

The editor of the Bulletin, who had made a flying visit to Washoe, and in whose company I had traveled down from Placerville, commenced about this time a series of articles, in which he told some startling truths. Base metal had been found in the Comstock; to what extent it prevailed nobody could tell. If the Comstock should prove to be worthless, what hope was there for the "outside claims?"

The news spread like wild-fire. A panic seized upon the multitudes whose funds were invested in Washoe. Men hurried about the streets in search of purchasers of Washoe stock; but purchasers were nowhere to be found. Every body wanted to sell. The Comstock suddenly fell from one thousand down to five dollars per foot, and no sales at that. Miller went down fifty per cent.; and the Great Outside could scarcely be given away at any price! Alas! had it come to this? The gigantic Washoe speculation "gone in," and none so poor to do it reverence!

Softly! A word in your ear, reader! They are only "bucking it down" for purposes of speculation. The keen men who know a thing or two are buying up secretly. The silver is there, and it must come out. All this cry about base metal is "a dodge" to frighten the timid. If you have claims, hold on to them; they will be up again presently.

For my part, I thought it best to leave San Francisco before my correspondents—for whom, it will be remembered, I had executed some business in Washoe—retracted their good opinion of my sagacity. There was no chance at this crisis to sell the various claims with which I had been commissioned at Carson City. Capitalists were short of funds. The money market was laboring under a depression. The liver of the body politic was in a state of collapse. I went to the principal bankers, but failed to accomplish any thing. They even refused to lend money on unquestionable security.

In view of all the circumstances, I determined to visit Europe. If the moneyed men of the Old World could only be satisfied of the extent, variety, and magnificence of the investments to be made in the New, they would not hesitate to open negotiations with an agent direct from Washoe.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAIN, January, 1861.

You will perceive from my address, most esteemed reader, that I am now established at one of the best points for pecuniary transactions on the Continent of Europe. I have seen many of the wealthy burghers of Frankfort, and am pleased to say that they manifest a very friendly disposition. As yet they do not quite understand the nature of the proposed securities; but I have great confidence in their sagacity. My negotiations with the Rothschilds have been of the most amicable character. They have gone so far as to express the opinion that Washoe must be a remarkable country; and yesterday, when I proposed to sell them fifty feet in the Gone Case, and forty in the Roaring Grizzly, for the sum of one hundred thousand florins, they smiled so politely, and withal looked so completely puzzled, that I considered it best not to force an immediate answer. You are aware, of course, that in important negotiations of this kind it is judicious to let the opposite party sleep a night or two over your proposition. That the Rothschilds are at present a little wary of any investment in Washoe is quite natural. The nomenclature is new to them. They have never before heard of Roaring Grizzly and Gone Case silver mines. But if that should prove to be their only objection, I have no doubt they will ultimately purchase to the extent of several millions. If they do, I shall be happy to negotiate sales for a reasonable commission, to be paid strictly in advance. My publishers will, I am confident, forward any letter to my address. The postage must be pre-paid. The rates, which are somewhat high, can be ascertained by inquiry at the post-offices in San Francisco, New Orleans, Saint Louis, Boston, and New York.

READING EXTRA BULLETIN.

TO RED RIVER AND BEYOND.

[Third Paper.]

ONE Tuesday morning we began our journey from Pembina to the Selkirk settlement.

Joe Rolette, our host, with his two little boys whom he was taking to the Catholic school at the settlement after the summer vacation; Mr. Bottineau, a French half-breed, whose excellent farm between St. Joseph and Pembina I have mentioned in another place; Joseph, and myself were of the party. Joe Rolette rode in a miniature Red River cart with his youngest boy—a miniature of himself—behind a diminutive mule rejoicing in the title of Thomas Jefferson, and with a genuine patriotism responding by an accelerated gait to the exclamation of his abbreviated Christian name—"Tom!" Tom was a mule in miniature, saving only his ears, and held together in his little and tight fitting skin all the virtues and none of the vices of the race of which he was the minimum. The cart which he drew was loaded with all the blankets of the party, the cooking utensils, pemmican, bread, and other provisions, and the passengers mentioned; but he drew it along at a lively trot from sunrise to sunset, forty-four miles a day, with the vigor and continuity of the balance-wheel of a chronometer, and tired out even the first-rate horses which the rest of us rode.

A few words will describe the appearance of the country between Pembina and Fort Garry. In all external aspects, to one who travels by the river road, it is the same from Fort Abercrombie to within a few miles of Lake Winnipeg. The direction of the road is very nearly north. It is the continuous chord to which the river, in its winding course, supplies a hundred greater or lesser arcs. The banks of the river are thickly wooded with elm, oak, and poplar, and this wall of trees is at the traveler's right throughout the journey, always bounding the eastern horizon. This general prospect is varied by lines of timber stretching away to the west, and marking the course of the tributaries of Red River.

About the middle of the forenoon, near one of these tributary streams, we came in view of a shanty, inhabited by an old Scotchman and his wife—she the first white woman in the Selkirk settlement. We were treated to bowls of fresh milk, with the cream standing thick upon it, and making a man blush to remember that he came from a city where stump-tailed abominations and watery-blue dilutions had long since led him to forget the appearance of the genuine lacteal fluid.

The shanty was not neat nor well furnished. The bed, which stood in one corner, was small and narrow, the walls had never been white-washed, nor the mud floor boarded over, though the cooking-stove and table, which also occupied this their only apartment, left little of the floor to be seen or trodden upon.

An hour after sunset we came to the spot where we were to pass the night. It was one always used by the plain hunters, and marked by heaps of ashes, charred stumps, and well-worn paths leading down to the water's edge. An old man and his wife had come to the campground before us, and were camping half-way down the bank, to be sheltered from the cold wind which was blowing over the prairie. As we led our horses down to the water, we could see their faces by the camp-fire, both wrinkled and seamed with old age, and his white hairs and stooping figure indicating that he had passed the threescore and ten, beyond which all is labor and trouble. He was sitting on the ground in the lee of a large log, smoking a short pipe, while the woman was blowing the embers of their fire to get a coal to put in her own. They had evidently had their scanty supper of tea and pemmican, and had spread their single pair of blankets in preparation for the night. Our host knew them, and when we had made our own huge fire on the prairie—of logs too large for them to lift—and were eating supper by its cheerful blaze, he told us their story.

It was the pitiful story of another Lear. The old man had been strong and vigorous, and well to do in his prime, famous as a breaker of horses, and had gathered together a little property, enough, if well husbanded, to keep him and his wife from poverty. All this, when he began to feel the infirmities of age, he had given to an adopted son, asking in return only the food and shelter necessary for his few remaining years. For a short time he was well cared for; but when this faithless wretch had it all securely in his hands, and he became accustomed to its possession, he set the old pair adrift, and now is laying up ill-gotten wealth, and counts his cattle on Sundays, and thanks God he is not poor as other men are, and goes to sleep comfortably housed, while the cold wind and rain drench the white hairs of the old man and woman who had called him son.

We were up and off long before sunrise (but the old man and his wife had started before us), and rode fifteen miles briskly before breakfast, meeting several Red River trains, which had made an early start on their way to St. Paul or the plains. We stopped for breakfast at the house of Mr. John Dace, which marks the beginning of the more thickly inhabited part of the Red River settlement—from this point stretching down to the vicinity of Lake Winnipeg, clustering most thickly in the vicinity of Fort Garry, sixteen miles below.

At Mr. Dace's house every thing was in strong contrast with the house at which we had lunched on the previous morning. Neatness and thrift were obvious at a glance. The men were out in the fields gathering in the harvest, and the warm sunshine of an autumn morning was lying on the clean plank floor, as it loves to lie where there is stillness, and it can make cool shadows. The morning's work had long been completed, the floor scrubbed, every thing set to rights, and the baby sent to sleep in a swinging hammock, made of long cord and a shawl, by the time we came. In the adjoining apartment we could hear the low talk of women. The wife of Mr. Dace, a half-breed woman inclined to corpulency, soon came in, and learned our wishes; and while breakfast was preparing for us in the next room we had time to look round us. The room was a spacious one for a block-house, and one of the heavy beams which ran under the ceiling was supported by a stout post, against which the baby's hammock swung, giving him a slight jerk, which, to a metropolitan baby, for instance, would have been any thing but sleep-provoking. A double bed, on which I could see plenty of good blankets, but no white sheets, stood in one corner, and two or three old oak trunks served for seats on one side of the room. The chairs were of the same substantial home-made manufacture, and one or two had bottoms of hide, like those of snow-shoes. The table was an old-fashioned one, the leaves supported by swinging legs. The walls were neatly white-washed, and where the plastering had been rubbed the invariable neatness of the apartment was preserved, though at the expense of mortar. The windows were small, and the door low—the doors being accommodated to the size of the windows, perhaps, and the sashes to the size and costliness of the little six by eight panes which, when the house was built, were worth 1s. 6d. sterling. Through the open door we could catch a glimpse of the waters of the river, red where the sun shone upon them through the trees, from behind us. Pigeons and wild geese, with potatoes and turnips unsurpassable any where; bread and butter, cheese and tea, white sugar and cream were set before us. Mr. Dace was too far back in the fields on the prairie to be called; but as we drove on we noted the luxuriant growth of the vegetables in his garden, and the thickness of the sheaves in his wheat field.

Delayed by Joe's horse-racing and a drunken ferryman, above the settlement, we did not come in sight of the spires of the Cathédrale de Saint Boniface till near sunset. At last they appeared—two bright lines rising above the last grove of poplar trees through which we had to pass, standing out clear and glistening against the deep blue of the sky, and surmounted by the cross. A little farther on we left the woods behind us, and came in full view of the heart of the Red River settlement—the very spot where, half a century ago, the Earl of Selkirk planted his colony. Close at our left was another field of wheat, half of it harvested, and each pile of yellow sheaves sending its long eastward shadow over the closely shaven plain. Near at hand two half-breeds were loading a cart, and where the standing wheat began, a group of reapers were busy at work with sickle and scythe, women following behind, raking and binding, and adding to the golden tents upon the field at one end as fast as they were taken away at the other. The red sashes which most of the men wore supplied the only lacking color in the landscape. Beyond them, to the west, flowed the winding blue line of the river, topped by the dark brown of its farther bank, left in shade by the setting sun. A mile beyond, on its western bank, just where the shaded blue waters of the Red River were augmented by the gleaming silver of the Assiniboine, on which as it flowed from the west the sun still shone brightly, stood the massive quadrangle of Fort Garry, with its four cone-topped bastions; and directly ahead of us, on one side of the river and close to its banks, a few rods further on, whither all the waters of the two rivers seemed to sway and flow, arose the high walls of the Cathedral of Saint Boniface, surmounted by the two glistening spires which had greeted us at a distance.

Fort Garry is a very fine structure. The exterior wall is of limestone, quarried on the river bank near by. At the four corners are four imposing bastions. Of the thickly-crowded houses within, one or two may be of the same material, limestone, but most are of wood, including the Company's officers' quarters, and those of the officers of the Royal Canadian Rifles, a company of which is stationed here, whose rations are supplied by the Hudson's Bay Company. As you enter the spacious quadrangle by the arched gate-way, which opens to the south close to the bank of the Assiniboine, the impression is the usual one at sight of soldiers' barracks; but passing to the building at the northern end of the square, and by the soldiers and servants who are straggling about, this impression vanishes as you come in view of the spacious edifice in which Chief Factor M'Tavish, who is also Governor M'Tavish, of the colony of Assiniboia, resides.

We were treated with great courtesy by the Governor during our stay in the settlement, and the innumerable questions which the current of conversation and recent events led us to ask, were responded to with an unflinching freedom and sincerity. In some of the Canadian commissioners' reports the reticence and the misrepresentations of the Company's officers are dwelt upon, but in this quarter, at least—and it is the highest in the settlement—we found neither. Governor M'Tavish is a gentleman of Scotch birth or descent, as his name and appearance indicate. His figure is tall, and his head finely shaped, with a broad, high brow, which, without particularly jutting eyebrows, gives you the impression of mental calibre. The wrinkles upon his forehead and face are such as care, not age, accounts for, and are set-off by the Palmerston style of whisker and a heavy mustache, together with long sandy hair, in which the streaks of gray are only beginning to appear. His manners had the quiet, well-bred tone oftener found among Englishmen than others, and his voice is low from the same cause or from some bronchial affection. Energy, determination, and executive ability were the obvious characteristics of the man. What we had before learned of his culture and tastes was confirmed by the books which we saw lying on the table and book-cases.

At many of the posts of the Company the year's business is done up in a few weeks, and till the same season rolls around again there is an absence of all employment, and a closing out of all news, such as affords the common food of thought to most persons linked by daily or weekly newspapers to the rest of the world. Some of the Company's officers are wise enough to improve these long intervals of leisure, taking care to supply themselves with books, which do not perish with the single using. The Governor was long stationed at York Factory, where all the business of the year is crowded into the brief two months in which the ships of supply from England, and the boats from the interior posts with furs, arrived and departed, and there or elsewhere made himself a learned man.

In regard to the settlement of the northwestern areas, it may be well here to observe that, inasmuch as timber occurs mainly on the banks of rivers, their population will be greatly retarded or increased by the knowledge of the existence of other kinds of fuel at accessible points. We had been repeatedly informed by half-breeds of the existence of coal or lignite in strata in the banks of Mouse River and the Saskatchewan. Governor M'Tavish showed us pieces of lignite from that river—the first that we had seen—and confirmed the fact of its existence on the upper waters of Mouse River. He added, that it was used habitually during the winter at Fort Pitt; and a retired chief factor, whom we afterward visited, told us that at his former station, at the Carlton House, it had supplied their blacksmith's forge. The important bearing of this fact upon the future population of the northwestern country is apparent. There is considerable pine timber upon the great streams of this northern river system; and if trees were planted with pains by all new settlers, a sufficient supply for ordinary purposes might be kept up. But it is to be taken into the account, that in these high latitudes the winter season is of longer duration than in the equally fertile and likewise timber-less prairie districts of our own Northwestern States. As the need shall arise these mines of coal will, therefore, be worked, and will supply the fuel of millions for a thousand years. Such difficulties as are now had in burning it will not be experienced when coal stoves supply the place of the open hearth.

I suppose that Norman W. Kittson is the man who has done as much as any one to break up their happy solitude. As long ago as 1844 he was guilty of forging the first link which connected the Mississippi and the Red River of the North. As always, trade was the occasion of the enterprise. His store, which was formerly at Pembina, on our side of the international line, tapped the rich fur trade, in which, north of the line, the Hudson's Bay Company had a monopoly, and perhaps he now and then purchased from hunters north of the line skins to balance those which the Company's men gathered south of it. Now the license of exclusive trade has expired, and Mr. Kittson is allowed an open rivalry in the settlement itself. His store stands on the east bank of the Red River, opposite the mouth of the Assiniboine. He and other enterprising traders, during the year 1857, sent through St. Paul houses, for exportation below, more than $120,000 worth of furs. Moreover, traders and private parties are sending money as well as furs to St. Paul, for supplies. Formerly they had to rely on the favor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and undergo the delay, and share the expense of the long trip of the ships from York Factory to England and back. Now the round trip can be made, by way of St. Paul and New York, in thirty to forty days, and in the year mentioned as much money's worth of money as of furs was left by these people in St. Paul—$120,000.

A day or two after our visit to Fort Garry, Joseph and I hired two saddle-horses, for a trip to the lower stone fort, properly called Lower Fort Garry. We had crossed the river at this point before in a canoe, but the difficulty experienced in getting our horses over the two rivers—Red River and the Assiniboine—gave us a realizing sense of the nature of the ferry and ferryman, and new facts for generalization as to the character of the Red River half-breeds. I believe the person who leases the ferry-boat pays £20 a year for the privilege, and charges three-pence for a passage; but the ferry-boy, according to our observation, spends a portion of his time dodging the demands on his paddles and his patience. The bank of the river is of stratified clay, which in rainy weather is exceedingly slippery, and accumulates in tremendous quantities about the feet; and there is nothing to prevent horse, cart, or man from slipping from the top of the bank into the river, except a log or two where the boat lands. It has never entered into the mind of the owner of the ferry, I presume, to save himself the delay of carts in getting down the bank carefully, by building a plank walk with cleets from its top down to low-water mark. The ferry-boat is a flat boat twice as long as broad, and tackled to a cable which is stretched from shore to shore. The rope which connects the forward end of the boat with the cable being shortened, the side of the boat is swung around so that the current helps to shove it over. The same steep and muddy bank is at the west side of the river; also on the south side of the Assiniboine—the same lazy ferry over it, and the same unplanked bank on its north side. Moreover, there is no boat running straight across the Red River below the Assiniboine. To cross from the east side of the Red River to the side below the Assiniboine, where Fort Garry stands, one must needs cross both rivers in this tedious way, subject to the mercy of the mud if it rains, of the ferryman if he is lazy, and of the two rivers in any case. We were an hour and a half in getting to the fort with our horses, in spite of working our passage by hauling at the ropes. If things work as they will work, my opinion is that that ferryman will go to his grave haunted by visions of a planked bank down to the Styx, and Charon as a driving Yankee running a two-horse ferry-boat across the damned river; and it is not impossible that, on stormy nights, the good Doctor, who resides at the fort near at hand, may be waked from his virtuous slumbers by the shout of some future bold captain calling on his men, through the wind and rain, to take a reef in the stove-pipe, or to whip up the nigh horse.

But we were over at last, and spurring our horses, galloped on down the river. A few sketches made on our return journey will give the reader an idea of the appearance of the views at two or three of the principal points between the two forts. But it must be left to his imagination to picture the immense fields of wheat which we found, some on the right of us going to the houses, which continuously skirt the river, and others to the left of us extended over the prairie almost as far as the eye could reach. As along the bank on the other side of the river, above Fort Garry, so on this side of the bank below it, the straight road led us through poplar forests and shrubbery, through which, at every bend of the river, we could catch glimpses of the fields of wheat, or barley, or potatoes, or oats—the neat white homes of the settlers rising at frequent intervals, surrounded by their well-thatched outbuildings, and hay or wheat stacks—these daily growing more numerous, for our journey was made in the very middle of harvest time, and part of it in the light of the harvest moon.

Often the dwelling of some retired Hudson's Bay Company officer might be seen on a commanding point, distinguished by its superior size and height from the buildings around it. Here numbers of the old factors or traders of the Company are contented to return and spend the rest of their days, among the scenes and under a jurisdiction familiar and agreeable to them, relying for news of the entire world upon their monthly files of the English newspapers; for supplies of the necessities of life upon the half-breed farmers and hunters around them, and of its luxuries upon their annual importations from England, or, in latter years, the States.

Spires of churches, and the long arms of wind-mills, broke the level lines of the pictures that greeted our eyes as the road led us on from open place to open place, through the poplars that surrounded it for a portion of the way. Wind-mills grind the wheat for all the settlers. There is one steam-mill, with two run of stones and a set of saws. It was not grinding or sawing when we passed; but in its shadow two men were laboriously dragging at either end of a heavy rip saw, though the circular was in perfect order. Whose fault this is I can not guess, but it is clear that in an American settlement the settlers would not suffer it to be any one's fault.

In like manner the road, which had been begun to be mended in several places, was left half finished, its last state worse than its first. In dry weather, however, it is as level as a floor. There is a bridle-path close on the banks of the river, but no road.

Our own horses we had left at Pembina, to get fat for the home journey, and the horses which we hired for this trip might have been buffalo runners in their day, but their days must have been in Lord Selkirk's time. It was dark before we had got half-way to the lower fort. We drew bridle, therefore, at the residence of Mr. J. H. Harriott, a retired chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, to whom we had letters, and whose residence was a mile nearer than the lower fort, where we had at first intended to pass the night.

A true gentleman of the old school—that we were within the walls of his house was sufficient reason why he should treat us like princes. Though, to tell the truth, we did not even have the honor of resembling princes incognito. One summer's journey on the prairies had reduced us almost to extremities in the matter of clothing. We wore borrowed "biled shirts," mine covered with a borrowed coat once and a half too large, and Joseph's covered with a coat, his own, so ragged that that had to be concealed by an overcoat just a little better. As for our trowsers, "the least said the soonest mended;" and they would have stood but little mending more. With hair uncut and beards untrimmed, sun-burned, and looking more like foot-pads than gentlemen, we had ventured upon this journey with a degree of confidence in the natural agreeableness of our countenances and amenity of our manners—that they would interpret us aright—such as, under better clothes, we should never have dared to indulge. As we rode along in the twilight, we had amused ourselves by assuming to be what we must have seemed—Dick Turpins, Jack Shepherds, patent-safe men—but before riding into Mr. Harriott's gate recovered our dignity as possible princes.

None of our suspicions seemed to have entered the minds of our host and hostess. While we remained under their roof—a period protracted at their own request—we were the recipients of a bountiful hospitality.

From numerous long and interesting conversations with our host, we obtained many particulars regarding the management and practical working of the Company's operations, and especially regarding the geography of the Saskatchewan district and the district lying between its waters and those of the Missouri and of the Rocky Mountains, from the Kootonais pass northward. In the various capacities of clerk, chief trader, and chief factor, Mr. Harriott had traveled over or resided in many places in this vast territory. Now establishing a trading-post at the foot of the Rocky Mountains; now in charge of the Carlton House or of Fort Pitt, on the head-waters of the Saskatchewan; and, again, leading parties, with a rich freight of furs, through a dangerous Indian country; and there, or elsewhere, having such hair-breadth escapes, and such exciting adventures, undergoing such risks, and hardships, and exposure, as would make one thrill to hear, though never to be heard from his lips except by solicitation, which added the charm of unconscious modesty to what was already sufficiently brave and admirable.

A view of Mr. Harriott's residence is given above, and may be taken as a type of the better class of dwellings in the Selkirk settlement. It is built of limestone, quarried from the native rock, and within and without was planned by its owner. One fact reveals some of the causes of the stagnation of things at Red River. Mr. H., when building his house, left in the spacious dining-room an arching alcove for a side-board, at the same time giving a cabinet-maker at the settlement an order to fill it. Several years have elapsed, but what with the cabinet-maker hunting, and farming, and doing nothing, Mr. H. has not yet seen even the wood of which his side-board is to be made.

whips and guns in the hall, tobacco jar and pipes on the side-table, a melodeon and accordeon and music-box in the room which New Englanders call a parlor, tell the story of how the pleasant summer days and long winter nights are whiled away, and how a life of exposure and adventure and toil is rounded with rest and calm and domestic peace.

One pleasant afternoon our host ordered his carriage to the door and drove us to the "Stone Fort." The horses were a gay pair, and whirled their load down the graveled walk and over the bridge and along the road at a pace that needed a strong hand on the reins. The carryall was of a soberer sort, imported from England by way of Hudson's Bay and York Factory, and of a pattern not now in fashion here or there—low, heavy wheels, thick, substantial whiffle-trees, high dash-board, and a body like that of the carriages of well-to-do English squires half a century ago. We were soon at the fort. The view here given was taken from the south—the direction in which we came. The fort is built of solid limestone, as are many of the buildings inclosed, and is, perhaps, the most imposing of the Company's structures. It was erected at the advice of Sir George Simpson, but has never been of the use which was anticipated for it. Its capacious buildings serve mainly for the storage of furs and provisions, and the large crops which are gathered from the farm. A distillery near by, where the Company once undertook to manufacture their liquor, is no longer used for that purpose. When Assiniboa is made a colony, the fort may be bought for government offices.

One Sunday morning I had the pleasure of accompanying my host and his wife to the church of St. Andrews, of which Archdeacon Hunter is in charge. The church was well filled: the congregation a well-dressed one—not differing greatly, I think, from one which might be seen in any country village in England, since it consisted, in the bulk, neither of French half-breeds, who are almost always Catholics, nor of Scotch, who worship at the kirk, but mainly of the English and their descendants: together with a few half-breeds here and there, Company's servants and officers, a retired chief trader and factor or two, and on the walls the tablet of one who had lately died.

The sketch below of the church edifice, in which Archdeacon Hunter officiates, may give a faint idea of its appearance and situation. It is, perhaps, the neatest building in Red River. Constructed of limestone, from the quarries near at hand, the stone has been dressed and piled with more regard to architectural rules than any other. A wall of the same kind of stone surrounds the church and the grave-yard in its rear. Its position upon the banks of the river is a very fine one. Standing upon its porch one may look up or down the river and see the neat homes and farms of the settlers, while its tasty outlines form a prominent object in the landscape to those gazing upon it from either direction.

Dining with Thomas Sinclair, a gentleman long resident at Red River, I learned that the Anson Northup was not the first boat, though doubtless the first steamboat on the Red River of the North. In the back-ground of the sketch of Bishop Anderson's church, there is to be seen the roof of a steam mill—the only one on Red River. The machinery of this mill, which grinds wheat and saws logs indiscriminately. Mr. Sinclair was commissioned to transport from St. Paul to Fort Garry. The perils of the land transit may be faintly appreciated by one who has read of what we suffered in our less difficult undertaking. Probably it would have been still more difficult to carry such heavy loads by the plains. This he did not attempt to do, but camped at Graham's Point, two miles above Fort Abercrombie, and there made a rude boat or batteau. Noah's ark could not have served its maker's purpose better. Mr. Sinclair's boat was 55 feet long, and 13 feet wide. Unlike Noah, Mr. Sinclair had no oakum, pitch, or tar wherewith to calk the seams. This seemed to balk his hopes, but the difficulty was overcome by using basswood and grooving the planks. They were so green and damp that water ran ahead of the planer. But not a drop ran into the boat when they were put together, and the cargo—all the machinery of an engine twenty-horse power, was landed at the settlement in safety. Unless the name of the Indian who first dipped a paddle there can be ascertained let this pass as the first navigation of Red River.

James Sinclair, the brother of the gentleman just mentioned, has been likely to lose something of his proper fame. It is claimed, apparently on good authority, that he first discovered the pass through the Rocky Mountains, now named after Captain Palissier, and went through it three several times; first, in 1841 with two families of emigrants; second, in 1848 with seven men going to California; and in 1854 with his own family, and a number of cattle, his intention being to start a stock farm in Oregon. In one of his journeys, perhaps the last, the party which he led were compelled to leave their carts by the roadside on this side of the mountains, and pack their stuff through. These carts were seen by some of Captain Palissier's men, and indeed used to boil their tea with, and must have signified to one who saw them that the pass had been discovered and used.

Returning toward Fort Garry we passed the kirk, which is the place of worship of the old Scotch settlers. It was our good fortune to spend the night at the house of one of the most intelligent of these, Mr. Donald Murray, of Frog Plain. He had been personally familiar with the progress of the settlement from Lord Selkirk's time till now, and entertained us till long past midnight with his reminiscences. The Scotch settlers, who occupy with the English the portion of the settlement around Fort Garry, are mostly farmers. They may send hunters to the plains or pay for their outfit, but themselves rarely go, except for pleasure. They are by far the most sober and industrious class of the community, and have been the salt which has saved it till now. They abide in the old ways. The majority of the English residents at the settlement, together with many of the more intelligent half-breeds, worship in the church of which a sketch has been given above (Archdeacon Hunter's), or in that under the care of Bishop Anderson, given below. The bishop was absent from the settlement during our visit, and we did not have the pleasure of seeing or hearing him. The half-breeds and natives are for the most part Catholics, and their religious services are held in the large cathedral of St. Boniface, opposite Fort Garry. The Right Reverend the Bishop of St. Boniface, in the colony of Assiniboia, gave us extremely interesting accounts of the religious and educational establishments in his diocese. Bishop Tache has himself been in the country for fifteen years, and no unprejudiced observer can fail to see the fruits of his industry and pious zeal. His diocese is immense, and the care of the missions in the interior country where it extends, which are altogether heathen missions, is no small part of his self-denying and laborious work. Besides this, there is under his charge, and constituting the more engrossing division of his labor, the ministration and aid afforded to the Catholic population of Red River and neighborhood. A Canadian like themselves, their brother, therefore, and their friend, no outward circumstances restrict the influence which his character and high office enable him to exercise.

There are four parishes in Red River—St. Boniface, St. Norbert, St. Francis Xavier, St. Charles. St. Boniface includes within its limits the central and most populous part of the settlement. Mgr. J. N. Provencher was its first bishop, having landed at Fort Douglas about the middle of July, 1818. In two years was laid the foundation of the first religious edifice—a wooden chapel. The Church of St. Boniface, Bishop Tache's cathedral, now replaces it.

It is, perhaps, the finest, certainly the most imposing building in the settlement. It is 100 feet in length, 45 in breadth, and 40 in height, not reckoning the spire. In its two tinned and airy towers is a fine and well-matched peal of three bells, weighing upward of 1600 pounds.

In the rear of the cathedral, with a lower roof, is the dwelling of the bishop. He escorted us, by a rear entrance, through his house into the cathedral, on the occasion of our first visit to him, and a more striking surprise could not have been prepared for us. We came out by a door at the side of the altar, and there suddenly beheld pillared aisles, frescoed roof, and all the gorgeous paraphernalia with which the Mother Church solicits and attracts her communicants. To a nice taste the effect might have seemed a little gaudy, but when we learned that the Sisters of Charity and some of the Brothers had accomplished these decorations without aid or pattern, the offense passed; for piety takes rank above taste, or else what excuse have we for the bare walls, the stingy paint, to say nothing of the beggarly pinched ceremonial in some abodes of our enlightened Protestant worship? Indeed, of a Sunday or a fête day, when the church is thronged; when, after a successful hunt and safe return, the half-breeds gather to the cathedral in all their fanciful variety of dress, their brilliant sashes, and blue or white capotes; the dress of the women, too, not less brilliantly catching the eye, there is a sense of harmony gratified by this likeness and general prevalence of striking colors, which would never be elicited by the same throngs in a country meeting-house in New England. A tablet in the wall commemorates the piety and labors of the earliest bishop.

Bishop Tache's house is large, and he shared it, as well as his private residence, with his clergy, the Brothers of his schools, and some orphans. Formerly the boys' school of the Brothers of the Christian doctrine was kept in the bishop's house, but for a year or two now they have had possession of the building erected for them a few hundred feet north of the cathedral—seen in the sketch above. It was here that little Joe Rolette was schooled, and as the tuition is very low, and in some cases a gift, the school is well filled. The scholars are examined semi-annually, and we heard the most creditable reports of their proficiency in reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, grammar, history, sacred and secular, algebra, etc. The sleeping rooms of the little fellows were bedsteadless, but bedsteads were a luxury their parents were used to go without, and they enjoy their neat piles of blankets on the floor quite as well.

The convent belonging to the Sisters of Charity, known in Canada as the Gray Nuns, is in the foreground of the sketch of the Cathedral of St. Boniface. It is to the south of the cathedral, separated from it by a well-cultivated garden, through which, when we passed, some of the Sisters were at work, assisting and directing the labors of half a score of boys.

We were indebted to Bishop Tache for an introduction to the lady superior of the convent, and to her kindness for the opportunity of examining all parts of it. From garret to cellar it was full of interest. The building itself is a very spacious one, though still too small for all its uses. A large chapel was being erected during the summer of our visit, and as the settlement grows other additions will be necessary. The amount of work done and of good accomplished by Sister Valade and the Gray Nuns under her direction is something remarkable. The current expenses of the convent are defrayed entirely by the proceeds of the labors of the nuns. In the garret of the convent we were shown the spinning-wheels with which they spin the material for their plain gray gowns, woven also by their own hand. Their fine garden, too, they till. The more accomplished among them give their leisure to fine embroideries and rich needlework, sold to visitors, or sent to Canada for sale. They board twenty or thirty girls, and, for compensation, give them an education beyond that of most district schools in the United States. The languages used are English and French, and the subjects principally taught are reading, spelling, the catechism, grammar, sacred history, arithmetic, geography, English history, Canadian history, ancient mythology, vocal music, and the piano-forte, as well as the doctrines and practices of the Catholic religion. Besides keeping a day-school for all the little girls of the parish desirous of instruction, they maintain and educate in a separate apartment fifteen or twenty poor orphan girls, without charge to any one except themselves. Nor is this the sum of their labors; they minister to the sick or afflicted of the parish unweariedly, and by their example of charity, industry, and economy, have wrought a perceptible change in the character of that class of the population over whom their care extends.

The neatness and order of the convent was apparent in every part. The uncarpeted floors were not waxed, but not an atom of dust lingered upon them. The kitchen was as neat as a New England housewife's after the morning's work is done, and when the sun lies on the floor and lights up the polished tins. Even the garret, where every thing was stowed, was in an orderly litter.

The lady superior conversed with us only in French, undefined by the Canadian patois; but one of the nuns, whom no visitor several years ago to the Montreal convent has forgotten, and whose beauty nor the attraction of the world has turned aside from her life of self-denial and hidden labor, conversed with us in English, and left us without information on no point that we desired to know. After a general conversation in the large reception-room of the convent, hung with portraits of the bishops and of saints, and decorated with specimens of the handiwork of the nuns, and having also in one of its corners a sewing-machine of Wheeler and Wilson's patent, this beautiful nun conducted us to the music-room, and there entertained us with polkas, redowas, and marches, played by the more accomplished of the pupils. Strange sounds these; to us, flashes of the world, forsaken for months in the midst of its hurry and gayety, its life of cities and operas and art and trade and parades, its pomp and wealth and show;—to these Gray Nuns, dull gleams, perhaps, of an outer world, resigned and forsaken for all the years of their lives.

In other rooms we listened to recitations, singing of the older and younger ones, heard the quick, bright answers of little half-breeds, recognizing the painted block letters which hold the knowledge and wisdom of the world; saw them march about the room in lock step, hymning nursery rhymes; listened to the story of one poor Indian girl left by her savage parents on the prairie to starve and die, a rope tied about her, cutting into her tender flesh and wearing away her life, but saved in her last hours for a longer and better life here; saw and heard other things of like tenor and character, too numerous to mention in these crowded pages, and left the convent with the benediction of the nuns. We, Christians of another name, were thankful that, although on another continent, he whom they called father we called Antichrist, here, at least, charity and the good works of a Christianity inspired elsewhere than at Rome, and at sources long forsaken by the successors of St. Peter, were making their secure and noiseless way.

In the parishes of St. Norbert, St. Francis Xavier, and St. Charles, there are also schools for boys and girls, under the charge of the pastor and the Sisters of Charity; in the first 31 boys and 29 girls, and in the second 13 boys and 26 girls. The population ministered to in St. Boniface parish is 1400; in the other three, the first two having each a chapel, a little more than 2000. At the extremity of Lake Manitoba there is still another chapel, for the convenience of thirty or forty families.

Let it be remembered that here there is no law and no general provision for education; that the houses for the most part are sparse, that the parents are careless and indifferent, and that, though the charge for education is but ten shillings a year, scarcely one child in ten pays for his schooling, while to insist on payment would drive two-thirds away.

There are seventeen schools in the settlement, generally under the supervision of the ministers of the denomination to which they belong. The parochial school of Archdeacon Hunter, under the charge of a gentleman from Dublin; Mr. Gunn's commercial boarding-school, whose scholars are, the most of them, the children of Presbyterians; the Rev. Messrs. Black, Taylor, and Chapman's schools; and three minor schools, under the supervision of the Episcopal ministers in different parishes besides those above mentioned, are the most important of them.

The Indian church, at the lower end of the settlement, is one of the peculiar features of Red River. It is mostly attended by Ojibbeway Indians, whose behavior is attentive and decorous. The singing, in which the soft, low voices of the Indian women join, led by a melodeon played by the wife of the minister, is very sweet. The prayers were read in English, the lessons in Ojibbeway, and the sermon in Cree.

Mr. Cowley, the minister, is not only a missionary, but also physician, judge, arbitrator, and adviser of the Indians. When the Indians require his services as doctor during the night, they quietly enter the parsonage door, which is never locked, make their way in the darkest night to the well-known stove-pipe leading from the sitting-room into his bedroom above, give two or three low Indian taps, and quietly await the result.

No one would doubt the value of these missions among the Indians who could see the contrast between those who have become Christianized and others who have not. Mr. Dawson tells of disgusting dog feasts and medicine dances held by prairie tribes on a Sunday, while he was there, within a mile and a half of their Christian altars. The next Sunday after leaving the settlement we spent at Pembina, and there witnessed a begging dance, and heard a begging oration from an Indian orator. Not so disgusting, to be sure, as a dog feast, but still sufficiently in contrast with the Sabbath rest which we had enjoyed the week before.

The population in Mr. Cowley's mission consists of about 500 baptized Indians and 203 heathen.

The relative proportion of these several classes is fairly shown in the census list of 1856, where the families are numbered as follows, according to their origin :

Rupert's Land, half-breeds and natives . . . . .	816
Scotland . . . . .	116
Canada . . . . .	92
England . . . . .	40
Ireland . . . . .	13
Switzerland . . . . .	2
Norway . . . . .	1

The total population of the settlements on the Red River and the Assiniboine, in that year, amounted to 6523. Including those of Pembina, St. Joseph, and vicinity, and making allowance for the natural increase since the census was taken, it is probable that the number now reaches nearly 8000. There is a very distinct and well-preserved difference in faith between the population of the different parishes into which the settlements are divided. Some are almost exclusively Protestant; others equally Roman Catholic. In the last ten years there has been a considerable emigration of young men to the States and Canada; so that while in 1849 there were 137 more males than females in the settlement, there were in 1856 seventy-three more females than males.

The census roll of Red River has one curious blank in its pages. It has no enumeration of trades and occupations. Almost every man is his own carpenter, house-builder, wheel-wright, blacksmith, and all are either small farmers or hunters. Rock, suitable for grindstones, lies almost under their feet, but they for years have used those imported by the Hudson's Bay Company. Their pottery, too, is imported. There are about sixteen wind-mills, and half as many water-mills. The only steam (saw and grist) mill in the valley, which, as before said, stood idle while a rip-saw was dragged through heavy timbers under its very eaves, was burned down last June, the loss amounting to £1600; so ending another enterprise, with a fatality which seems to have been common wherever the people of the settlement have attempted to overcome the general stagnation. A model farm was once attempted there to show the native farmers what science applied to agriculture could accomplish. Mismanagement produced a miserable failure. The exploits of a Buffalo Wool Company are only remembered to be pitied; the sheep and tallow schemes, and the agricultural associations attempted, have likewise fallen through; and a fulling-mill completes the cast of abortive enterprises. Another steam-mill, however, will soon replace the old one.

The supplies of the Red River people were formerly imported for them through Hudson's Bay, at high charges, by the Company; but with the growth of our Western settlements, which are extended almost to northernmost Minnesota, they have been able to obtain them directly from the United States, which they visited in huge caravans, or through the traders who themselves visit St. Paul. The principal American traders are Norman W. Kittson, who has done more than any one else to open the trade, and J. W. Burbank and Co., now the proprietors in part of the Anson Northup.

These facts, and the immense extent of frontier not easily governed by custom-house regulations, will account for the large number of merchant shops (fifty-six) enumerated in the last census.

Mr. Kittson's store, which has a fine position near the cathedral, and opposite Fort Garry, is very like other Yankee country stores; but in those of the minor or native traders the object seems to be to conceal rather than display their goods.

Besides the merchants, there is another class, called freighters, who row the heavy Mackinaw boats, and haul them and their loads over the portages between York Factory and Red River. There were fifty-five of these boats enumerated in the last census; on the next they will have become much diminished, from the change in the route of importation, although in the supplying of the northwestern districts some will be as indispensable as ever. The employment of Indians by the freighters was a matter of special prohibition only a few years ago, as introducing a kind of industry not compatible with hunting, and likely to direct attention from the fur trade. The shrewd reader may here see some clew to many mysterious facts in the condition of the Red River settlement, and of the Indian missions here and elsewhere in Rupert's Land.

The tenure of land in Assiniboia is singular. It is sometimes sold to purchasers at 7s. 6d. sterling per acre, the title being conveyed under the form of a lease for 999 years. There are half a dozen conditions in the lease saving the interests, and profits, and control of the Company, which has been generally enforced. The condition that one-tenth of the land should be brought under cultivation in five years is observed or not, as may happen. In very many instances among the half-breed settlers, they did not know the number of their lots, the ground of their tenure, and had no document from the Company or any other authority. Some had paid, some had received land for services, some had squatted and were never disturbed, others had received it as a present from Sir George Simpson; and now, beyond the limits of the settlement on the river, no new squatter has any thing to pay.

The northward deflection of isothermals as you pass west of the great lakes, and toward the west coast of the continent, is a fact well known. Red River nobody supposes to be as cold as Labrador. It finds its parallel in the climates of the interior districts of Northern Europe and Asia. The summer temperature is high; the winter cold and severe. There is a plenty of rain in the summer months, a general absence of late spring and early autumn frosts. Professor Hind found, in 1855-'56, the summer of Red River four degrees warmer than that of Toronto, with 21.74 inches of rain in favor of Red River.

The natural division of the seasons for the climate of Red River is as follows:

Summer.—June, July, and August.

Autumn.—September and October.

Winter.—November, December, January, February, and March.

Spring.—April and May.

The summer temperature and the absence of frosts determine its fitness for agricultural purposes, and the splendid crops are the proof thereof.

The clear, dry atmosphere renders innocuous the very cold weather of winter. The half-breeds camp out on the plains, with only a few blankets and robes. Indian corn is a sure crop on the dry points of the Assiniboine and Red River, the horse-teeth and Mandan corn being the kinds most cultivated.

Wheat is the staple crop in the settlement. Forty bushels to the acre is a common return on new land, and in some cases the yield has been between fifty and sixty bushels. The grasshoppers, which have several times eaten up every green thing, are its only enemies.

Of hay the quantity is unlimited, and the quality excellent. Hops grow every where wild, and with the greatest luxuriance. Pease grow wild, and the yield is large. Potatoes are surpassed in size and quality by none that we are accustomed to find in Washington Market.

All kinds of root-crops grow well, and attain large dimensions; and all the garden vegetables which grow well in Canada and Northern New York flourish better in Assiniboine.

Flax, hemp, and tobacco are cultivated to some extent, the want of a market alone preventing the first two from becoming most valuable exports.

Melons are cultivated in some of the gardens of the settlement with wonderful success; and the kitchen gardens of the Royal Canadian Rifles at Fort Garry, and of the Sisters of Charity over the river, would deserve prizes at an Illinois State Fair.

The limitless prairies environing the settlement are fragrant with the perfume of a thousand flowers; and in the thickets and long grass are strawberries, raspberries, sakatome berries, gooseberries, and prunes.

After remaining a week or more in the settlement, the changing of the weather, which was now beginning to have something of the chilliness of autumn, and the departure of the last trains of the half-breeds, made us think more intently of returning. One mild September afternoon, therefore, having first crossed the Stygian ferry, whereof the Charon is no Yankee, and bade adieu to friends at the fort, and to the bishop, and to Kittson and Cavalier, border-settlers who have begun to save the province from itself, and have also rescued Joe Rolette from his enemies, we remanded ourselves to the life which we had left, and them all to their annual hibernation. We reached John Dace's by nightfall, and, the house being full, spread our blankets on the floor of his keeping-room, and slept till morning. The next day Joseph and I bestrode our horses, turned their heads southward, and with a smart gallop soon left the last house of the settlement hidden behind the billowy prairie grass, as the rounding waves hide the ships at sea. Before its chimney-pot had gone down, however, Joseph turned on the river bank, rose in his stirrups, and apostrophized the settlement in a manner which, as I stood and listened, brought tears to my eyes and a handkerchief to my nose. If the thermometer had been farther from 32° Fahrenheit not even the orator would have suspected the sincerity of my emotion. That day we traveled fifty-four miles, reaching Pembina after dark, exhausted, and feeling as if bifurcation had attained its maximum. The next day Joe Rolette came; he, too, certain, for twenty-four hours after dismounting, that the earth had ceased to rotate, but performed its journey around the sun with hard trotting on a macadamized orbit.

At Pembina we made our final preparations for a solitary journey across the country to Crow Wing, on one of the upper tributaries of the Mississippi, bearing the same name. The Pembina postmaster—for even here the American Briareus extends one of his finger tips, and sorts the mails—concluded to accompany us, and by waiting for him benevolently a day, we were rewarded by a month's later mails, which came just in time not to be too late, with letters from home and friends, and news of the world without, whose attractive force, in spite of Kepler and Faraday, was in the ratio of the square of the distance.

One busy Monday morning, on the 19th of September, after a rainy Sunday, we ferried ourselves over the Red River of the North, swimming the horses, dragged our cart up its steep and muddy bank, and soon left the waters gleaming red in every wave under the bright sunshine, as it swept on to the frozen seas, far behind us.

The cart was light, the horses pretty well rested, and the law of the inverse ratio began to operate, so that a dog-trot became even Dan Rice's habitual gait. Twenty-five miles were put behind us the first day, and we came to camp by twilight on the wooded banks of a beautiful river. Rounding its curve we came in sight of a camp-fire, around which were huddled three Red Lake Indians—a father and his two sons. We fraternized directly, amazing them with a prodigal gift of tea, and saved the trouble of cooking our supper by being invited to share their huge kettle of boiled ducks. As far as we could learn they had supped twice already, but this did not prevent them from eating a third time. The old man, in the abundance of his hospitality, even tore strips from the sheet of white bark, which was all their shelter from the wind, to make torches for us, twisting the strip into a roll, impaling it diagonally on a stick thrust in the ground, and lighting its upper end. The engorgement of the red-skins convinced us of their honesty for the night, and we all slept with both eyes shut; and when we waked in the morning and found two of our four horses gone, we accused only the quadrupeds of theft. We scoured the woods and the prairies in vain, and finally set the Indians on the hunt, ourselves watching by the camp. The red leaves of autumn, like flakes of blood, drifted down from the branches of the trees, and floated away on the surface of the stream. The soft whirr of the wings of ducks alighting or flying was a foil to the solemn stillness in which the ungathered harvests fell before the silent sickle of the wind, and the pomp and summer glory of the year made ready for its winter shroud.

Before night one of the horses had been found, and the next afternoon an Indian messenger returned with another from Pembina in lieu of the one lost. We loaded our carts and traveled on for a few miles, camping beside a huge marsh. Two or three hours before daylight the postmaster awoke by chance, and aroused us with the cry of "Prairie on fire!" At the west of us the whole sky was lit up with lurid fire. Great surging billows of smoke swelled up against the black, starless sky, their under sides reddened all over with the reflection from the flames below. The wind was blowing almost directly upon us, and we could feel the gusts of hot wind every moment alternating with the cool night breeze. It was easy to see that the fire was gaining upon us rapidly. While we stood gazing the swift flames had come so fast and far that we could already see their fiery tips flickering above the green grass, a long advancing line stretching far away to the northward. Every moment the devouring lips came nearer, and lifted themselves higher, and the huge molten billows swept on toward us in vast volume and solid phalanx, as if to engulf us and plunge us in the conflagration below. There was no time to be lost. We found the horses, that were all standing fascinated by the glare, and beginning to tremble with excitement and fright, harnessed and saddled them, turned their heads to the south, obliquely away from the direction of the wind, and at the end of an hour's fast riding were past the limit of its southernmost line.

Red Lake River is the largest of the tributaries of Red River, excepting only the Assiniboine. Indeed it bears the same relation to the Red River above its mouth as the Missouri to the Upper Mississippi. It is itself the main stream. We came to its banks one afternoon, at the spot figured in the sketch below, dined, and then attempted the passage. The water was high, and the river wide. By wading it on horseback we soon found the easiest spot to cross. It was necessary to enter the stream from a projecting spit of land, make head against its current for a few rods, then turn where the deep channel was narrowest, wade through it, and keep on a long, shallow bar to the opposite shore. The force of the current in the deepest part was more than any but a strong man could stand against, and even over the shallow bar, to wade, was like forcing one's legs through dry sand.

We emptied the cart, laid bars on the top, piled our goods and chattels upon them, weighting the upper side so that the current might not tip the cart over, and, one of us standing upon the same side, with Dan Rice harnessed between the shafts, we entered the water. With coaxing and thrashing and shoving, Dan was induced to pull the cart up stream as far as the turning point, where we were to cross the deep channel. Feeling the force of the water against his legs, sideways, here, and anxious probably for his equine equilibrium, not another step would he budge, though we besought, and pulled, and solicited, and shoved, and thrashed, and dragged him, as we three best could, on horseback or up to armpit in the cold water. It was of no use; Dan could not or would not go on: there was nothing left, therefore, but to drive him back, and try one of the other horses. But return was as bad as to go o'er. The obstinate brute would move in no direction, and for aught we could see seemed willing to stand in his tracks till the waters had washed him, piecemeal, from off the face of the earth. We all then jumped into the water, unharnessed the balky wretch, backed the cart down the stream to the shore, and led Dan out. The other horses failed from sheer weakness. Each did his best, but got no further than Dan had tried to go. Indeed a little black horse came nearer drowning than swimming. The current knocked out his legs from under him, and had not Joseph lifted his nose above water by jumping on the hinder end of the cart, we should have had four legs the less to get home with.

The afternoon was already more than half gone; the horses too tired to be ridden back and forth through the water any longer with safety; and Joseph, not in good health, had already exceeded prudence; so it only remained for the postmaster and myself to shoulder our bags and boxes and ferry them over bipedally. Superfluities had no chance of transportation—that terrible strain upon the muscles could be endured only for what was necessary to take us to civilization again, so that it was only for guns, pemmican, blankets, and frying-pans, and not at all for dressing-cases, steel-pen coats, and French mirrors that we terebrated the stony bottom of the river with our great toes and blistered the soles of our feet. Last of all we took the cart to pieces, and with a long rope, of which we both had hold, floated over successively the box and wheels. One feather's-weight more must have swept us down the river.

OTTER TAIL CITY.

In two or three days more of rapid travel, crossing Sand Hill, Rice, and Buffalo rivers, we reached the Leaf Mountains, seen at the north of us when we were near Osakis Lake, left two more of our horses exhausted on the way; and at the end of another day's journey came to Detroit Lake, a fine sheet of water, skirted by a noble forest. The trail led us for twelve miles through its delightful shade. We loaded our cart with pigeons and partridges, shot en passant, discarding here the last of our pemmican, and the next noon dined at Otter Tail City, the whole of which is seen in the cut above. Six miles further on we came to Leaf City (houses one, population one), slept within four walls, rested a day while the rain poured, and on the 1st day of October, through sloughs innumerable and fathomless, came to the Crow Wing crossing—a rope ferry over the river of the name—from which there was continuous water, not to Arctic, but to Tropic seas and the Atlantic.

One more day's journey brought us to the "Agency," where two or three thousand Chipewya Indians were assembled to receive their annual payment; and to Crow Wing, a thriving village on the Mississippi, just below the junction of the Crow Wing River, whence stages, steamboats, and railway cars, soon carried us to our respective homes.

MORE ABOUT SPIDERS.

"It was no snake, I verily believe,
But a sly spider that seduc'd poor Eve."

IT would be a great mistake to suppose this order (Arachnida) can be exhausted in a few Magazine articles. Volumes could not contain all that may be said of them: the varieties, the changes, the habits, the manœuvres; the marvelous instinct, the philosophical subjection to circumstances; the eagerness with which life is enjoyed when they are free; and the resignation, content, and patience with which it is borne when in a state of captivity; the maternal affection, the devotion to their young; the industry, the ingenuity, the combination, the tact. The exhibitions of almost reflecting powers approximate this division of Natural History to that of our humanity in a degree most startling, most overwhelming, to a close observer of their habits and modes of existence.

I propose in this paper to present some illustrations of their nests, a few warlike incidents, and some remarks concerning the mysteries of their organization, which will place the reader on the threshold of a kingdom, into which, if he have patience and courage to advance, will open never-ending subjects of study, and produce most convincing proofs of Divine instruction given to all creatures. There are most marvelous exhibitions of instinct; of the combining of purposes to produce certain results which would cover a man, unless he were a Christian believer, with dismay and terror. There is no room here for a single thought save that of the majesty of a Creator; for even in the falling of the spider's thread must be seen the finger that directs and the hand that guides.

The bee builds now as she did thousands of years ago in Paradise. The ant excavates her subterranean city or builds her mounds of clay as she did when the world was young. The wasp rolls out the paper for her palace with the same patience and assiduity that were expended upon the first specimen hung beneath the stars. The moth seeks the same flowers which she did when the moon glimmered down for the first time upon the sheen of her golden wings. The butterfly sips at early dawn the same nectar which she sought when the flowers first opened their cups to the earliest dew that fell from the blue canopy of the then near and embracing heaven. There is never any change in their routine; the never-varying process of their labors is always the same. But the spider will accommodate itself to any thing, to any position, to any circumstance. It will submit to a total annihilation of old habits; and, what is more, succumbs cheerfully, patiently, resignedly. No position ever finds them at fault. They are never at a loss to provide for an emergency; and, unlike man, whom they resemble in so many points, they never despair—they never lose time in repining.

The nests which I am about to present are probably not precisely what they would have been if built in the solitude of the forest, or beside the lonely rocks; still they do not depart from the natural procedure of the architects, but are simply proofs of what I have said above, showing their capacity for succumbing to circumstances and adapting themselves to the accidents of life.

For instance, the Lycosa Gyrophora—Lycosa of the Lichen—(Figure 1) if at liberty, would have spread her web over a space of nearly a foot, covering the lichen or moss which she had chosen with a very thickly woven sheet, fastened down closely on all sides, in the centre of which would have been placed her treasure—the egg-bag. To one thread would have been attached every line; and this she would have held so firmly, that not a midge with its delicate wing could have touched a line but she would have been on the alert to resent the insult.

The architect of the nest, represented in Figure 2, was obliged to adapt herself to new circumstances. She was placed, in the hurry of capture, under a glass in which was a piece of the lichen that grows on rocks every where. I had forgotten that there was another inhabitant concealed there—a pretty little Epeira belonging to the same locality, whose nest was in course of construction with the two dead leaves you perceive. The first performance of the Lycosa, after she had examined the premises, made her toilet, and ascertained her true position, was to devour the poor little Epeira. This done, she cut away and cleared off all the labor of the former occupant, and before noon the next day she had constructed the nest before you.

It is impossible for pen or pencil to convey the beauty of the silvery strands—resembling floss silk—which compose the nest. It was laid over and around the lichen, and was so strongly attached to the paper on which the glass stood that it can not be detached without cutting it away, piece by piece, with a knife. The egg-bag is placed under the floss, and is elaborately covered with a dense golden-brown sheet of silk; and over all this strong coarse lines are carried around and over the leaves, attaching every part firmly together, and more firmly to the paper. And here the owner sat, from day to day, watching and brooding, eating and reposing, for six long months. But on the tenth day of the seventh month she roused herself, cut away the silk leading to the egg-bag; crept in, examined it; detached and opened one end of it; came out, renewed the broken threads, spun a fresh cover over the whole, and toward evening gathered herself close up to the golden bag and died. Her eggs had evidently never been impregnated.

This is not a large specimen, being her first year. They live along river-courses, wherever the lichens grow affluently, and where they are not likely to be disturbed. They are very shy and timid, and you must look close to find one. Toward winter, and if they remain over to the next spring, they burrow far under the rocks.

The next specimen (Figure 3) is the Thoridion schizopoda, so called from her claws being so singularly divided. How she would have woven her nest if free I can not tell; but one morning I found this beautiful little purse (Figure 4), elaborated as you see it, under the glass. It is the prettiest, daintiest little affair conceivable, combining beauty, strength, and elasticity. It is impervious to water. No moisture will adhere to it. I have tried several times to sink it, without success. It is composed of strong white silk over a stronger frame of dark-brown. The apparent opening around the rim is tightly closed with coarse brown silk; and it was attached to the glass in the manner represented, line for line. The spider generally composed herself between the lines attached to the bottom. She did not live over six weeks in confinement. Her food did not suit. In her natural state it would have been the small meadow grasshopper and locusts. Beef and flies were not to her taste. When full-grown, this spider will cover a space of three inches in circumference. Fine specimens can be found in meadow lands any where.

The Clubiona filices—Fern Clubiona—(Figure 5) is a most ferocious dame. She constructs her web far under the falling branches of the fern thickets, and she will dispute any attempt to disturb her. Had it been possible to have been bitten by a spider, when I captured this one I should have experienced her disposition to do all the harm she was capable of effecting. I nearly drew her legs off in detaching her claws from my glove. She had hidden her castle and herself in the deepest recesses of the fern bushes, and if the regularity with which the leaves were drawn together had not attracted my attention,

I should have missed her. But on a closer examination I found that they covered a silken ball (Figure 6) of nearly the diameter of a half dollar, with the fern leaves closely concealing it. She must either have been injured in our fight, or she must have died from rage, for she lived only a few hours after her capture.

On a branch just above the nest of the Clubiona hung a nest of the Epeira filices—Epeira of the Fern (Figure 7). It was but recently finished; the fresh leaves had not had time to wither or fade. There was no opening perceptible, except a thinness of the web where you perceive the dark spot between the leaves. This I broke away, and out crawled a pretty little pale-brown spider. She had a ball of eggs within, confined nicely with two bands resembling white satin ribbon. She died before the eggs were hatched. When I saw the little ones working out I placed them in a garden, where they (at least some scores of them) flourished finely.

The Ctenus tangeneus—Touching Ctenus—is rare. She is thus called from her propensity for touching a thing and drawing back again and again. You might suppose her blind by her manoeuvres until you rouse her; but she then shows that she can clutch tight enough. She is brown, covered with very black hairs. Her claws are very simple, but equal, and able to hold the slightest thread. She draws down the end of a long grass leaf and spins her web as you see in Figure 8. The centre resembles a finely-woven linen button. When she considers herself in a place of safety her bag may be seen hanging as represented; but on the slightest alarm it is caught in her jaws and she drops to the ground. You need not seek her now. Before you can wink twice she is some yards away, gliding like lightning from leaf to leaf, from branch to branch. They are the fleetest creatures known, I think; and if by chance you can pursue one closely she changes her run into a succession of long leaps, doubling and dodging like the hare. But no matter what her haste or fright may be, she never relinquishes her bag. This is of a dark lead-color, and the eggs are yellow.

Notwithstanding my limited space, I must present the charming little Clubiona agaricus—Mushroom Clubiona—(Figure 9). She is a most brilliant creature. The red with which her body is colored is a most peculiar shade, and as the light falls upon it the variety of hues is most astonishing. She is very small, and carries her egg-bag—a dark-colored affair—attached to her. She weaves her nest under the bell of the mushroom. It is thick, and closely woven of white silk. Here she dwells, devouring all the small flies and gnats attracted by the locality where mushrooms grow, or the glutinous stuff thrown off by them. She is always busy, and apparently changes her location daily. If she remains till spring she works her way under turf or manure, and can often be found near a bed of the latter, concealed under a close web spun in the hollow of a clod, or in the space between two small clods, which are connected by her web. Here she remains in safety until her summer domicile shoots up in a night; and her chosen home gladdens her longing sight once more. Again her chamber is hung with its silvery upholstery, her egg-bag safely deposited therein. Then, with content, feeling her labors ended, she drops beside her treasure and calmly expires.

Those entomologists (Walckenaer and others) who propose to class spiders from the manner of habits very remotely, or from analogy presumed that they never vary. This is most decidedly erroneous, as any one who chooses can convince himself.

Here is before me now a small Epeira, of the size of a large pin-head—a fac-simile, but in miniature, of the Epeira diadema—the large geometrical garden spider. You might suppose that she was the young of this species, if you did not perceive her maturity by her egg-bag. Three days ago she spun a most scientific and perfect web. Radii and circles, as if measured by rule, hung between a branch of fuschia and the top of a geranium. She had eleven lines running down to the jars to secure the web; and here she swung all day. Early next morning she cut away the whole fabric, transferring herself to another geranium, and there spun a long, vertical, triangular web, with loose lines running in every direction close to the earth. Here she watched the entire day. This morning a long suspension-bridge, of more than twenty cables, runs up to an ivy branch; and here she is now performing upon the tight-rope with apparently great enjoyment. Now all this you may suppose “a freak of fancy." Not so; she is wisely providing for her own comfort. In the jar where grows the ivy a small Tipula had deposited her eggs, and the newly-escaped flies are coming forth by dozens. Already the lower web is spangled with their wings, and these irregular lines serve her purpose equally as well—far better, in fact—than the elaborate web of two days ago. A hundred such instances can be deduced, which renders such a classification, at least in this country, worthless.

Let us turn now to a consideration of other faculties. Spiders are susceptible of anger and revenge, affection and friendship, and the love of companionship, even when in captivity with other insects whose most violent opponents they would be if in a state of freedom. I have verified these observations in an endless number of instances. A Lycosa and a Beetle hibernated in the earth in the same jar all winter. An Epeira and a Lady-bird lived together under a glass nine months in most affectionate companionship. I have now another under a glass with two small beetles, living most amicably. Often the spider can be seen close between her two companions, apparently enjoying a friendly gossip. They have been thus domiciled nearly three months. Put under the glass a fly, a rose-bug, or any other insect, and it is trussed up in a second. I have starved her five days at a time, and yet the little beetles went unscathed.

Their affection for their young, their industry, ingenuity, perseverance, and instinct, I need not here recapitulate. But some of their manœuvres and manner of defense in their various rencontres may be amusing.

A pleasant day last August I was busy in a garden, behind some shrubbery, lying in wait to entrap a Lace-Wing, who was occupied depositing her eggs on some dahlia plants near by. My attention soon became absorbed in watching the uneasy movements of a very small Epeira—(Figure 10)—a pretty little thing, nearly white, shaded with green. They are generally seen about six weeks at this season, feeding on the minute Tipulæ and Culicides (Gnats), which come forth as second broods about this time. She was very restless, moving around, up and down, as if hesitating whether to abandon her web or not. I looked behind the lilac bush on which her web was hung, and there perceived the cause of her alarm. A Drassus (Figure 10), which would have made a hundred of her bulk, was keenly watching her chance. She had constructed a bridge from the tough leaves of a species of South American aloe. You can see (Figure 11) how her cables were placed; but you must understand that these, though they look like single lines, were really more than twenty double; and as they vibrate with the gentle breeze you might have conceived them to be threads of silver. The chief one ran down, as you see, to a hole under the grass, where her family were just coming into existence.—Hunger was the cause of her present proceedings. Her anxiety for her young prevented her from hunting for food farther away. How long this contest had been going on I could not surmise; but now I seated myself to watch its conclusion. Most unequal were the adversaries; and any one little conversant with such affairs would have supposed it could have but one termination—in favor of the Drasseus. Four long hours did each plot and counterplot—hiding under leaves, and watching each other's movements with most direful animosity. I was rather weary, I must confess, and concluded to return to my Lace-Wing, when I saw the giantess march haughtily across her bridge, determined to storm her enemy's castle, and die or be victorious.

"Poor little one!" thought I, "your doom is sealed! What a bon-bon you will prove!"

It must be remembered that these pulmonaria see only on a level, or with their heads down, never upward. As soon as she had disappeared under the leaves, and was evidently ascending, the little Epeira dropped down and struck the main cable, and quick as lightning swung up to the point of the aloe leaf. Her enemy, distracted at the idea of some intruder visiting her own nest, hastened to retrace her steps. But just as she reached the angle of the two lines (at a) the little one silently dropped down upon her, and fixed those minute fangs into the body where the thorax joins the abdomen. The battle was over, the victory won. I was startled at the unexpected cheer which escaped me at such an amazing exhibition of foresight and management. In the afternoon late, when I visited the spot, the enemy was wound up in a silken ball and hung to the aloe leaf, a warning to all future intruders. The little heroine was reposing from her fright and fatigue. I wish she could have understood my congratulations. But by-and-by, when the moon gets up, she may probably, if not too lazy or compassionate, visit her enemy's home, over the silken bridge she took so much pains to build, and sup on her young. Ah! does not retribution meet us at every turn?

There is a different way of settling such difficulties. This Epeira fasciata (Figure 12), all orange and black in bands—a most gorgeous dame—had her home on a pot of earth on which stood a small gallipot with a branch of lilac stuck in it. Here, under the glass, she lived many months. She went up leisurely every day and renewed the glutinous web hung at the top. I do not know whether she would have adopted this proceeding if at liberty. I rather think, however, that she would have done so from the smallness of the almost imperceptible outlets in her spinnerules. Put in a dozen flies, in a few evolutions they stuck fast. When hungry she would ascend, walk over the stuff without any hinderance, select her victim, use him up, often three at a meal, then renew the snare, and descend to the earth in the lower jar and make her toilet.

At last I got weary of this monotonous way of living, and put under the glass as a companion, or at least a change of victims, a Thoridion migratum (Figure 13)—a common brown spider, found in gardens and hot-houses. The Epeira ascended with all the empressement imaginable, examined the intruder, gave her a contemptuous sneer, we may presume, and paused to reflect what next should be done. In the mean time the Thoridion was examining the new premises rather carelessly and indifferently. In a few minutes—as if she had made up her mind—a system of teasing and petty annoyances began on the part of the Epeira, to which, after a while, the Thoridion determined not to submit any longer. Then a chase began round the edge of the jar. Round and round they went. Sometimes the Epeira allowed the Thoridion to almost touch her. Bets were made by the spectators—against my opinion or supposition—of how it would end. When the race was at its most exciting point the Epeira dropped on her path the fatal snare. A few steps more, and the enemy stuck fast. Pull away ever so fiercely, not a leg could be drawn forth. The Epeira descended calmly to her lower station, rested from her fatigue, and when she thought her enemy sufficiently exhausted from struggling, went up, nipped her to secure her certain death; then bit her free, and carelessly pitching the body over the ramparts, went up to sup.

The next instance is still more puzzling. You may, after I have finished my account, decide upon what principle, instinct, or motive the Lycosa acted. I have come to a conclusion that it assimilates very closely to human forethought. She swung at the top of a large glass, and being pressed for a secure place, I fancied the long-legged Phalangium (Figure 14) might repose at the bottom without giving offense. Not so. In a few minutes down she came to examine the intruder. Her ire was up, and I soon saw a fight in prospective. It would be very unequal, for Long-legs has but two eyes, and they placed on her back—her food being the Acarus telatarius (Red Spider of hot-houses), and other mites found on plants. She needs them placed thus to secure her sustenance. The Phalangium is classed in the third family of the Trachean Arachnida, as it breathes through tracheæ like other insects; that is to say, through vessels which receive the aerial fluid, and distributing it through ramifications in every part of the body, thus remedying the want of circulation as it is found in the Pulmonary Arachnida.

The Lycosa, without loss of time, "pitched into her" literally (Figure 15). Imagine her dismay when those long legs (in some they have fifty joints) lengthened out and elevated the speck of a body far away out of the reach of her fangs—she would pass out more enraged than ever. The long summer's night I sat a spectator to this odd contest. I illuminated the ring grandly, and determined to crown the victor, if it went into next year. Two o'clock struck. The poor Lycosa was almost frantic with rage. Aim where she might, the long legs descended over her like a shadow. Three—four rung out over the silent hills. I was becoming weary, and, apparently, so was the Lycosa. She lay stretched close up against the glass; her flashing eyes, scintillating with rage, fixed upon poor Long-legs, as if meditating what next step to take. A few more minutes passed, when up she sprung, with one bound, and snapped off like pipe-stems the two front legs, four joints up. So it went on, until only an entire one amidst the stumps was left. With this the Phalangium buffeted her adversary most superbly; but all in vain. Away went this leg at last, and down on her thigh-joints she sunk. It was all over with her. When the day was dawning she was being nicely trussed up; and the stanch heroine soon clambered up to her loosely woven castle—satisfied, no doubt, that she had done a good night's work.

The Lycosæ (Figures 16, 17, 19) are never seen in the daytime, and I doubt if they can see except in the dark, although their eyes are very bright.

This must be the last battle which I may record: In this old gate (Figure 19) lived a peaceful Tegenaria, spinning and weaving as if she might be waiting another Ulysses. One day came (Figure 17) this gayly-dressed Lycosa (Figure 18). The bright violet rays scintillating from her drove out modest Penelope into her fortress—the hole in the post—leaving her web suspended without as usual. I had often noticed her in my walks, and had determined upon kidnapping her when she had finished her labor of love—the egg-bag. On visiting the spot, one afternoon, I beheld a new tenant beside the old gate. The home was finished—a nice silken tube near the roots of a tree, and a few cables run carelessly up to the bar above. But neither occupant was to be seen. I took a straw and pushed in to the residence of the Tegenaria. Softly as it was done, I perceived she was within, with a powerful web spun over each side of the hole. Then I knew the quarrel had begun.

I went to our violet friend, and penetrated with the straw into her domestic concerns. Up she came, foaming with rage, dashed up her cables, and across the bar to the domicile of the quiet little body over the way. She was determined one or the other should vacate without delay. Forthwith she commenced biting and tearing at the entrance nearest the web. I went round to watch proceedings. I was astonished to find the Tegenaria remained so quietly within. More and more furious became the attack. In a few moments out came the Tegenaria, with her bag between her jaws, and down the post she ran in the greatest haste. The Lycosa was well in by this time, and I was anxiously watching for her to come out the opposite side. But this was never to be. The interior of the web must have been made highly glutinous, the legs and mandibles of the poor Lycosa were so clogged it was impossible for her to extricate herself. Struggle as she might, she was caught. The Tegenaria hid her bag safely under the grass, and came sedately and slowly over the rail; behind, her adversary, and was preparing to finish her—the sly vixen!—when I put my bottle over the hole and drove her in. I secured the bag, and with difficulty drew out the Lycosa. It was impossible to detach the web. I was enabled to obtain her bright colors during her struggles. She soon died, and fifteen minutes after she was as black as she well could be. The Tegenaria lived to be eaten by her children—a sacrifice of herself she seemed delighted to make.

I have mentioned elsewhere that the females of this family are invariably nearly double the size of the males, and are found vastly outnumbering them, owing to the habit they have of devouring their lovers. Besides this difference, the male spider of every subgenera has a great bulging out of the palpi, which appears, so far as I have seen, to differ in every individual even belonging to the same division, as you may perceive in the parts of Thoridions represented (Figure 21). No matter how very dissimilar the palpi may be in individuals, they seldom differ in other parts of the body exteriorly. Therefore it has been concluded by some entomologists that the palpi of the male have very much to do in the impregnating of the eggs; but the Eleusinean secrets of this kingdom are still hidden from mortal ken, as far as my authorities go, judging from my own and their experience. Conjectures are not facts, and should not be admitted by the advocates of truth.

In the subdivision of Clotho I must state an exception to the general rule. You perceive (Figure 21, D) an appendage to the abdomen of the male. I have never met with it on any of the others. In illustrating these palpi you see them, as it were, closed, but on the approach of the female the expanse and ramifications these members exhibit would be enough to frighten any nervous person. In observing the male Clotho, which I came upon very unexpectedly, not perceiving that the female was near by, I congratulated myself on the discovery of something very new—a wonderful creature. The palpi were double the length and size of his whole body, and he appeared the most extraordinary creature ever seen. I had to touch him several times before he would change his position, he was so entranced; but at last, the female becoming alarmed, and scampering off, he concluded to follow her, but they both very unexpectedly found themselves in a bottle. Several times afterward I saw the expanding of these palpi, but could not get the glass near enough to authorize an illustration in this position.

We have all heard a great deal, and seen a vast deal written, about the ferocity of spiders, their cruelty, their insatiable appetite, and their dislike to companionship. I have seen seven varieties spinning their webs on one bush, and it is rare if ever a spider can be found truly isolated. There is always one or more not far away. To be sure, they do not work together, like other insects, as the bee, the wasp. They, indeed, like wise human beings, dislike crowds or jams.

As for their appetite and their ferocity, if they could throw stones, should we not hear some smashing of glass? But the poet has answered this charge so well I will give you his suggestions:

"Arn't you a murd'rer?" gravely Susan cries;
Arn't you forever busy with that claw,
Killing poor unoffending little flies,
Merely to satisfy your nasty maw?"

"But, Susan, don't you feed on gentle lamb?
Don't you on pretty pigeons cram?"

Don't you on harmless fishes often dine?"

"That's very true," quoth Susan; "true, indeed."

"Oh! with what eloquence these spiders plead—
This little rascal beats a grave divine."

SAINT BARBARA.

"WHAT a queer little body!" exclaimed one fashionable lady to another as a girl passed through the room, leading a child by the hand, and carrying one in her arms.

"Our Barby."

"Where in the wide world did you discover such a funny specimen of humanity?" laughed the first speaker. "She looks as if modeled from one of Punch's caricatures."

"Oh, we've had Barby, as the children call her, for a long time; and I don't know what we should do without her."

Now Barbara was not very comely to look upon. Truly, as the lady said, she was a queer little body. Almost dwarfish in stature, her head was so large as to look out of all proportion. Not a feature in her face seemed rightly adjusted. One eye was lower than the other, and set at a different angle; and both were singularly small for the size of her face, which was broad and round as a full moon. Her nose was neither Roman nor Grecian, and yet it made a prominent feature, and had a very decided expression. The mouth was large, but not coarse or sensual; the chin delicate and receding. Barbara's manner of walking was not what people call graceful. Her short, round, thick person—she was all waist or none, as you might choose to have it—swayed from side to side in a duck-like manner. There is a word that exactly expresses the gait, but we will not use it. We are not holding "little Barby" up to ridicule.

"I know very well what I would do with her," said the visitor.

"What?"

"Send her to a menagerie, or any where else."

"Why so?" The lady looked a little serious.

"Oh, because I wouldn't have such a hideous monster about me. I would no more trust my children with her than I would with an orang outang. One glance at her face and person is enough for me. No beautiful soul is enshrined in that deformed body. Depend upon it, nature never hangs out a sign like that, except in warning."

"We know Barbara," was the confident, quietly spoken answer.

"You may think you know her. And so we thought we knew our kitten, until one day it struck its sharp claw in baby's face."

"What an elegant silk!" said the lady to her visitor, changing a subject that was growing unpleasant to her. "Where did you get it?"

"At Levy's."

"Has he any more of the same style?"

"Yes. There were two or three other charming patterns when I selected this."

And then the conversation went ranging away upon themes not of interest in connection with our present subject—the humble, homely Barbara. It is just ten years since she entered Mrs. Grayson's family. She was then only twelve years old. It was not much that Barbara could remember of her parents. They were poor working people, who did not manage to get along well, and Barbara's earliest memories had not, therefore, many sunny gleams to brighten them. She was not more than six years old when her mother died, leaving her, an unlovely child, to the unwilling charity of strangers. The six years that followed were marked by many sufferings. The poor child rarely had a kind word from any one. Mrs. Grayson first saw her in her kitchen, one cold winter morning, with a milk-pail serving them with milk.

"Bless me!" she exclaimed to the cook, after the child went out. "What a singular looking girl! Who is she?"

"Some oddity that our milk-woman has picked up," replied the cook.

"How long has she been coming here?"

"About two weeks; and I'm really getting to like the funny thing."

Once seen, Barbara's image was not likely to fade from the mind. Mrs. Grayson thought of her several times during the day, and on the next morning dropped down early into the kitchen. Barbara came in from the frosty air just as Mrs. Grayson entered, her face almost purple with cold. She set down her milk-pails and stood up between them, almost as cylinder-like in form as they, though by no means proportionally taller. There was an almost ludicrous expression of suffering on her singular face.

"Why, you're 'most frozen, child," said Mrs. Grayson.

"Indeed and it's bitter cold, ma'am," replied the little girl, putting to her mouth her red finger-tips, which protruded through the worn woolen gloves that covered her hands, and blowing with an energy that made her breath almost whistle against them.

"What is your name?" asked the lady.

"My name's Barby, ma'am."

"Barbara."

"Yes, ma'am; but they call me Barby."

"Have you a mother?"

"No, ma'am."

"Nor father?"

"No, ma'am."

Barbara's answers were made in a prompt, even, rather musical tone of voice, in which was no sign of weakness.

"How long have you been serving milk around?" asked Mrs. Grayson.

"Two or three weeks, ma'am," replied Barbara. "Susan got sick and went away, and Mrs. Miller said I must try my hand at serving customers."

And the child stooped as she spoke, and taking the cover from one of her pails, began filling the cook's pitcher with her usual allowance of milk. This done, she replaced the cover, and without stopping to be the recipient of any further kind inquiries, braced herself up to the work of carrying the two heavy vessels, and went trudging away on her round of duty.

"It's a shame," said the cook, "to put such work on a mere child. But some people have no mercy."

Mrs. Grayson sighed, and went in a thoughtful mood from the kitchen.

One morning toward the end of January, when the snow lay thick upon the ground, the cook tapped at Mrs. Grayson's door and said,

"I wish, ma'am, that you'd just come down and look at Barby."

"What's the matter with her?" asked the lady.

"Well, I think, ma'am, that you ought to see her," replied the cook.

"Very well. I'll be down in a moment," said Mrs. Grayson, and she hurried on her morning wrapper and descended to the kitchen.

There stood little Barbara between her milk-pails, just stooping to the task of lifting the heavy burdens. The cook had been trying to keep her until Mrs. Grayson came down, but Barbara had no time to lose, for customers were waiting; and her sense of duty, or fear of punishment—which may not be known—was too strong to let her wait, even with the hope of seeing the lady who had once spoken to her kindly.

Mrs. Grayson saw at a glance that hardship or sickness had been making sad work with the child. The round, healthy face had changed to one of suffering and emaciation; and there was a shrunken look about her figure that contrasted strongly with its former plumpness. As she raised her eyes Mrs. Grayson saw in them a look that moved her sympathy.

"I wish, ma'am," said cook, "that you would just look at Barby's feet."

"I can't stay a minute longer." And Barbara stood up straight, lifting by the act her pails a few inches from the floor. "I'm late now, and people want their milk."

"Let them want it," said cook, dogmatically, stepping forward as she spoke, and taking out of Barbara's little hands the two heavy pails, which she placed on a table beyond her reach.

"Oh, but Mrs. Miller will be angry!" urged the child in distress. "And then, you know, people want their milk. They can't have breakfast until I get round."

"Now, ma'am," said the cook, "just look at them feet! Did you ever see the like in all your born days?"

She grasped Barbara by the arms, and, placing her on a chair, lifted one of her feet, which was covered with the remnant of a woollen stocking and an old slipshod leather shoe. Through rents and worn places in the wet stocking shone the fiery skin, which was cracked and ulcerated.

"Bless my heart!" exclaimed Mrs. Grayson, sickening at the sight. "Take off the stocking, Jane," she added.

The stocking was removed, exhibiting the extent to which the foot was diseased. There were great cracks in the heel, the edges of which were of a dark purple, as if mortification were threatened. The whole foot was of a deep-red color, and the tense skin shone as if polished.

"Only chilblains, Mrs. Miller says," remarked Barbara. She did not speak in a tone of complaint.

"Let me see the other foot," said Mrs. Grayson.

Jane removed the old shoe and stocking and exhibited a foot in even a worse condition.

"How do they feel?" asked the lady.

"Oh, ma'am, they itch, and burn, and hurt now, dreadfully," replied the child.

"Draw me a bucket of cold water, Jane."

"Yes, ma'am." And Jane turned away quickly.

"Oh dear!" said the child, in distress. "Give me my shoes and stockings. All the people are waiting for breakfast. I'll never get round."

"Put just enough warm water in to take off the chill."

Mrs. Grayson spoke to Jane, not heeding Barbara.

"Will that do?"

"No. It is too warm. I want it just about like cold spring water."

"Do let me go," urged Barbara. "All the people will be angry."

"There; put your feet in," said Mrs. Grayson, as Jane set the bucket down on the floor in front of the child.

"Mrs. Miller will beat me." And tears ran over Barbara's face.

"No, Barby," said Mrs. Grayson, kindly. "Mrs. Miller shall not beat you. I will see to that."

"But you don't know her, ma'am, as I do."

"I'll tell you what I do know, Barby," said Mrs. Grayson, as she knelt on the floor by the singular-looking child, who drew so strongly upon her sympathies, and held her feet in the water. "I know that Mrs. Miller will never hurt a hair of your head."

"But what will people do for their milk this morning?" Barbara was as much troubled on this head as on that which involved consequences to herself.

"Do without it!" was the firm reply. "You are not going from this house to-day."

"Oh dear, ma'am; that won't do. I must go round with my milk."

It was in vain that Barbara plead for freedom to go forward in the way of duty. She was under the control of those who were stronger than she, and resolute. After keeping the child's feet in cold water for nearly ten minutes, or until they had ceased to ache and burn, Mrs. Grayson dried them with a soft napkin until all moisture was removed.

"Now stand up, Barby."

But in attempting to bear her weight Barbara cried out with sudden pain, while the blood started from many gaping sores on her feet.

"You see, Barby," said Mrs. Grayson, kindly, "that there is to be no more serving of milk to-day. Jane," she added, "can't you take her up to the little room next to yours? There is a bed in it, you know."

The cook's heart was in all this. So she lifted Barbara in her strong arms and carried her up stairs, followed by Mrs. Grayson.

"I think she has fever," said Jane, as she placed her on the bed. "Just feel how hot her hand is!"

"Yes; I noticed that," replied Mrs. Grayson. "The child has considerable fever. In fact, she's sick enough to be in bed instead of on the street carrying milk-pails; and in bed we must place her. So, do you help her off with her clothes while I go for one of Helen's wrappers."

"Indeed, ma'am," urged Barbara to this, "I can't lie here; Mrs. Miller will be so angry; and what will the people do for their milk?" This was the question that troubled the poor child most of all.

"Do without it, and who cares!" answered Jane, who was getting provoked at Barbara's great concern for her customers.

"I care," said the child, speaking in a firm voice. "They expect me, and I've never disappointed them. Every body's breakfast will be waiting."

"Not every body's by a large number," replied Mrs. Grayson, smiling. "But don't let that trouble you. What can't be cured must be endured."

"I wish Mrs. Miller knew about it," said Barbara, still pursuing the theme.

"Where does she live?"

Barbara gave the direction. It was not far away.

"I'll send her word to come and get her milk-pails."

This satisfied the child, who, now that the strain was off of her, was showing more and more exhaustion. Jane removed her soiled and scanty garments, and laid her under the bed-clothes.

"I do believe I am sick," said Barbara, in her artless way, lifting her eyes languidly and looking up at Mrs. Grayson. "What a kind lady you are! God will bless you for being good to poor little Barby."

Her voice, which was singularly soft and sweet, died faintly away, and her lids fell heavily over her eyes. Mrs. Grayson, who was touched with pity for the strange child, and who felt her interest increasing every moment, laid her hand upon her forehead. It was burning; and the sunken cheeks bore the deep flush of fever.

Two weeks passed before Barbara was able to sit up. During the first week she was delirious for nearly three days; and the physician said that her life was in danger. In the beginning he feared that she had an eruptive fever; and there was some anxiety on the part of Mrs. Grayson for her children. But this apprehension soon gave way; and then her two little ones—Jenny and Katy—made their way to Barbara's chamber, and spent most of their time there. At first her uncomely face repelled them, but when she spoke the charm of her voice drew them toward her like magnetism.

The love of children was born in the heart of Barbara; and she was delighted to have Jenny and Katy in her room. As soon as she was able to sit up she amused them by various little arts and devices which she had learned, and read to them out of the books they brought to her. In the beginning of this intercourse Mrs. Grayson watched Barbara very closely, and questioned the children minutely as to what she said to them. She was soon satisfied that all was right. That although she had come up amidst rudeness, temptation, and exposure to vice, she was untainted by the atmosphere she had been compelled to breathe; that she was pure in heart as one of her own little ones.

"Barby," said the lady to her one day, after she was able to sit up in a chair for several hours at a time, "How would you like to live with me?"

A flash of light went over the little girl's face, and she looked at Mrs. Grayson in an eager, hopeful, bewildered manner, as if she half thought herself dreaming.

"I'm in earnest, Barby. How would you like to live with me?"

"What could I do, ma'am?"

"My nurse is going away. Don't you think you could take her place?"

"I love Jenny, and Katy, and the baby," was Barbara's answer.

"That's one qualification," said the lady.

"And I'm strong when I'm well."

Mrs. Grayson thought of the two great milk-pails and was satisfied on that head.

"And I'll do just what you tell me to do."

"Very well, Barby, I think we may settle it that you are to live with me as my nurse. If you love the children, and are strong, and will do just what I tell you, I can ask no more."

"But," said Barbara, a troubled look coming into her face, "maybe Mrs. Miller won't give me up."

"Why not?"

"She says I'm bound to her. A lady asked me once if I wouldn't come to her house and live. When I told Mrs. Miller she got dreadful angry, and said if I dared to go away she'd bring me back."

"Did you ever go any where with her, and put your name, or mark, on a paper?"

"No, ma'am."

"Then you're not bound to her."

"Oh yes, I am, though. She made me promise on the Bible, a good while ago, that I'd live with her for five years. And it isn't two years yet. I didn't want to do it, but she made me."

"Why did she exact this promise, Barby?"

"I don't know, ma'am, unless it was because I was always a-working and a-doing, and got through with almost as much as two girls."

"And you think yourself bound by that promise?"

"Yes, ma'am. If Mrs. Miller won't give me up, I must go back there. I promised on the Bible, you know."

"And to keep your promise you are willing to take up your old hard work again of feeding and milking cows, and serving around milk, instead of coming into this nice house to nurse children whom you love?"

"Yes, ma'am, if Mrs. Miller won't give me up," replied Barbara, firmly but sadly. "I promised on the Bible that I'd live with her five years, and I've only been there two years."

"But, if I understand you, Barby, Mrs. Miller forced you to make this promise."

"She said she'd beat me if I didn't do it."

"Then she compelled you."

"But, ma'am, you see I needn't have promised for all her threats. I could have stood the beating, and held my tongue, if she'd killed me. That's how it was. So, as I've promised, I'm bound."

Struck with her mode of looking at the question and still more interested in her, Mrs. Grayson determined to let matters take their course between Barbara and Mrs. Miller, in order more thoroughly to test the character of this singular child.

"I must send for Mrs. Miller," she said, "and have a talk with her. Perhaps I can induce her to give you up."

Barbara was not very sanguine; and Mrs. Grayson noticed that her face now wore a troubled look. Her heart had leaped at the promise of a better life, in contrast with which the old hard life she had been leading for years looked harder than ever.

Mrs. Miller, who had called already several times to ask about Barbara, but who had not been permitted to see her, was now sent for. The child shrunk back and looked half frightened as the hard, coarse, determined-looking woman entered the room in company with Mrs. Grayson and fixed upon her a pair of cold, cruel, gray eyes. Something like a smile relaxed her withered face as she spoke to Barbara.

"I have sent for you," said Mrs. Grayson, "in order to have a little talk about Barby."

Mrs. Miller nodded.

"Is she bound to you?"

"Yes, ma'am." Promptly and firmly answered.

"Would you like to give her up, if I'd take her?"

"No." Mrs. Miller uttered the little word resolutely.

"In what way is she bound?" queried Mrs. Grayson.

"She's bound all right, ma'am—fast and sure," replied Mrs. Miller, showing some impatience.

"And you can't be induced to part with her?"

"No, ma'am."

"Not for her good? I would like her for a nurse; and that will be so much easier for her, you know."

"She's my girl, Mrs. Grayson," replied the woman to this; "and I don't think it just right for you to be trying to get her away from me. What's mine is mine."

"I'm sorry," said Mrs. Grayson; "and particularly on Barby's account. But, if you won't give her up, why—"

She paused and looked at Barbara. There was an expression of almost hopelessness upon the child's face that touched her deeply.

"Why, I won't." Mrs. Miller finished the sentence. "And now, ma'am," she added, "Barby has been a trouble to you long enough, and had better come home."

"She is not well enough to be moved for two or three days yet," said Mrs. Grayson.

"I don't know about that," replied Mrs. Miller. "She's strong. I reckon she can walk round with a little help. Come, Barby."

Barbara made a motion to rise from her chair.

"Barby can't go to-day," said Mrs. Grayson, speaking in a tone of voice that meant quite as much as her words.

"Not if I say so?" interrogated Mrs. Miller.

"Not even if you say so!" Mrs. Grayson spoke firmly, though she smiled, in order not to arouse the woman's bad temper.

"She's my girl; not yours," said Mrs. Miller.

"Sickness has made her mine at least until she is well enough to be moved with safety," was replied. "And I must insist upon the right which I possess."

"When do you think she will be well enough?"

"In two or three days, I hope."

"Say in three days?"

"Yes."

"Very well, ma'am. Send her home on Saturday."

"You'd better call on that day," said Mrs. Grayson.

"I shall be very busy on Saturday. Can't you send her home?"

"I would prefer to have you call," replied Mrs. Grayson.

"I'll be here, ma'am," said the old woman, rising. "And see here, Barby," addressing the little girl, in a severe tone, "don't let there be any shamming on Saturday. I shall be here for you bright an early."

During the next two days Barbara gained strength slowly, and on Friday was able to go down stairs and about the house. The children were delighted at this, and kept with her all day. Mrs. Grayson observed her closely, and was surprised to see her so cheerful, and so interested in all that pleased Jenny and Katy. She was very quiet in her manner, and from a certain soberness of countenance, and drooping of her eyes when not doing or saying any thing, it was plain that she was not insensible to the great change that awaited her on the morrow.

Saturday came, and Barbara got up early, though still weak from her recent sickness; and when Mrs. Grayson came down stairs, she found her all ready to go when called for by Mrs. Miller.

"And so you are going to leave us, Barby?" said the lady, looking at her kindly.

"Yes, ma'am," replied Barbara, with a little faltering in her voice.

"We don't want you to go, Barby."

"Thank you, ma'am." Barbara looked grateful. "But I'm bound to Mrs. Miller, and you know she says I can't leave her."

"Barby!"

"Ma'am!"

"Mrs. Miller has no right to keep you. You can leave her if you wish to do so."

But the little girl shook her head, and answered,

"I'm bound to her, you know."

"Only by a promise which she forced you to make. She can't hold you for an hour if you choose to leave her. You can stay here and become nurse to the children, and Mrs. Miller can't help it."

"I promised on the Bible," said Barbara, with great seriousness; "and that makes me bound."

Mrs. Grayson did not think it right to press the matter any further. A child's conscience is a tender thing, and already she had tested Barbara's sense of duty nearly beyond the warrant of humanity.

Mrs. Miller had promised to be around, bright and early, and she was as good as her word. In this pause she came in. Barbara turned to Mrs. Grayson, and put out her hand to her, looking up thankfully, even with love in her homely face. She did not speak. Her heart was too full. Mrs. Grayson took her hand and held it tightly.

"Well, Mrs. Miller, so you're here for Barby?" said the lady.

"Yes, ma'am. I said I'd be along this morning. Come, Barby."

Barbara drew on her hand, making an effort to disengage it from that of Mrs. Grayson. But the latter did not relax her hold.

"I think, Mrs. Miller, you'd better let Barbara remain with me. She is not right well and strong yet, and may become sick on your hands."

"Never you fear about that, ma'am. She is not going to get sick. Come, Barby"—the woman's voice showed impatience—"I'm in a hurry!"

"Barby," said Mrs. Grayson, "go up stairs for a little while. I will call you when we want you."

Barbara hesitated, and looked at Mrs. Miller.

"Jane, take her up stairs."

The cook had Barbara out of the room in a twinkling.

Mrs. Grayson fixed her eyes on Mrs. Miller steadily for some moments without speaking.

"I don't understand this, ma'am," said the latter, sharply.

"I want to say a word or two about Barby that may as well not be said in her presence," replied Mrs. Grayson. "Taking the condition in which I found her a few weeks ago as the result of your way of treating the poor child, I do not see that it would be altogether right for me to let her go back into the cruel bondage from which sickness released her."

Mrs. Miller's gray eyes fairly flashed, while her cold, wrinkled face grew dark with anger.

"She's bound to me, and I'll have her, dead or alive!" she said, fiercely.

"Bound only by a promise which you extorted from her by threats, and which you wickedly made her confirm by laying her hand upon the Bible."

Mrs. Grayson spoke with severity.

"Who says so?" demanded the woman, confronting Mrs. Grayson with something of menace in her attitude.

"One who will not lie," said Mrs. Grayson, steadily and bravely returning the almost threatening gaze that was fixed upon her. "But we will not bandy fruitless words. Barby is not going back, Mrs. Miller. Even if she were bound by law, I would be a witness against you on the charge of cruel treatment, and have the indenture broken. And now, I make you this simple proposition. In order to set the child's mind at rest, I will buy from you her services, on condition that you release her from the promise extorted by threats two years ago."

"What will you pay me?" demanded the woman.

Mrs. Grayson drew out her purse, and taking from it a ten-dollar gold piece, held it up between her fingers, saying,

"That."

The woman shook her head.

"Very well. That, or nothing." Mrs. Grayson dropped the coin back into her purse, and made a movement as if she were about to leave the kitchen.

"I want my girl!" said Mrs. Miller, almost savagely.

"Barby will never go back to your house!" There was a resoluteness in Mrs. Grayson's voice and manner which left no doubt as to her being in earnest. "Your cruel abuse has canceled all right to service from her on any plea. I have offered you ten dollars as an inducement to release her from a promise she gave you under compulsion two years ago, and which weighs upon the child's mind. If you receive the money, well—so much gain to you; if not, I will take measures to satisfy her that you broke faith by cruel treatment, thus setting her free."

"If I must, I must," said the woman, doggedly, at last. "Give me the money."

"Jane." Mrs. Grayson spoke to the cook, who had returned. "Bring Barby here."

The little girl came in with Jane, looking paler, and showing plainly the signs of a strong mental conflict. It was clear that habitual self-control was giving way.

"Barby," said Mrs. Grayson, "you are not going back to Mrs. Miller's. She gives you up to me."

There was no start, nor sudden lighting up of her face, nor marked expression of joy.

"Is it so, Mrs. Miller?" queried the lady.

"Yes," growled rather than spoke the old hag, if we must call her so.

Barby sat down without speaking, covered her face with her hands, and remained as still as a statue.

"There." Mrs. Grayson held out the glittering coin. The woman seized it eagerly, and without a word left the house.

"Barby," said Mrs. Grayson, kindly.

But Barby did not stir.

"Barby!"

No response or movement.

"See, Jane! Quick!" exclaimed Mrs. Grayson, in an excited tone.

The cook sprang forward, and was just in time to catch Barby as she fell over from the chair on which she was sitting.

Long repressed excitement, followed by a sudden reaction, had proved too much for the feeble child, not yet recovered from a prostrating sickness. She had fainted.

"Is it really true, ma'am," said Barbara, looking up at Mrs. Grayson, half an hour afterward, from the bed where they had laid her, "that I am going to live with you? Or, was I only in a dream?"

"It is true, Barby. Mrs. Miller has given you up to me."

The child continued to look at Mrs. Grayson for some moments with an expression of love and reverence on her face as one might look at an angel. Then she kissed her hand, and turned away to hide the signs of feeling which she could not control.

Here is the story of "little Barby's" introduction to this lady's family, where she had been living for ten years up to the time when the reader was introduced to her as a "queer little body," looking for all the world as if "modeled after one of Punch's caricatures."

Mrs. Grayson, with all her good sense and good feeling, had a vein of ambition as well as pride in her mental constitution, and these drew her into fashionable life and inspired her with fashionable emulations; and so we spoke of her in the beginning as a fashionable lady. As Barbara gained in years, strength, and intelligence, her position in the household of Mrs. Grayson, as nurse to her children, became one of the highest responsibility. Her pure, deep love for these little olive plants, and her innate sense of right and duty, caused her, after the first strong emotions of gratitude began to subside, to give up her life to their good. The mother's fondness for society took away largely from her interest in her children, and left them for the most part with Barbara, and subject to her influence. Homely as she was to the verge of caricature, awkward in her movements, and with something that struck you on the first glance as ludicrous in her whole appearance and manner, these children had for her a respect and an affection which gilded over what was plain, even to repulsion in the eyes of strangers, and made her seem to them almost beautiful.

Mrs. Grayson meant all that her words implied, when she said, "I don't know what we should do without her." And yet, with all her native kindness of heart and high estimate of Barbara's qualities, she was proving, in her way, almost as hard upon her as Mrs. Miller had been. Not cruel, exacting, unkind, and brutal like the latter—compelling exhaustive labor by force and punishments—but so neglecting her own duties as to let more than a double share fall upon Barbara. In sickness and in health this patient, loving, earnest girl was the untiring nurse and companion of the children—six in number at the time she first passed under the reader's notice. For her there were no days of release from the routine of care and duty. Cook, chamber-maid, and waiter, all had their afternoons, once a week, and their half Sundays. But the children could never spare Barby. Nor had Barby any wish to be spared. An afternoon to herself, weekly, or a half Sunday, was not in all her thoughts. How could such a thought find entrance when the heart had no desire? What would the dear children, who so loved and depended on her, do, if she were away taking rest or seeking pleasure? No, no, there were no half days nor holidays for Barby. The mother could make her daily round of calls, and have her daily ride for health and mental recreation, and the mother could spend evening after evening at opera, ball, or party, but Barby the nurse must never leave her precious charge. The mother could forget her sick child in the attractions of public and social life; but the patient, loving, devoted, conscientious nurse never for a single instant of time.

Well said Mrs. Grayson, "I don't know what we should do without Barby."

But human flesh is not imperishable. The nerves and muscles are not of iron. You may tax the mind and body too far. The student, enamored of his books; the artist, seeking to throw upon canvas or cut in marble the beautiful ideals that charm his imagination; the sterner mathematician, bending all the powers of his mind to the elucidation of propositions and theories; the ascetic, seeking the way to heaven through a denial of nature's legitimate wants—these, and other devotees, may destroy themselves, as to natural life, through a neglect of its orderly demand, and thus become, in the eyes of the world, martyrs to art, science, or religion. And so may the humble nurse—thinking only of the children who need her care—waste her strength, and become a martyr to her undying love. But she will not get into the Church's calender of saints, for her life is hidden from public view. There is nothing about her that the world recognizes as heroic.

So wasted the vital powers of "little Barby," under the exhausting, never-ceasing duties that fell to her lot. You rarely saw her without a baby in her arms; and few nights of unbroken sleep blessed her weary eyelids. If the child were sick, fretful, or restless, it was Barby, not the mother, who sat up through the long dreary hours; and none thought to relieve her from duty on the next day, that Nature might have a chance to win back her departed strength. She never complained, never spoke of weariness, never told of the hundreds and hundreds of wakeful hours she passed, while all the household, except some sick or fretful little one, was sleeping in sweet oblivion.

"Have you noticed Barby's cough?" said the family physician one day to Mrs. Grayson.

"Not particularly. She has some cold, I believe," replied Mrs. Grayson. Then observing that the doctor looked serious, she added:

"Why did you ask? is there any thing peculiar in her cough?"

"Yes; it isn't a common cough. You'd better see that she doesn't expose herself."

"I thought she'd only taken a little cold," remarked Mrs. Grayson. "She's often up at nights with the children. Do you think she requires medicine, Doctor?"

"It is always best to take things in time," the doctor replied.

"Shall I send for her?"

"Yes; I think it will be well to ask her a few questions."

So Barby was sent for. She came down from the nursery with a great chubby baby in her arms, and two little ones holding on to her dress.

"Barby," said the lady, "the doctor wants to ask you about your cough."

"Me! My cough?"

She spoke in evident surprise.

"Yes, Barby," said the doctor, kindly; "I noticed to-day that you coughed frequently, and I thought I would ask you about it before I went away."

"Oh, it's nothing," replied Barbara; "nothing at all; only a little tightness here"—laying her hand on her breast.

"How long has it been troubling you?"

"I've had it a good while."

"And it grows worse?"

"Not much."

"Have you any pain in your breast or side?"

"Yes, Sir; always a little in my right side; but I don't mind it."

"How do you sleep?"

"Sound enough, when I once lose myself."

"How soon do you get to sleep?"

"Never much before one or two o'clock."

"How comes that, Barby?" queried the doctor.

"Willy frets a great deal in the first part of the night, and I have to be up and down with him."

"But you sleep soundly after that?"

"Yes, Sir; until about five o'clock, when little Georgy wakes."

"And you get up then?"

"Not always. I can generally manage to keep him in bed. But the dear little fellow is fast asleep by seven o'clock in the evening, and it's no wonder he is awake bright and early. I often feel condemned because I don't get up with him; but I wake in such a sweat, and feel so weak, that I can't always force myself."

"Wake in a sweat?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Always?"

"Always, now."

"You never told me this, Barby," said Mrs. Grayson, in some astonishment.

"I never thought of telling you, ma'am. It isn't any thing to complain of," replied Barbara.

"How long have you had these night-sweats?" asked the doctor.

"For two or three months."

"That will do, Barby," said he, in a kind tone of voice. "I will send you some medicines. This cough and these night-sweats must be broken."

The doctor and Mrs. Grayson looked at each other in silence, while Barby retired from the room.

"I am taken by surprise," said Mrs. Grayson, seriously.

"Rather a bad state of things, madam," responded the doctor, with gravity. "That girl must be looked to, or she will slip away from you one of these fine days in a twinkling."

"Not so bad as that, doctor."

"Yes, just as bad as that; so you'd better look to it that she doesn't lose quite so much rest. Nature won't bear up under the exhausting demands to which it has been subjected."

Mrs. Grayson said that she would make some different disposition of things in order to give Barby more time for sleep. And the doctor went away promising to send a package of medicine.

A new Prima Donna, with an unpronounceable name, was advertised to appear in "Il Trovatore" on that very evening, and Mrs. Grayson was going to the Opera. And so, naturally enough—or, we might say, unnaturally enough—she forgot, in thoughts of her own pleasure, the pressing needs of her patient, self-denying nurse. No different disposition of things, as promised, was made, by which Barby could get a few hours of refreshing sleep during the first part of the night. Not even a thought of her humble dependent found its way into Mrs. Grayson's mind until, on going up to her chamber between one and two o'clock in the morning, she heard Willy's fretful cries in the nursery, with interludes of coughing from Barby.

"There!" she said to herself, reproachfully, "if I haven't forgotten that girl! I meant to have made some arrangement by which she could get more sleep. I must see to this without fail to-morrow."

With this good resolution Mrs. Grayson retired, and soon lapsed away into profound slumber, though Willy fretted on and Barby coughed for an hour longer.

Attention having been called to Barby with so much seriousness by the doctor, Mrs. Grayson observed her closely on the next morning, and saw, with concern, what she might have seen at any time within the previous two or three months, if she had looked carefully, that her face was pale, her eyes dull, and her whole appearance that of languor and exhaustion.

"How do you feel, Barby?" she asked.

"Very well, ma'am," was answered.

"Then your looks and words do not agree," said Mrs. Grayson. "How did you sleep?"

"Pretty well."

"Did you cough through the night?"

"A little."

"What time did Georgy wake up this morning?"

"About the usual time."

"Say five o'clock?"

"Thereabouts, ma'am."

"Did you have to get up with him?"

"Yes, ma'am. I don't think the dear little fellow was quite well."

"How long were you up with him?"

"Off and on, until day."

"What about the night-sweats you told the doctor about: did you have them?"

"Yes, ma'am. I always have them."

"Well, this won't do, Barby," said Mrs. Grayson. "The doctor says you mustn't lose so much rest. I shall have to make some arrangement to relieve you of either Willy or Georgy at night. You must get more sleep, earlier or later."

Barby did not reply. As she stood, with her eyes upon the floor, her name was called from the nursery.

"Yes, dear," she answered, and hurried back to her charge.

So ended the interview. But the nurse was not forgotten. Several times through the day Mrs. Grayson thought of her, and turned over the ways and means of relieving her from the exhausting demands nightly made upon her strength. Difficulties naturally presented themselves. The children were used to Barby, and so much attached to her that it was not probable either Willy or Georgy, the troublesome ones at night, would submit to being taken from her room.

The experiment was made on Willy, in order to give Barby a chance to gain sleep during the first part of the night. But he rebelled, of course; and, instead of fretting between sleep and wakefulness, screamed to the full capacity of his lungs. This was worse for Barby than the care of Willy; so, after enduring the baby's cries for half an hour, she could hold out no longer. Leaving her bed and throwing on a wrapper she went to Mrs. Grayson's room, and took, almost by force, the screaming little one from her arms. No sooner were her tender, loving tones in his ears than Willy's cries changed to murmurs of delight, as he nestled his head down upon her bosom.

"Dear pet lamb! They sha'n't take him from his Barby!" And with these assuring words she ran back with the hushed child to the nursery and laid him in his crib beside her bed.

So that experiment proved a failure and was not attempted again. The next trial was with Georgy, the five o'clock boy. After he was asleep he was removed to his mother's room. Mrs. Grayson did not get home from a party until past one o'clock. It was two before she was lost in sleep. At five she was awakened by Georgy, who wanted to get up.

"Georgy can't get up now," said the mother, half-asleep and half-awake.

"Barby! Where's Barby? I want Barby!" cried out the child, in a voice that expressed both passion and surprise.

"Hush! Lie still! You can't go to Barby!"

But the mother might as well have spoken to the wind. Georgy only cried the louder.

"Do you hear, Sir! Stop that crying this instant!"

No impression.

"You Georgy!"

The tempest raged more fiercely.

"Stop this instant, or I'll punish you!"

The threat may not have been heard. It certainly was not heeded. Mrs. Grayson felt too uncomfortable under the double annoyance of broken sleep and stunning cries to be able to keep a very close rein on patience.

"Did you hear me?"

She had left her bed and gone to the one occupied by Georgy.

"Hush this moment, Sir! I won't have such goings on!"

Mrs. Grayson was unheeded. Patience could hold out no longer. The hand which she had uplifted in threatening came down upon the rebel with a smarting stroke.

"Oh no! Please, ma'am, don't do that!" And a hand caught her arm that was a second time upraised. It was the voice and hand of Barbara.

"Please don't!" pleaded the distressed nurse, who had left her bed and come to the door of Mrs. Grayson, on the first sign of trouble. She had not stopped to throw on a wrapper; but, in her thin night-clothes, moist with the perspiration that made sleep a robber of strength instead of a sweet restorer, ran down stairs and along the cold passage to the chamber where the strife she dreaded had commenced.

"Go back to your room, Barby!" said Mrs. Grayson, with anger in her voice. "How dare you interfere?"

"Barby! Barby! Oh, Barby!" cried the child, in a voice of anguish. "Take Georgy! Oh, take Georgy!"

Hurt by the tone and words of Mrs. Grayson, Barbara retired slowly toward the door; seeing which, the child stood up screaming after her wildly, and fluttering his little hands as if they were wings to bear him to his beloved nurse. The tender heart of Barbara was not proof against this appeal, and she returned with hesitating steps.

"Didn't I tell you to go to your room!" exclaimed Mrs. Grayson, passionately.

"Yes, ma'am; but I can't go. Let me take Georgy, won't you, please?"

The voice of Barbara was low, imploring, and husky with oppressive feeling; her face pale and distressed.

"Barby! Barby! Take Georgy!"

The odds were against Mrs. Grayson, and she yielded. Georgy sprung into the arms of his nurse, who, with tear-covered face, bore him from the room.

"I think, ma'am," said the chamber-maid, soon after breakfast, "that you'd better go over and see Barby."

"See Barby! Why? Is any thing the matter with her?"

"She's in bed yet."

"In bed!"

"Yes, ma'am. And I think she's right sick."

Mrs. Grayson waited to hear no more, but went over quickly to the nursery, where she found Barbara in bed.

"Are you sick, Barby?" she said, kindly, laying her hand upon her forehead, which she found hot with fever.

"Yes, ma'am," answered Barby, in a dull, half-unconscious manner.

"How long have you felt sick?"

"I had a chill this morning."

"After you came from my room?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Have you any pain?"

"I feel so tight here, in my breast, that I can hardly breathe."

"Is there pain as well as tightness?"

"When I take a long breath."

And then Barby lay very still and heavy, like one falling into semi-unconsciousness.

There was no mistaking the fact. Barby was seriously ill. Some little resistance was made by the children on attempting to remove them from her room; but they yielded when told by their mother with a hushed, serious voice, and a sober countenance, that "Poor Barby was sick," and must be kept very quiet.

When the doctor, who was immediately called, saw the sick girl, his countenance betrayed concern; and when questioned earnestly by Mrs. Grayson on leaving her room, he said that it was an attack of acute pneumonia.

"Then she is in danger?" said Mrs. Grayson, a pallor overspreading her face.

"In great danger, madam," was the emphatic reply.

"What is to be done?" asked the lady, turning her hands within and around each other, like one in pain and bewilderment of mind.

"Keep her perfectly quiet, and give the medicines I leave in the order prescribed," said the doctor.

"You will call in again to-day?"

"Yes. I will see her before night."

"And you think her really in danger?"

Mrs. Grayson's voice betrayed her great anxiety.

"No good can arise from concealing the fact, madam. Yes, the girl is in danger, as I have already told you."

"Don't neglect her, doctor!" Mrs. Grayson's voice choked. "Oh, if we should lose Barby, what will we do?"

True, true, kind-hearted, but not always considerate lady! what will you do without this humble, unattractive, unobtrusive little body, whose face, figure, and movements excite mirthfulness or ridicule in strangers? You have forgotten Barby in your fashionable pleasures—forgotten her with a cruel forgetfulness, through which have been sapped the very foundations of her life—and now, we fear, consideration has come too late. What will you do without Barby? Did you only think of yourself and your children in this extorted exclamation? Perhaps yea, perhaps nay. The human heart is very selfish—very.

"I will not neglect her, madam!"

Did the doctor mean any thing by this emphasis of the pronoun? Doubtless, for he looked steadily at Mrs. Grayson until her eyes fell. He had not been in attendance for years in her family without comprehending the position and duties of Barby.

Reader, we will have no concealments with you—this sickness is unto death! Yes, even so!

A mysterious Providence?

Nothing of the kind. Her burdens were too heavy for her, and she has fallen by the way; fallen, to rise no more—fallen just at the period when her heart was most in her duty, and those to whom she ministered most in need of her loving, patient care. Ah! if she had been rightly considered; if there had been for her, in the heart of Mrs. Grayson, a tithe of the regard in which Barby held her children, this sad martyrdom would not have taken place. But she did not mean to wrong Barby. None knew her better or valued her more. Did not Barby owe every thing to her? See from what a life of cruel hardship she rescued her. True—all true. Yet, does this mend the wrong? Your house will burn down as surely from a thoughtless exposure to fire as through the torch of an evil incendiary. Destruction waits not to ask the why or the wherefore.

Day after day the fatal disease progressed, with a steadiness and rapidity that set medical skill at defiance; and when it became at last apparent to all that the time of Barby's departure was at hand, a shadow of deep sorrow fell upon the household of Mrs. Grayson.

What would they do without Barby? She had grown into the whole economy of things; was a pillar in the goodly frame-work of that domestic temple; and how was she to be taken away without a loss of strength and symmetry?

But death waits not on human affairs. The feet of Barby were already bared for descent into the river whose opposite shore touches the land of immortal beauty; and in spite of skill, care, regret, and sorrow the hour of her departure drew near, until it was at hand.

True to the last, Barby's thoughts dwelt always on the children; and she felt the disabilities of sickness as an evil only in the degree that it robbed them of the care she felt to be so needful to their comfort and happiness. If she heard Willy cry, or Georgy complain, she grew restless or troubled. Every day she had them brought to her bedside that she might look at them, and utter, were it ever so feebly, a word of love.

"Dear, dear! Won't I be well soon, doctor? What will the children do?"

How many times was this said even after hope had failed in the physician's heart. At last the time came when concealment from Barbara of her real state was felt to be wrong, and the duty of communication devolved upon Mrs. Grayson.

"Barby!" she said, as she sat alone by her bedside, forcing herself to speak because she dared not any longer keep silence. "Barby!" She repeated the name with so much feeling that the sick girl lifted her dull eyes feebly to her face and looked at her earnestly. "Barby, the doctor thinks you very ill."

"Does he?" The tones were untroubled.

"Yes; and we all think you ill, Barby."

"I know I'm very weak and sick, ma'am." She sighed faintly.

"If you should never get well, Barby?"

"That is, if I should die." There was no tremor in her feeble voice.

"Yes, Barby. Are you willing to go?"

"If God pleases." She said this reverently, as her eyelids closed.

"And you are not afraid to die?"

The eyes of Barby opened quickly.

"No ma'am," she answered, with the simplicity of a child.

"You have a hope of heaven, Barby?" Mrs. Grayson tried to speak calmly, but her voice could not wholly conceal the flutter in her heart.

"Children go to heaven?"

"Yes."

"I love children."

She said no more. That was her answer. After a pause Mrs. Grayson said:

"The doctor thinks you will not get well."

"As God wills it," was her calm response.

"You have done your duty, Barby."

"I have tried to, ma'am, and prayed God to forgive me when I failed."

"You have read your Bible often?"

"Every day." A light gleamed over her countenance.

"You loved to read that good book?" said Mrs. Grayson.

"Oh yes. I always felt as if God's angels were near me when I read the Bible. Won't you read me a chapter now? I haven't heard even a verse since I was sick."

Mrs. Grayson took from a table Barby's well-worn Bible, and read, with as firm a voice as she could command, one of the Psalms of David. She did not attempt to make a selection, but opened the book and read the first chapter on which her eyes rested. It was the twenty-third.

"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever."

Mrs. Grayson shut the book and looked at Barby. There was light all over her wasted countenance, and her dull eyes had found a new lustre.

"It is God's word," said the sick girl, smiling as she spoke; "and I always feel when it is read as though he was near by and speaking to me."

She closed her eyes feebly again, and for a little while lay very still. Then her lips moved, and Mrs. Grayson bent low to catch the murmur of sound that floated out upon the air.

"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me."

All was still again. Mrs. Grayson felt as she had never felt before. It seemed to her as if she were not alone with Barby, and she turned under the strong impression to see who had entered the room. But not to mortal eyes were any forms visible. And yet the impression not only remained but grew stronger, and with it came a sense of deep peace that lay upon her soul like a benediction from heaven. All things of natural life receded from her thought, taking with them their burden of care, anxiety, and grief.

In this state of mind she sat for many minutes like one entranced, looking at the face of Barby, which actually seemed to grow beautiful. Then there came a gradual awakening. The consciousness of other presence grew feebler and feebler, until Mrs. Grayson felt that she was all alone with Barby? No! Barby had gone with the angels who came to bear her upward. Only the wasted and useless body was left behind, never more to enshrine in its rough casket that spirit of celestial beauty.

"It is over?" said the doctor, who called on the next day to see his patient.

"Yes, it is over," replied Mrs. Grayson, tears of true sorrow filling her eyes.

"How and when did she die?"

Mrs. Grayson told the simple but moving story of Barby's departure.

"And went right up to heaven!" said the doctor, turning his face partly away to hide the signs of feeling. Then he added: "I must take a last look at Barby."

And they moved to the room where her body, all ready for burial, was laid. On the wall of this room hung a likeness of the nurse, surrounded by the children to whom her life had been devoted with such loving care. It was a most faithful likeness, giving all her living expression—for the sun had done the work of portraiture. After looking at the soulless face of the departed one for a few moments the doctor turned to the almost speaking portrait and gazed at it for some time. Then taking a pencil from his pocket he wrote these two words in a bold hand on the white margin below the picture—

And turning away left the apartment without a word.

In Mrs. Grayson's nursery, richly framed, hangs this picture of "SAINT BARBARA;" and the children stand and look at it every day, and talk of her in hushed tones, almost reverently. Of her it may with truth be written, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." Though absent in body she is yet in spirit present by thought and love with the children she so tenderly cared for while in the flesh, and her influence is ever leading to good states and prompting to right actions.

Blessed Saint Barbara! The world knows you not, and the Church has failed to enroll you in the calendar of her worthies. But you are canonized for all that; and your memory is sacred in the hearts of children. Blessed Saint Barbara! If our dim eyes could penetrate the vail, we should see you clothed in immortal beauty!

BATTLE GOSSIP.

"THE thing in the world I am most afraid of is fear," says old Montaigne; "and with good reason, that passion alone, in the trouble of it, exceeding all other accidents." And yet extreme fear sometimes causes actions which the most daring courage would fail to urge men to. As in the first pitched battle the Romans lost against Hannibal, under the Consul Sempronius, a body of ten thousand foot, that had taken fright, "seeing no other escape for their fright, threw themselves headlong upon the great array of the enemy, which with wonderful force and fury they charged through and through and routed, with a very great slaughter of the Carthaginians." Courage is indispensable to the soldier; yet some of the greatest commanders have in their youth shown signs of nervousness. Philip of Macedon ran away, in his first battle. Sancho XII., King of Navarre, was surnamed "the Trembling," because, going into battle, he was always seized with violent tremors. Yet he was a truly brave man; for one of his friends attempting to comfort him by representing as less the dangers he was about encountering, the stout old king replied: "You understand me ill; for could my flesh know the peril my courage will presently carry it into, it would sink down to the ground." That gallant general, Lord Hill, was so sensitive that in his youth he fainted at the sight of blood, and after he had entered the army fainted again, on beholding from his window a prize-fight in the court. A lady once wondered how, with such sensitiveness, he was able to act with great coolness and vigor in the midst of dreadful scenes of carnage. "I have still the same feelings," said he; "but in the excitement of battle all individual sensation is lost sight of."

Next to courage endurance is the greatest military virtue. The two qualities, in fact, go together; and have never had a finer example than in the wreck of a British transport ship in the Bay of Bengal, in the early part of this century. The vessel had sprung a great leak; and being about to sink, all efforts to relieve her being vain, the Colonel commanding first put the women and children in the only boats which could be used, and then ranged his brave soldiers upon deck under arms, told them their inevitable fate, and, seeing the ship now about to give her last fatal lurch, ordered to "present arms." Thus, standing firmly in their ranks, no man moving or showing fear, they fired a volley as she sank, and went down standing at ease, in as fine order as though they had been arrayed upon parade ground.

Since the days when Alexander the Great, marching at the head of his army through the borders of India, suffering with the soldiers excessive thirst, yet threw away the casque full of water which was brought him in the presence of all, saying that one soldier is no better than another—since that day, the burning plains of India have witnessed some noble examples of bravery, endurance, and self-sacrifice. Sir William Napier relates that on one of the long marches the Twenty-fifth Sepoys, being nearly maddened by thirst and heat, saw one of their water-carriers approaching with full skins of water. They rushed toward him in crowds, tearing away the skins and struggling together, with loud cries of "Water! water!" At that moment some half-dozen straggling soldiers of the Twenty-second came up, apparently exhausted, and asked for some. At once the generous Indians withheld their hands from the skins, forgot their own sufferings, and gave the fainting Europeans to drink; then they all moved on, the Sepoys carrying the Twenty-second men's muskets for them, patting them on the shoulders, and encouraging them to hold out. It was in vain; they did so for a short time, but soon fell. It was then discovered that these noble fellows were all wounded, some deeply, but thinking there was to be another fight, they had concealed their hurts, and forced nature to sustain the loss of blood, the pain of wounds, the burning sun, the long marches, and the sandy desert, that their last moments might be given to their country on another field of battle.

Women have shown as great coolness and intrepidity in battle as men. The celebrated Captain Molly gained her grade of sergeant from Washington's own hand at the battle of Monmouth, where, her husband being shot down at the gun he was serving, and the gun about to be abandoned, she took his place, and did no little injury to the enemy, while her cool bravery won the admiration of all beholders. She had already distinguished herself at Fort Clinton, where, the Americans being about to retreat from it, she rushed back to her husband's gun, with the lighted match he had dropped in his flight, and touched off the piece. It was the last gun fired in the fort. Women soldiers have not been so rare in modern times as the rude life would seem to warrant. The spice of romance found in rough campaigning experiences seems to have its charms for the fairer and weaker sex. In 1739 died Christian Davies, who "served several years with great valor in the Enniskillen Regiment, but receiving a wound at the battle of Aghrim, was discovered." Her biography was published in 1741, with the following title:

OF
MRS. CHRISTIAN DAVIES,
THE BRITISH AMAZON,
COMMONLY CALLED MOTHER ROSS;

Who served as a Foot-Soldier and Dragoon, in several Campaigns, under King William and the late Duke of Marlborough; containing Variety of Transactions, both serious and diverting: wherein she gave surprising Proofs of Courage, Strength, and Dexterity in handling all Sorts of Weapons, rarely to be met with in the contrary Sex.

Her first fight was the battle of Lauden, where she was wounded in the ankle. Here she said: "I heard the Cannon play, and the small Shot rattle about me, which, at first, threw me into a sort of Panick, having not been used to such rough Music."

Among other adventures of this singular woman, while in Flanders, she gained the affections of a burgher's daughter, which led to a duel with a rival lover, a sergeant of the same regiment, who had insulted the lady in question, and was wounded. For this she was imprisoned, the sergeant's wounds being considered mortal. The father of the young lady obtained the release of our heroine, her arrears of pay, and her discharge. She escaped from this love affair on the plea that she was sensible that the father would not bestow his daughter's hand on a poor foot-soldier, at the same time remarking to the young lady, that "although no more than a common sentinel, she had as much honor as a general, and purposed to gain a commission by bravery." An odd adventure subsequently befell her, for a child was laid to her charge, as being the father, and refusing to expose the perjury of the mother, she defrayed the expense of the infant, who did not live above a month.

When her sex was discovered she resumed the feminine apparel; but she never lost the masculine roughness contracted in her former campaigns, and was always ready for any rude adventure. Once, riding a mare, on which she carried provisions, she offered to race her against the horse of a Captain Montgomery, who had ridiculed her mount. The manner in which she relates the story is very characteristic. She says: "I offered to run the Mare against his Horse for a Pistole, and we would both ride. Brigadier Godfrey, who was by, laid another Pistole on my Side. We both went to the place chosen to run upon, and starting at the beat of Drum, placed to give the Signal, he suffer'd me to keep pace with him for some time; but finding he was going to leave me, I made a furious Push at him, flung Man and Horse into a Ditch, and thus won the Race! The Brigadier laugh'd heartily at my Stratagem, the Captain was half angry, but I got a couple of pistoles; for the Brigadier gave me that he had won, and I did not much concern myself, nor should I have given myself any Trouble had he been irritated, for

I may safely say I had as little Fear about me as any Man in the Army."

It is pleasant to know that though she occasionally drank a little too much, this Amazon was otherwise virtuous and beyond reproach, while her devotion to her husband, in his old age, was most exemplary, and indeed, by long-continued watching at his bedside, led to her own death.

Augustina, the heroine of Saragossa, is a famous instance of female bravery and military enthusiasm. She was a handsome girl of twenty-two when, in 1809, her native city was besieged by the French. While carrying refreshments to the soldiers she arrived at the battery of the Portillo at the very moment when the French fire had absolutely destroyed every person that was stationed in it. The citizens and soldiers for the moment hesitated to re-man the guns. Augustina rushed forward over the wounded and the slain, snatched a match from the hand of a dead artilleryman, and fired off a twenty-six pounder; then jumping upon the gun, made a solemn vow never to quit it alive during the siege; and having stimulated her fellow-citizens, by this daring intrepidity, to fresh exertions, they instantly rushed into the battery, and again opened a tremendous fire on the enemy.

At Matagorda, near Cadiz, in 1810, Mrs. Retson, a sergeant's wife, was tending the wounded, when, during a fearful cannonade, a cry for water arose. A drum-boy was ordered to procure some from the well, which was in the centre of the battery. The little fellow hesitated, and stood dangling the bucket in his hand. "Why don't you go for water?" exclaimed the surgeon. "The poor thing's frightened," interrupted Mrs. Retson, "an' nae wonder; gie me the bucket, my man, an' I'll gang mysel'." Seizing the bucket from the trembling hand of the boy, the intrepid heroine, stumbling over the bodies of the dead, amidst the roars of artillery and the groans of the wounded, hurried on to the well. The instant that she had lowered the bucket a shot cut the rope! Nothing daunted, however, with the assistance of a seaman she recovered the vessel, had the rope spliced, and bore the precious liquid to the parched lips of the wounded. During the hottest of the fire, and when it was almost impossible to remove from the parapets without being struck, Mrs. Retson, young in years, and blooming in health and beauty, refused to leave her husband, or remove from the spot where she was of such admirable service. When it was found necessary to repair one of the embrasures, she alone, with perfect composure, entered, and, in the face of the enemy, remained till she had completed all that could be done.

It is singular how many battles have been fought on Sundays and holidays. The Devil, who presides over the horrors of war, would seem to take a peculiar pleasure in setting his victims by the ears on the very days when they should set their hearts to worship God, and when their own kith and kin at home are praying to be preserved "from battle and murder, and from sudden death." The battle of Ravenna, in which, according to the old chronicler, "one shot of a double cannon did kill forty men," was fought on Easter Sunday, 1572. The victory of Towton was gained by Edward of York against King Henry on Palm Sunday, 1461; an old historian remarks that "this day was celebrated with lances instead of palms." Warwick the king-maker was beaten at Barnet, ten years after, on Easter Sunday, 1471. The battle of Edgehill, one of the first between Charles I. and his Parliament, was fought on Sunday, October 23, 1642, and it is related that Cromwell viewed the contest from a neighboring church-tower. "Loudon Hill" was fought on Sunday, June 1, 1679. The defeat of Aghrim occurred on Sunday, July 12, 1691. The great victory of Ramillies was gained by Marlborough on Whitsunday, May 12, 1706. Passing over many other instances, we come to the Duke of Wellington's campaigns, in which some of the chief actions took place on holidays. The "Iron Duke" had a fondness for Sunday fights, which he must have contracted in the land of his birth—sweet Ireland! The action of Vimiera was fought on Sunday, August 21, 1808. That of Fuentes d'Onore was gained on Sunday, May 5, 1811. On Sunday evening, January 19, 1812, Lord Wellington issued the brief and determined order that "Ciudad Rodrigo must be carried by assault this evening at seven o'clock." The battle of Orthez was fought on Sunday, February 27, 1814; that of Toulouse on Easter Sunday of the same year; and, finally, the battle of Waterloo, in which the Duke closed the career of his great antagonist—whom, it is curious to know, he never in his life saw—was decided on Sunday, June 18, 1815. Coming down to our own times, we find that the battle of Inkermann was fought on Sunday, November 5, 1854; and the great Indian rebellion broke out on Sunday, the 10th of May, 1857, at Meerut.

Of our own battles, that of New Orleans was fought on Sunday, January 8, 1815; but the following list shows the singular fact that, of the actions in our Revolutionary War, but one of importance was fought on Sunday. It is probable that our troops, wearied and ill-provided, were glad to rest on the first day of the week; and very likely Washington, so far as he could control the events of a campaign, refrained from interference with this day of peace.

Monmouth, which was thus the only important action of the whole Revolution, fought on Sunday, was farther remarkable as a day of intense heat. Many of the soldiers died from the heat alone, without being wounded, and a different temperature might have had an important effect upon the result of the action. The weather has influenced the fate of many a battle in the world's history. At Solferino, the retreat of the Austrians was protected by a tremendous storm, which prevented the victorious French and Sardinians from a bloody pursuit. At Waterloo the heavy rain during the night of the 17th of June prevented greater slaughter, as the shots seldom rose after they had once touched the ground, and never bounded along like when the ground is dry; the shells also frequently buried themselves, and when they exploded, produced no other effect than throwing up fountains of mud. Napoleon's retreat through Russia was rendered fatal altogether by the fearful winter, of which the Russians shrewdly availed themselves. At the Battle of Plassey, in 1757, a heavy shower of rain against which the British preserved their ammunition, so damaged that of their enemies that the firing on that side for a while was almost discontinued. The defeat at Falkirk Moor on the 17th of January, 1746, was attributed to a violent storm of rain and wind the whole time of the action, which beat so in the face of the British that they could not see before them; spoiled the ammunition in the act of loading; rendered their arms almost useless, and made the ground so slippery and heavy that the artillery could not be brought up. And, finally, at the battle of Cressy, according to Froissart, "There fell a great rain and eclipse, with a terrible thunder; and before the rain there came flying over both battles a great number of crows, for fear of the tempest coming. Then anon the air began to wax clear, and the sun to shine fair and bright, the which was right in the Frenchmen's eyes and on the Englishmen's backs." The rain is said to have rendered the bow-strings of the Genoese archers useless, but the English, having kept their bows in cases, were not affected by the weather.

But the weather is not the only seemingly trivial circumstance which has affected seriously the fate of armies. During the "Seven Years' War" the French troops were so harassed by mice, which destroyed their provisions, that, according to a news-item in the London Gazette, for November 17, 1761, they "demanded from the country of Eichsfeld and Hohenstein four hundred cats; one hundred had been already delivered to them. The motive for the demand is, that the mice ate up their magazines."

And, on the other hand, when Marlborough was besieging the town of Aire, in the French Netherlands, his army, cut short of provisions by the loss of several boats-full to the enemy, found a supply of grain where one would little look for it. General Stearne relates that "the soldiers found concealments under ground which the mice had laid up for their winter store, and that in such abundance that it was a great relief to us toward the end of the siege. These hoards were from four to six feet under ground, and in many of them our men found some pecks of corn."

There are many instances of worn-out cavalry horses, sold out of the army and used in menial employments, remembering and obeying, years after, the sound of a regimental trumpet. At the battle of Waterloo some of the horses, as they lay on the ground, having recovered from the first agony of their wounds, commenced eating the grass about them, thus surrounding themselves with a circle of bare ground, the limited extent of which showed their weakness; others were noticed quietly grazing in the middle of the field, between the two hostile lines, their riders having been shot off their backs. Whenever a charge of cavalry passed near them, these horses would form themselves in the rear of their mounted companions, and, without riders, gallop with the rest, neither stopping nor flinching when the encounter took place. A more touching instance than this even occurred at the battle of Magenta, where a dog belonging to a lieutenant of the foreign legion marched into action with his master, and the two were mortally wounded almost at the same instant. The faithful animal had sufficient strength to crawl to his master's side, and expired licking his wounds. The drummers of one of the Zouave companies owned a dog, who accompanied his masters every where. Now this company led the charge in one part of the field of Solferino; and as the drummers marched in front of the company, and the dog marched in front of the drums, this brave animal had actually the honor of leading one of the most brilliant charges in the whole war. It is pleasant to know that the noble animal escaped un wounded, and is now the pet of his regiment in Paris.

The late war was farther remarkable for the successful use, made by Napoleon III. on several occasions, of balloons, for reconnoitring the position and movements of the enemy. The brothers Godard, celebrated French aeronauts, made several successful ascensions, taking with them engineers and officers, who thus gained important information. It was, indeed, reported that the French victory at Solferino was due, to some extent, to important information of the enemy's movements, procured by means of an ascension performed by some of the staff of the Emperor. Balloons were used at the battle of Liege, at the commencement of the French Revolution. Experienced engineers ascended and reported on the position and movements of the Austrian army. Continual notice was afforded of whatever occurred in the Austrian camp, the number of their artillery, and their motions, by notes thrown down among the French troops, and attacks were consequently made against the enemy's most assailable points. They were also employed by the French at the battle of Fleurus, during the siege of Mentz, and subsequently at that of Ehrenbreitstein. The balloon, in all these instances, proved serviceable; and especially at the latter place, the height of the fortress rendering it impossible to reconnoitre the internal portions in any other manner.

Paper and pencils of different colors were provided for the engineers who ascended, and the signs being previously decided on, the paper, when marked, was fastened to an arrow-like rod, loaded at one end and pointed in order to fix itself upright in the ground. To the other end was attached a small silk flag, and being dropped in the ground within reach of the French, the desired information was communicated.

There is an old story that the Dutch, the Yankees of those days, when Van Tromp literally swept the seas with a broom at his mast-head, used to sell powder and shot to such of their enemies as came into action ill-provided with those necessities. It is notorious that, during the Mexican war, American merchants sold large quantities of ammunition to the enemy, especially on the Californian coast, where, in the years '47 and '48, it was no unusual thing for Yankee merchant-vessels to be caught by United States cruisers loaded with powder for the Mexican troops. But it has happened ere now that the enemy's shot have been very eagerly gathered up to keep up a fire which would otherwise have slackened. The Duke of Wellington was once in this predicament; and more recently at the siege of Sebastopol, by a general order dated October 24, 1854, the Commander-in-Chief authorized "the payment of four-pence for each small shot, and six-pence for each large shot which may be brought into the camp of Lieutenant-Colonel Gambier, Royal Artillery, near the light division, by any soldier or seaman."

Suwarrow, the great Russian bear, had the name of a conquered city struck upon the musket-balls he found in its magazines, and gave one to each of his soldiers by way of a medal; and in like manner the Prussian soldiers, engaged at Waterloo, received from their Government medals cast from the cannon taken from the French on that occasion—a more gratifying decoration, one would think, than that provided for the English soldiers, which was of silver.

Cæsar wrote, "Veni, vidi, vici;" and Commodore Perry, with like brevity, reported, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours;" but both were beaten by General Sir Robert Boyd, who, while Governor of Gibraltar, having need of beef for his garrison, wrote to the agent in England this laconic dispatch: "Browne, Beef, Boyd." Browne sent the stores, with the reply: "Boyd, Beef, Browne." This recalls the story of Peter de Dreux, the celebrated fighting bishop of Beauvais, who, being taken in arms by Richard Cœur de Lion, was imprisoned and fettered for personal injuries during his own captivity. Pope Celestine III. remonstrated in behalf of the prelate, to whom, in reply, the King sent the Bishop's helmet and armor to Rome, with this neat dispatch taken from Genesis xxxvii. 82, "Know now whether it be thy son's coat or no." The Pope declined further intercession, and replied, "That the coat the King had sent did not belong to a son of the Church but of the camp; and the prisoner, therefore, was at Richard's mercy."

THE SKATERS.

LIKE clouds they scud across the ice,
His hand holds hers as in a vice;
The moonlight strikes the back-blown hair
Of handsome Madge and Rupert Clare.

The ice resounds beneath the steel;
It groans to feel his spurning heel;
While ever with the following wind
A shadowy skater flits behind.

"Why skate we thus so far from land?
Oh! Rupert Clare, let go my hand!
I can not see—I can not hear—
The wind about us moans with fear!"

His hand is stiffer than a vice,
His touch is colder than the ice,
His face is paler than the moon
That paves with light the lone lagoon!

"Oh! Rupert Clare, I feel—I trace
A something awful in your face!
You crush my hand—you sweep me on—Until my breath and sense are gone!"

His grasp is stiffer than a vice,
His touch is colder than the ice;
She only hears the ringing tune
Of skates upon the lone lagoon.

"Oh, Rupert Clare! sweet Rupert Clare!
For Heaven's mercy hear my prayer!
I could not help my heart, you know—
Poor Willy Gray—he loves me so!"

His grip is stiffer than a vice,
His lip is bluer than the ice;
While ever thrills the ringing tune
Of skates along the lone lagoon.

"Oh, Rupert Clare! where are your eyes?
The rotten ice before us lies!
You dastard! Loose your hold, I say!—
O God! Where are you, Willy Gray?"

A shriek that seems to split the sky—
A wilder light in Rupert's eye—
She can not—can not loose that grip;
His sinewy arm is round her hip!

But like an arrow on the wind
The shadowy skater scuds behind;
The lithe ice rises to the stroke
Of steel-shod heels that seem to smoke.

He hurls himself upon the pair—
He tears his bride from Rupert Clare—
His fainting Madge, whose moist eyes say,
Ah! here, at last, is Willy Gray!

The lovers stand with heart to heart—
"No more," they cry, "no more to part!"
But still along the lone lagoon
The steel skates ring a ghostly tune!

And in the moonlight, pale and cold,
The panting lovers still behold
The self-appointed sacrifice
Skating toward the rotten ice!

COUSIN MAURICE.

"Now God be thanked for years enwrought,
With love that softens yet."

MILLY DENNIS was an orphan, but she had never known any of the sorrow or hardship that the name is apt to imply. Losing both parents in infancy, she had become the pet and spoiled darling of her mother's only brother, John Ayre, Esquire, of Ayre Hall, and the very sunshine and brightness of the stately old mansion, from the time her baby feet began to patter about its oaken floors, till now, when she sat, in girlish dignity, at the head of her uncle's table, the mistress of the whole establishment. Petted and indulged she had been, to a degree that would have ruined a temper less sweet and sunny, a heart less loving and unselfish. Willful and impetuous she certainly was, saucily conscious of her own sway over all the hearts around her, and doubtless abusing her power at times with naughty caprice; but for all that she was very charming and lovable, not more through the beauty of her face than through her blithe kindliness of voice and manner, which told truly how innocent and loving was the young heart within.

Mr. Ayre was a widower, with two sons, but no daughters; so that Milly had no rival whatever in the household affections. She was the centre for all, and each of the three, in his own way, made her very necessary to his happiness. For her uncle she had a hundred small services to perform, not one of which, in his estimation, could be properly rendered by any one else; and Washington and Maurice, in a less material way, were quite as dependent upon her. Washington, the older son, was full ten years her senior, and, like his father, a true country gentleman—fond of all out-door life, and spending his time partly in superintending a large plantation inherited from his mother, and partly in field-sports. He was not intellectual or highly cultivated, but he had a large fund of good nature and mirthfulness, and kept the Hall continually full of his friends and companions, liking nothing better than to bring Milly among them, and see them fascinated by her girlish prettiness and piquant manners.

Milly was very fond of Cousin Washington, and very willing to entertain him, and his friends as well, in her own bewitching, coquettish way; but after all, her true companion and best friend at Ayre Hall was her Cousin Maurice. He was but three years older than herself, and they had grown up together, played, and studied, and read together, sharing all tastes and sympathies and enjoyments, until they were nearer and dearer to each other than even brothers and sisters are apt to be.

They were very unlike, too. Milly was always childlike and impetuous: one saw the variable, impulsive feeling in every flash of her dark-fringed eyes, every expression of her mobile face, every curve and line of her exquisite mouth, which made one think involuntarily of those pretty lines:

"Your lips are like the prophet-flower
When thus they quivering close, my love;
We're sure to have a summer shower
From the blue eyes that rain above."

She was caressing and demonstrative, loving to be petted herself and to lavish tokens of her tenderness on those around her. There was no reserve in her nature, no suspicion, no coldness where she gave her confidence and affection; and just as fascinating and irresistible as the sunshine itself was the charm of her bright, frank cheerfulness and gayety, which seemed to fear no possibility of change or sorrow. Indeed, there was no possibility of abiding change for such a disposition as hers. One felt instinctively that however she might shrink and tremble, or even be beaten down entirely in the storm of affliction, she would yet spring up, buoyant and hopeful again, and by the light in her own spirit shed brightness on the dreariest paths.

Maurice was a complete contrast to much of this. He was grave, thoughtful, reserved, undemonstrative; living much within himself, and truly dependent for love and companionship upon only one living being, who was Milly. Not that he was lacking in affection for his father and brother; he loved both sincerely and earnestly, but he had little intellectual sympathy with them, and was self-sufficient without them. It was only Milly who possessed the key to the secret chambers of his soul, who inspired him with courage to do or dare every thing for her sake, who by a word or touch could dispel the shadow of gloom and depression that sometimes, without reason, clouded his life; and who had first stirred for him the fountain of sweet and bitter waters that lies in every human soul, waiting for the moving breath of its master-spirit.

When or how this love had made itself manifest to him he hardly knew. It had grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength, until it was now the most vital principle of his life, deep-rooted, wide-spreading, influencing every thought, purpose, and act. Yet such was his habit of reserve and his power of self-control, that no one ever suspected the feeling he cherished so sacredly, the hope in which all his dreams of happiness centred. He chose that it should be so, for his excessive sensitiveness could not bear that any rude hand should touch so delicate and exquisite a flower. It was with an inward pang sometimes that he felt that Milly herself was as unconscious as the rest. It would have made him quite happy if she had been a little timid and reserved with him; if he could have seen any bashful shrinking away when he came near, any hidden emotion revealing itself in downcast eyes or causeless blushes; any token, in short, that he might have recognized as an answer to something similar in himself. But he never did. Milly was as open as daylight with him always, just as frank and affectionate and demonstrative at seventeen as she had been at seven. It was somewhat of a trial to hear her musical, merry voice calling him all manner of playful, caressing names; to have her fairy fingers busied about his person, tying his cravat the better to suit her taste, smoothing his hair, or more frequently rumpling the curly brown locks in mischievous fondness; or to feel her light kiss on his cheek after any little absence—and know that his father and his brother shared the same favors equally with himself; when there was a passion burning in his heart which longed to clasp and close her for his own sole possession, to be divided with no one on earth.

Why he never gave her any idea of his real feeling I can hardly tell. It was partly because of his constitutional lack of the demonstrative faculty, partly some little fear of what the result might prove; but more especially, I think, because his fine sense of honor and delicate consideration shrank from trammeling her with any engagement while she was yet so young and her heart so untried. He would wait until she was older, until others had sought but failed to win his treasure; and then he would tell her of the love he had hoarded for months and years, hidden in his secret soul as its most precious jewel, and kept sacred and pure until it was worthy of even her acceptance. So (he said to himself, in the simplicity of his hopeful trust) she would accept it, and wear it, and crown his life with gladness and blessing.

So Maurice dreamed, and the years went on, each one adding new grace and loveliness to Milly, until she had reached the maturity of eighteen summers. Unconscious as she had been, and still continued to be, of any thing more than cousinly affection on Maurice's part, she was nevertheless very well versed in all the signs and tokens of the tender passion in other quarters. Washington's friends had acquired a habit of coming quite as often to the Hall when he was not there as when he was, and more than one of them had laid desperate siege to the heart of his fair cousin. Dating from her sixteenth birthday, when partly astonished, and partly frightened, but a great deal more amused than either, she had refused her "first offer," up to any time within the two years, Milly might have been mistress of any one of half a dozen plantations, far or near, if she had only chosen.

But she did not choose. She laughed, danced, sang, and flirted with her hapless lovers, one and all, giving no more of her smiles to the one than the many, and keeping provokingly heart-whole herself through every thing. She enjoyed it with all her might, too; admiration and homage, though not necessary to her existence as they become to some beauties, were nevertheless very pleasant to the little lady; for she was by no means exempt from the small vanities and triumphs of her sex and her belle-ship. Maurice looked on at all this with no great concern. It is true he would have liked a quiet walk or talk with Milly much oftener than he could get it nowadays, for even when she was at home the Hall was almost always full of visitors who claimed the largest half of her time. Visitors in whom he took but small interest, moreover; but he bore it patiently, seeing Milly delighted in her hostess-ship, and comforted himself with the conviction that all this would have an end in the course of time. She would tire of so much gayety, such constant society, begin to long by-and-by for a different, a deeper experience of her own heart and life, and failing (as he knew she had failed) to find it in any love that had yet been offered to her, would turn at last to him, and know there was the rest she sought. This was Maurice's faith, and he rested in it, and was content; while Milly danced through her summer-time as joyously as ever, and just as unconscious of all his dreams and theories concerning her.

There came a new guest to Ayre Hall in these days—a young Mr. Richard Thornton, whose father had been an old friend of Mr. Ayre. He was a Northerner, traveling over the South, and brought a letter from his father to his father's old friend. Mr. Ayre was delighted to revive old times and old memories in this unexpected way, and therefore Mr. Richard Thornton was most hospitably urged to make the Hall his home for a prolonged visit. It is recorded of him that he felt unable, by reason of certain engagements calling him to pursue his travels without delay, to accept the invitation for longer than one night, until Milly was called in by her uncle to give her welcome to the stranger; whereupon his engagements seemed suddenly to diminish in importance, and the one night extended itself finally into a fortnight. For he proved a most agreeable guest indeed, and won favor in the eyes of all the household, from Mr. Ayre down to Milly herself, in a very little while.

Perhaps she was the first to feel the difference between him and the other men around her. He had the advantage of having traveled much and been much in society, which gave him a certain grace and ease of manner that pleased her taste at once, even before she discovered that he was really as cultivated and accomplished as he appeared to be. But it was not long before her womanly instinct found out his true refinement of mind as well as manner; and she thoroughly liked and admired him before he had been many days at the Hall. Maurice liked him too, notwithstanding a little dread of the effect of his manifold attractions upon Milly. He had been a student, like himself, and read, and loved, and appreciated books more after his own fashion than any one Maurice had met before. There was no resisting the pleasure of this sympathy. It had a new charm in it, and he gave himself up to it frankly, thinking it foolish, after all, to apprehend any danger to his cherished hopes from a mere passing visitor, whom they might never see again.

Milly, being unconscious of these hopes, however, did not feel exactly as Maurice did about Mr. Thornton. She neither wished nor believed that she should never see him again. Indeed, it would have given her an unaccountable pain if any one had told her that this pleasant visit was to be the end, as well as the beginning, of an acquaintance which had interested her so much. She had, in general, a very capricious and careless way of receiving the compliments and attentions of her admirers. They half-amused, half-gratified her girlish vanity, without waking the slightest real feeling. But it was different with this man, and she almost wondered at herself for the secret pleasure which fluttered through her heart at any token of admiration from him.

Not that she was at all in love with Mr. Thornton. She did not imagine any thing of the sort, and such a thought would have shamed her inexpressibly if it had entered her mind. But she was more interested in him than in any man she had ever met: he had wakened new emotions, excited strange, vague desires and anticipations altogether unknown before. Now, if at any time, Maurice should have told her his secret; for her heart, in this first troubling of its deep waters, could have comprehended his yearning love, and in its new perception of its own desires and needs, would have given itself up, fully and gladly perhaps, to his keeping. But Maurice did not see this; so he lost his last and best opportunity.

Milly, having nothing else half so exciting or pleasant to think about, dreamed of Richard Thornton, and dwelt upon all the little incidents of his visit until she had learned by heart, literally, almost every thing he had said or done while at Ayre Hall. Especially she recalled, with a blush and tremor of delight, his few last words spoken for her hearing alone:

"I shall come again soon, very soon, if I may—if I dare! Will you promise me welcome for another visit?"

And then the sudden warm pressure of her hand, the hasty gesture with which he half carried it to his lips, and then dropped it with such a glow upon his face! Milly Dennis treasured it all in her secret heart, and Maurice Ayre would have had bitterness and despair in his could he have known how often the sweet flush on her cheek and the tremulous gladness of lips and eyes were caused by those same untold memories and unspoken anticipations. Poor Maurice! it would have been better if he had known, for then the blow would not have come with such terrible force at last.

For Mr. Richard Thornton did come again, and that within as short a time as he could find any sensible excuse for coming. Maurice was by, and saw the welcome which she gave him, and his first real pang of jealousy was caused by the unwonted pleasure that he saw she felt in the return. He began to think it was indeed time that he should speak to her; and day by day after that watched eagerly for an opportunity. But he never could find her alone long enough to exchange five words with her. There was forever some new excursion on hand, some beach-party, or picnic, or riding expedition, planned for Mr. Thornton's benefit, which occupied every day; and then there were moonlight sails on the river, or long-continued strolls up and down the shady avenues of the extensive lawn, in which Milly was always appropriated by Mr. Thornton, who seemed especially to enjoy this sort of exercise; or else a dancing party in the house evening after evening. And so the days and weeks went on, full of wild, sweet excitement to Milly, learning for the first time "love's young dream;" but to Maurice more and more full of doubts, and longings, and anxious fears.

The second visit came to an end after three weeks, however, and he breathed freely again. It was not possible, he thought, that any harm could have been done in so short a time. Richard Thornton was a mere stranger still, an untried acquaintance; and however much he might have been fascinated, it was certain that Milly Dennis had too much maidenly reserve to have yielded up her heart to any such hasty wooing. So, strengthening himself with this belief, he went to look for Milly an hour or two after Mr. Thornton's departure.

He had left Ayre Hall late in the afternoon, and it was now just in the dusk of evening. Milly had wandered off somewhere for a solitary walk, but he guessed her probable whereabouts, knowing her fancy for a certain sheltered nook upon the high bank of the river, which she called her watch-tower. So he turned his feet thither, and found her there as he had anticipated. She was sitting on the flat gray rock which was the only seat the watch-tower furnished, with her hands folded idly across her knees, and her eyes looking dreamily over the river, whose moon-lighted waves broke with soft, rippling murmurs upon the shore. She did not see Maurice until he was quite near her, and then she sprang up with a start, and a blush that he could see even in the uncertain moonlight, reddening all over her face. But he had hardly time to notice it, and wonder what it meant, before she had quite recovered herself and spoken in her usual way.

"You almost frightened me, Maurice," she said, gayly; "I had been getting nervous any how with being here all alone in this pallid moonshine, and you came up so noiselessly I took you for a ghost at first. How did you know I was here?"

"How did you know I came to look for you?" Maurice asked, with feigned carelessness.

"Because," Milly retorted, saucily, "I know you did! What else should bring you to my watch-tower? But I'm glad you came, any way, whether it was for me or not. I wanted you."

"Did you? for what, Milly?" he exclaimed, eagerly; and a strange, wondering, joyous hope sprang to sudden life in his heart.

But her answer quenched it as suddenly. "I wanted you," she said, shyly, half averting her blushing face, although she drew closer to him, and laid her hand caressingly upon his shoulder while she spoke, "because I have something special to say to you, Maurice—something to tell you that I want you to know before any body else."

"What is it? A wonderful secret, I dare say!" he answered, jestingly; but even while he spoke the light words a chilling presentiment crept to his heart, and her soft touch upon his shoulder seemed like a leaden weight, pressing the life out from all his sweet dreams.

"Whose heart have you been breaking now with your inexorable 'No?'" he went on, as she still hesitated while smiles and blushes kept flitting over her face.

"Nobody's!" she exclaimed at last, hastily. "This time I said 'Yes,' Maurice!"

"To what? an invitation to a ball, or a proposal for a ride?"

"Neither one, Sir! The invitation was to a wedding, and the proposal for a wife," she answered, with a mock stateliness, which did not quite cover her real embarrassment.

"And you said yes? Milly, you are not in earnest; it is impossible!" he cried, quickly and incredulously, taking her hands in his, and turning her face to the moonlight. "You are trying to tease me—to frighten me—but it is no use, I shall not believe you."

"But, Maurice, you must," she returned, with a mixture of earnestness and bashfulness in her voice. "I mean what I say; I have only told you the truth. Mr. Thornton has asked me to marry him, and I have promised that I would. That's the whole story. I don't know why it should vex you, either: I thought you would be pleased, for I know you like Mr. Thornton. Of course I wouldn't marry any of those others that have been tormenting me so long—and I could understand that you would never be willing—but he is very different. He is more like you than any body else who has been here; I liked him for that, first of all, and now I like him for his own sake, Maurice."

She did not see the white, despairing face above her, as this confession escaped her lips; for her own cheeks were burning with girlish shame, and she could not lift her downcast eyes even to meet her cousin's look, after such an acknowledgment. She was so far from any suspicion of the truth, however, that she did not even wait for him to answer, but continued with a frank, simple confidence:

"I have been longing to tell you all about it; but I couldn't while he was here, and it was only last night that it happened, too. He said that he loved me from the very first time he saw me, and I couldn't help telling him that I liked him a little bit too! I was ashamed—for it seems such a short time since we knew him at all; but I couldn't help it, Maurice, indeed. I do like him; I had to tell him so—wasn't it right?"

She looked up into his face at last with a shy, appealing glance, as she asked this question; but in the moonlight she could not see how pale he was, and she was too full of her own happy excitement, besides, to mark the agitation which even his strong will could not yet control. "Tell me, Maurice," she repeated, eagerly, "was it not right? are you not glad? I know you ought to be; but I can't be satisfied until you tell me that you are willing and pleased. So congratulate me now: say you know Mr. Thornton is a great deal too wise and good for me, but you are glad that your cousin has been honored by his choice, and you are sure she will be as happy as even you could wish her to be!"

Poor Maurice! it was a hard trial to stand there with those soft hands clasping his, to meet those tender, appealing eyes, that sought his with such unconsciousness of the anguish he was enduring, to listen to such words from her lips, and answer her as she wished to be answered! And yet he wrestled bravely with his bitter disappointment, and kept down the agony that struggled for expression. He knew that his dream was over now—that hope was vain and effort useless; and with noble self-renunciation he determined that Milly should never know the pain she had caused. It was too late now to speak for any good, and he would not embitter the gladness of her happy love by pouring out his own unavailing grief and despair. So with a brave self-abnegation that few men would have been capable of, he answered Milly's questions to her full satisfaction, submitted to the caresses which in her overflowing delight she showered upon him, and listened to all her unreserved confidences, until she herself was weary of talking, and the waning moon gave her warning to return to the house.

At the door of her own room he kissed her good-night, with a fervent "God bless you, Milly!" She threw her arms around his neck with a half-laughing, half-tearful "Good-night, Maurice—you dear old cousin! I hardly know now whether I love you or Richard best!"

And so they parted: Milly to lay her happy head upon slumberous white pillows, and dream radiant dreams of her blissful future; Maurice to pace the floor of his study, hour after hour, with a fever in his brain which neither the cool night shadows, nor the morning that dawned dewy and fragrant upon his vigil, could allay.

There are few men, as I think, capable of the self-denial, generosity, and power of control which Maurice exhibited in the time that elapsed between this event and Milly's marriage. Few who could have resisted the temptation to supplant one who might so well have been deemed a usurper, and win back the love which seemed his by right; fewer still who, even being hopeless of success, could have refrained from pouring forth the story of their passion and disappointment. But he was strong enough and magnanimous enough to overcome both impulses, and though his heart was breaking within while his lips spoke the words of sympathy and satisfaction that were expected of him, Milly never knew it. She only thought, when she noticed the shadow on his brow which he could not always order away even in her presence, that he was sorry on account of the separation that must take place, grieved at the prospect of parting with her, and because she must go so far away from them all; and that of course was very natural. It was the only drawback to her own perfect happiness, as she told Maurice in her frank unconsciousness, that she should have to leave Ayre Hall, her uncle, and her cousins—especially him, whom she had loved best of any body in the world, except—and there the sudden blush and smile, so genuine and spontaneous, supplied the unspoken name as well as any words could have done. Maurice would have periled his life to have seen such a glow and brightness overspread her face at thought of him, and very bitter was the haunting conviction that it might have been, if he had only improved the abundant opportunities so long afforded him.

"It might have been." The thought haunted him forever, at midnight and noon, at home and abroad, in his lonely solitude and when she sat beside him, frank, loving, caressing as ever, confiding to him her happy hopes and plans for the future, and in so doing torturing him to an extent that she never imagined. It was so hard to listen to her, so hard to bear her careless, unreserved demonstrations, and seem to sympathize with her glad anticipations—tormented all the while by this tantalizing conviction. It so maddened him sometimes that he could endure her presence no longer, and he would leave her abruptly to wonder what she had said or done that should make him act so strangely.

But this ordeal came to an end at last. Mr. Thornton, like most lovers, was eager for the consummation of his happiness; and his wish had become Milly's law of late, so the wedding was ordered at an early day. Maurice had to take part in the ceremony, of course; to stand up with the groom, and be foremost with congratulations to the bride. There was no escape from all this, and so he submitted to the torture as best he might. It was short, at least, and there were no prolonged festivities to distract him; for Milly, grown suddenly silent and sober, given to causeless bursts of tears and passionate outbreaks of affection toward her uncle and cousins—as she began at last to realize the fact of her approaching separation from them all—had determined to have a quiet wedding and go away at once.

Maurice put her into the carriage, kissed her tearful face for the last time, and stood looking after her till the carriage was fairly out of sight. Then he went to his study, and no one saw him again that day. What anguish that no eye might look upon was endured; what battle was fought, and what victory won, is not for us to inquire. He made no sign, and no one knew of his soul's conflicts.

The old Hall was a dreary place after the sunshine of Milly's presence faded from the grim, stately rooms, and the music of her fresh, young voice no longer echoed through them. Visitors came but rarely, for Washington's sporting friends, and even Mr. Ayre's old chums, found the atmosphere of the house changed. A shadow of silence and solitude had fallen over it; and this was so painfully felt by Washington and his father that they spent but a small portion of their time within its walls. Mr. Ayre drove about the country; frequented the wayside "towns," so called; attended faithfully the county courts; did every thing, in short, but stay at home; and Washington rode, and fished, and hunted, and made long "camping-out" excursions, more diligently than in the first enthusiasm of his sporting days. Maurice alone seemed unaffected by the household change. He said nothing when his father and brother talked of Milly, and complained of their bereaved condition, and the loneliness of the house. He only of the three seemed never to miss her or need her, although she had been more to him, even to outward observers, than to either of the others. Washington wondered openly at his apparent indifference, and declared him "a queer stick"—but his father's intuitions were more delicate and clear. He began to suspect, after a time, the true state of the case, and with a tender sympathy which Maurice understood and appreciated, refrained from any remark or allusion which could give pain. He alone guessed the fire that was hidden beneath his son's grave, unimpressible exterior, and he knew but little of its extent.

Months passed in this way at the Hall, Milly's letters being the chief excitement. They were long and frequent, especially to Maurice. She described her beautiful Northern home, dwelt upon her husband's devotion and his manifold perfections, and declared that she would be perfectly happy if she could but bring Ayre Hall and its inhabitants to New York. By-and-by she wrote, rapturous with a new delight, a child had come, a blue-eyed, bewitching girl baby, such a baby as never had been born before, if one might believe all Milly's exaggerations. This letter too, Maurice answered, as he answered all the rest, with tender interest, loving sympathy, and congratulation; but it was the hardest task he had ever had to perform. The happy young mother little dreamed of the sore struggle undergone before those affectionate and joyful congratulations, which she read with such pleasure, could be written. But after that struggle came the most real and abiding peace he had known. The evil spirits of envy and bitterness and hatred being conquered, "angels came and ministered unto him."

About this time Washington married—mainly incited to the act, I verily believe, by Milly's pictures of connubial blisses; which, together with the dullness and loneliness of the paternal mansion, so aroused his energies that he sought and found a mate for himself. She was such a woman as Washington might have been expected to choose—pretty and amiable enough, but no substitute for Milly. It was rather an irritation than a comfort to Maurice to see her in Milly's place; for the new couple settled at the Hall, to please Mr. Ayre. The silentness of their bachelor home was more congenial to his feelings than the new bustle and cheerfulness which the young wife's advent excited, and which only reminded him of a past that could never be restored. His father and brother were satisfied, however, and Maurice was too accustomed to sacrifice to be greatly disturbed. He only withdrew more and more into himself—not with churlishness, or selfish neglect of outward kindnesses; on the contrary, Ellen was delighted with his brotherly attentions, and as much of her admiration and affection as she could spare from Washington she soon gave to Maurice; but with a manly resignation to the lonely, unshared life appointed him.

His father's death, a few months after this marriage, left him more isolated still. It happened very suddenly, after a few days' illness, which had alarmed no one. When the change came it was too late even to summon Milly, although the dying man yearned for a sight of his darling before he departed. Maurice had to write the sad news to her, and her passionate outpouring of grief and regret added fresh pangs to his own sorrow. He could better bear it for himself than for her.

His life seemed utterly empty and desolate at this time. He had loved his father with a very tender and deep affection, and had been comforted in many hours of dejection by the consciousness of his silent sympathy. Now that even this was withdrawn, we need not wonder at the despondency which manly fortitude and Christian principle alike failed immediately to dispel. Ayre Hall—his own now, by his father's will—was a haunted place to him, full of insupportable memories; yet he had not the energy to seek relief and change. Washington and Ellen—anxious for his health, which was failing visibly—urged him to accept the repeated invitations and entreaties from Richard Thornton and Milly to go to them for a while. Milly wrote again and again, begging him to come, "she so longed to see him," she said; and there was no lack of earnestness in Mr. Thornton's invitations. But their home was the last place in the world that Maurice would have gone to; and finally, to escape the importunities which were so hard to resist (for no one could understand his refusal to do what seemed so natural a thing), he announced a sudden determination to go abroad. Washington approved it, glad of any thing which would rouse him from his morbid melancholy; and Milly, though a little hurt that he would not come to see her before he left, was still delighted at the thought of his going to Europe, traveling over the foreign lands, and witnessing with his own eyes the wonderful things of which they had read and dreamed together years ago. It was not such an everyday occurrence in those days as it is now, and Maurice's heart had once beat high with anticipated delight at the prospect of making the journey at some future day. Now he went, without a single thrill of interest; with no desire for the land to which he was journeying, and scarcely a regret for the one left behind, as listless, hopeless, and dreary, he watched its shores fading away from his sight.

It is not my purpose to follow him in his wanderings, or to trace the processes by which his soul found strength and courage, and once more nerved itself to energy and action. He was not the man to sit down in idle despair, even to brood over a life's disappointment; and although to his tenacious nature time could bring no forgetfulness, and change no new passion to take the place of the old, still he knew—and lived up to the knowledge—that life held duty for him, if not love, and that content, at least, if not gladness, could be found in its faithful performance.

He staid abroad a long time, Year after year went by; and health of body and mind came back to him, yet still he lingered. The longing for home at last grew stronger than the dread of home memories and associations, and he determined to return. It was late in an October afternoon when he arrived at Ayre Hall. Washington and Ellen were on the piazza waiting to welcome him (for he had written to announce his coming), and a group of little children clustered shyly together as he came up the steps. There were five of them, and one girl, taller than the rest, had a look in her sunny blue eyes that brought a thrill to Maurice's heart. He had not seen that likeness in eight long years, but he knew in one glance that it was Milly's child. Before he had time to comprehend his own emotions, Milly herself sprang out from her hiding-place behind the door, and in another moment her arms were around his neck, her cheek against his, just as if there had never been change or separation between them. How he bore it I can hardly tell: the very suddenness of the shock was a help to him, and by some marvelous self-control he was enabled to retain his composure, and appear as glad to see her as he was expected to be. She had no suspicion of the possibility of any other feeling. In spite of all these years of absence and change, Cousin Maurice was the same to her that he had always been, and she had planned this surprise visit to welcome his return, never doubting that he would enjoy it as heartily as she did.

And, indeed, after the first secret struggle was past, Maurice did enjoy Milly's presence far more than he could have imagined possible. She was so little changed, so young and fresh and sunny still, in spite of the matronly soberness which her three children entitled her to; so loving and confiding with him, so unconscious of any avoidance on his part, that he was compelled to yield himself up to the enchantment she flung around him. He could not resist her innocent spells. The children, too, were a wonder and a pleasure. He had never cared much about children before, but Milly's were like herself, and fascinated him without effort. The oldest one especially, little Mabel, was very like her mother every way, inheriting her joyous, versatile temperament as well as her grace and prettiness. She was really an exquisite child, charming and delighting the whole household, but particularly "Cousin Maurice," whom from the first she had, with a child's capricious liking, distinguished with her special favor. His quiet, undemonstrative manner attracted her; because he never teased for kisses, or snatched them boisterously as "Cousin Washington" did, she felt inclined to give them to him without the asking; and often when he sat apart, looking on at the household romps and frolics which Washington, who had turned into a most indulgent father of a family, was much given to, but which Maurice, from a constitutional incapacity to play with children, never joined—she would break away from the merry group, climb, unsolicited, upon his knee, and nestling in his arms, stay there contentedly in spite of all appeals from the opposite quarter.

Of course this childish devotion was very sweet to Maurice—all the more as it reminded him so vividly of the old days when her mother had clung to him with the same caressing fondness, and won him by the same irresistible spell. The bitter thought would come up sometimes, when the child's kisses fell soft and pure as dew upon his brown cheek, that she might have been his own—his own! and a dearer name than the "Cousin Maurice," which she called so musically, might have been upon her lips. But when he turned to Milly, and read the unconsciousness, the perfect peace and happiness written on her unshadowed face, he could but put all envious and bitter thoughts far from him, and thank God that her life had been made so bright.

even although he was not suffered to be its sunshine.

The four weeks to which her visit was limited went by far too rapidly. Maurice would fain have persuaded her to stay longer; but she declared that "poor Dick had been forsaken too long already"—a fact which his letters, indeed, continually asserted. So he had to "let her go" once more, but not until she had "blessed him" with a blessing of which she indeed was unconscious, but whose influence pervaded all his nature. It was just what he needed to complete his mental cure—this reunion, with its unrestrained, familiar intercourse, its reviving of the tenderest and happiest affections of his life, its awakening of those social sympathies which keep a man's heart from running dry.

From henceforth he lived neither a solitary nor a joyless life. He did not marry, nor think of marriage; but he went freely among all classes of society, and studied men at least as much as he studied books. His new researches opened up new fields of labor for brain and heart and hand: and in giving himself to the faithful accomplishment of the various good works that he found to do, a great peace and contentment blessed his life. Year after year went by serenely with him, his calm seldom disturbed by any bitter memories or envious repinings. Washington's children multiplied around him, growing up to look upon him as a secondary father; and the real father and mother depended upon him so much for counsel and aid in their education, that he could never realize his own separation from such ties. There was no Mabel in the group, however; for except the two-year-old baby, in whose chubby face there was no likeness to Mabel's spirituelle loveliness, the children were all boys. Fine-looking, frank, manly boys they were, and Maurice was fond and proud of them; but none of them ever reached the place in his heart which little Mabel Thornton had stolen into so many years ago. Fresh as ever was the little image shrined there, and just as vivid the sweet picture of her fairy face, although ten summer suns had risen and set since his eyes rested on her. Often and often he had yearned for a sight of the child—for the tiny clasp of her little warm hand—the sweet rain of her innocent kisses; oftener still he had hungered and thirsted for the mother's presence, and longed to feel its sunny warmth and brightness once more. Yet he had never had the courage to go and seek her in her husband's house, notwithstanding the often-urged invitation; and the cares of Milly's increasing household prevented her from taking the long journey again. Every year Maurice resolved to be no longer ruled by the foolish sensitiveness which made him shrink from visiting Richard Thornton's home, but every year waned and found the resolution unproved. And Mabel meanwhile grew up from the child of his remembrance into a sweet, blithe maiden—strangely resembling, in look and voice and temper, the merry Milly Dennis, so well remembered still at Ayre Hall.

Maurice came home one day cold and weary, after a long ride: it was at dusk, and the windows glowed with a cheerful welcome; but, for once, he did not appreciate it. An unwonted depression weighed upon him, and he had seldom felt more drearily his own isolated condition. "It is my own fireside," he thought, bitterly; "but it is my brother's wife who sits beside it, and the glow and warmth and welcome are for him, not me. Who watches for me? The windows would shine all the same if I were in my grave!"

He went in gloomily, with slow, reluctant steps, for in his present mood he was unwilling to look upon a cheerfulness which he could not share. The parlor door stood open, and the light shone upon the polished floor of the hall. Across the brightness lay a shadow that was not familiar—the bent head and drooping curls of a young girl reading in the firelight. Maurice's heart thrilled with an old memory. Years and years ago Milly Dennis used to sit in the same way, in the same place. Who could this be that brought back the long-forgotten picture so vividly? Hastily he went in, and as hastily, at his appearance, the shadow was broken on the floor. The young girl rose to her feet, and half-shyly, half-mirthfully, advanced to meet him; but Maurice stood like one in a dream, and could neither speak nor move. Surely it was Milly herself standing before him—Milly, as she had been in her first bloom and freshness—Milly, the playmate, the companion, the beloved of his youth! No picture could have reproduced her so perfectly. The same fresh, delicately-colored face—the same slight, pliant figure—the same laughing eyes—even the arch smile curving those red lips was the very same that used to dance over Milly's features, leaving such a brightness behind it in her girlish days!

For a moment he could not have told whether he was dreaming or not, such a host of mingled associations rushed through his mind; but a little peal of merry laughter ringing out from two voices, and the sudden appearance of another figure—stouter, more matronly, but still cast in the same mould—beside the first, recalled his consciousness and quickened his faculties to a perception of the truth.

"You are Milly!" he exclaimed, eagerly, as he grasped her outstretched hands; "but who is this? What is it? I ought to say; for it is the very similitude of your old self—the wraith of Milly Dennis!"

"With a difference, Cousin Maurice!" the "wraith" rejoined, laughingly. "You never saw her in a gown of this fashion, I know. Have you quite forgotten little Mabel? I should have known you, I do believe!" And the little white hand stole into his, and the smiling mouth was uplifted for a kiss, as frankly and childishly as if she were still seven years old. It brought back the child vividly to Maurice's memory, and he clasped her in his arms as freely and tenderly as if she were but the little creature he had carried there so many times. For that one moment she was nothing more, and he did not foresee how soon she would become something most different to him—how soon, instead of petting and playing with her as a child, he would love her, as a woman, with passion and longing.

For—shall I be credited when I ascribe such weakness to a man I have called strong, such fickleness to one of whose constancy I have said so much?—it is verily true that before the first evening was past those sweet girlish tones had begun to thrill strange chords in Maurice's heart, and stir into new life a pulse of passion which he had thought silenced forever; that before a week was spent he loved her with intense and absorbing desire, albeit she was as unconscious of the fire she had kindled as the child of seven years herself could have been; and, alas for Maurice! as incapable of any corresponding emotion.

It was chiefly on account of Mabel's health that this visit had been projected. A slight, but somewhat obstinate cough, accompanied with a languor unnatural to her buoyant temperament, had alarmed her father, who made an idol of her; and when the physician suggested a temporary change to a milder climate, he at once insisted upon Milly's taking her to spend a winter at Ayre Hall. The younger children were left in charge of a faithful nurse, and Mr. Thornton, for the sake of seeing his darling in full bloom once more, cheerfully resigned himself to a three-months' bachelorhood. At Ayre Hall they were all glad enough of any occasion which brought them such welcome visitors, and Mabel's cough so soon vanished in the pure, mild air of the country, that there was not the slightest drawback to the general enjoyment. Her little show of invalidism, however, was a gain to Maurice, for it gave him excuse to appoint himself her physician extraordinary, and make such prescriptions as were at least as applicable to his own disorder as to hers. For her health's sake she must take long rides, in which he must of course accompany her; drives, ditto; and walks likewise. It was good exercise for her lungs to read aloud to him, and as his study was the only quiet place in the house, that was the scene of their readings. Sometimes Milly would join them, or one of Washington's boys, all of whom, from tall Jack down to little Peyton, were shyly in love with their pretty cousin; but oftener they were alone, as Maurice best liked to be with her, and be sure the books to which her musical voice gave language were no dry, didactic works, but filled with a lore as dangerous as it was sweet, at least to the listener.

That all this was folly and infatuation would have been evident to any man in his sober senses—a paradoxical assertion, by-the-way, for no man in love ever has possession of his sober senses. Certainly Maurice Ayre had not; for closing his eyes to all that he had suffered, and learned, and overcome in the past, he the man of middle age, of gray hairs, and grave speech, dared to love this young, thoughtless girl, whose father he might have been, and to hope for a happy consummation to his passion! Because Mabel was fond of him; because she enjoyed the rides and walks and readings; because she delighted in privileges that she saw no one else (unless her mother) possessed, and being sure of her favoritism, had no hesitation in asserting its claims; he hoped and believed every thing he wished, and did not, or would not see that her affection was just as unconscious, and just as incapable of any deeper meaning as ever her mother's had been.

He took but one warning from that experience—namely, that delays are dangerous; and acting upon it he confounded and frightened the child one day with a sudden revelation of the passion he had been cherishing for her. Her utter astonishment and incredulity at first; then her distress and pain, and her beseeching entreaty that he would recall what he had said, forget such a wild, strange fancy, only consider how young she was, how unfit to be his wife—all this should have convinced him surely that there was no possible hope for him. But, in strange contradiction to his manly and independent nature, he refused to be convinced. Tenaciously he clung to every straw of encouragement; and when argument and entreaty alike had failed to do more than frighten and grieve Mabel, and finally drive her away from him in passionate tears, he did what no man who courts a woman's favor should ever do—what only Maurice's ignorance, as well as his sore disappointment and yearning desire could excuse him for doing—sought the interference and intercession of another.

That other was Mabel's mother; and I am aware now that this is a fact which will hardly be believed. I shall not try to account for the impulse which led him to her—to justify the disclosure which he made after so many years of silence. It is simply true that he went to her and told her the whole story of his early love, disappointment, and despair; of his struggles and final self-conquest; at last, of the new passion which had sprung up from the ashes of the old; and besought her, for the sake of all that they had been to each other always, of all that he had once hoped but failed to be to her, to give him counsel—if possible, aid and encouragement—in his new hopes and desires.

It would be hard to picture Milly's astonishment at these revelations, or to tell whether the old love or the new most pained and surprised her. It was a bitter knowledge to her that her cousin's youth had been wasted, his manhood saddened, his whole life in a certain sense blighted, for her sake. She had loved him so dearly always, she had been so unconscious that she had ever caused him an hour's suffering! And now again through her—for Mabel was her child, and she had placed her in his path—he was destined to receive another disappointment still more cruel and hard to be endured. She knew too well how vain and hopeless his love for her daughter must be, and in truth she could not wish it otherwise. Can we blame her if her heart rebelled at the picture of Mabel's sweet spring-time wedded to Maurice's autumn-days?

She could but answer him according to her own conviction, that there was no possible hope for him; yet although he felt her disapproval and discouragement more keenly even than Mabel's rejection, he still would not desist from his suit until she had at least spoken to her daughter and tried what her influence might effect in his cause. Milly yielded to his wish, for his distress was such that she had no heart to refuse him any thing, and went to look for Mabel; but the result of the interview only verified her anticipations. Mabel was indignant and scornful: "Have I no mind of my own?" she asked, proudly. "Does he suppose that if his entreaties can not make me love him, another person's can? Tell him I am no puppet to be pulled by a string—even in my mother's hands—and nothing in the world could make me marry him now."

Which was the answer Milly had to carry back to him, and much as it was softened in the medium of her tender sympathy and compassion, its scorn stung him to the quick. Doing him good service thus, however, for it enabled his manhood to reassert its proper dignity. He went out from Milly's presence a rejected suitor, indeed, but no longer a suppliant, importunate and eager, for a young girl's favor. His eyes were opened at last to his own infatuation, and it was with more shame and self-disgust than disappointed love that he reviewed the progress and culmination of his unfortunate passion.

He ordered his horse in the first heat of his mortification and wounded pride, and throwing himself upon it, galloped off with a fiery haste most unlike his usual style of riding. Mabel from her window watched him as he rode away, and, her short-lived indignation already giving place to womanly sorrow and pity, began to repent of her scornful message, and to recall the many instances of his kindness and tenderness to her. "He has done so much to make me happy," she thought, remorsefully; "how could I get so angry with him? and yet, how could he be so foolish? Poor Cousin Maurice! if I only knew any way to comfort him! if I had only never come to Ayre Hall!" But it was too late to wish that now, or to mend the matter in any way, and there was no relief for Mabel's distress except in a flood of girlish tears—the usual outlet for all girlish troubles.

Maurice rode on meanwhile, unconscious of what was passing in her mind, and, in fact, indifferent to it; for in the bitterness of his own self-upbraiding it was matter of small moment whether she pitied or despised him. Either case was sufficiently galling to a proud man. His horse had taken of his own will—for Maurice gave him little guiding—the road to the village where the letters of the family were directed, and knowing his master's habit, stopped without bidding at the post-office door. Being there, though without any volition of his own, Maurice called for the mail, and the little shoemaker, whose shanty was dignified with the title of post-office, began to rummage among a small heap of letters tumbled indiscriminately into one box, for those belonging to "the Squire." He came out presently with a bundle of newspapers and two square, business-like letters, saying, as he handed them over, "not much of a mail for you, Squire, two letters ain't. And one o' them's for the New York lady. Both 'pear to come from New York, though, an' both got black seals on. Hope it's no bad news for you, Squire."

But for this Maurice would have put the papers into his pocket without looking at them, but the man's words startled him, and he hastily examined the two documents with their ominous black seals. They were directed in the same handwriting, one to Mrs. Thornton, and the other to himself; it was a strange hand, too, and an indefinable apprehension thrilled through him as he tore open the envelope which bore his name. Brief enough the contents were, and easily read, but they brought a pallor to his cheek and a deathlike faintness over his whole frame that made him reel in his saddle as if he would have fallen. The little shoemaker sprang to his side, crying, eagerly,

"What's happened, Squire? 'Tain't bad news, sure enough, is it?" But Maurice never heeded him. He neither heard nor saw any thing but the horror that he held in his hand—the fearful letter whose fearful tidings rang in his ears and danced before his eyes—the terrible words, "Richard Thornton is dead: his wife is a widow!"

With the letter clenched in his hand—his brain in a whirl with the sudden shock—he struck spur to his horse and galloped away, leaving the postmaster to wonder in vain. There was a momentary relief to the stifling sensation that made him gasp for breath, in this swift motion with the cold wind in his face, but the sickening dread and oppression came back as he neared his own gates, knowing that he must enter them only to bring woe and despair upon those for whom he would have laid down his life, if in so doing he could have brought a blessing instead. How should he ever tell them—Milly, the proud, loving wife; Mabel, the idolized daughter—that they should never see his smile, hear his voice, be gladdened with his love again—that the desire of their eyes was taken from them at a stroke! His own disappointment and mortification were forgotten, his own grief put out of mind as though it had never been, in his intense and absorbing pity for them. He forgot that Richard Thornton had ever been his rival, that through him all his life had been made lonely—forgot the madness of his passion for Mabel, and the weakness of his confession to Milly—forgot all the bitterness and pride and dreary despair that had filled his breast but an hour ago—and thinking only of the dead man as husband and father to the two women that he loved so tenderly, mourned for him as sincerely as though he had been his own brother.

Lights were twinkling in the windows when he reached the Hall, and the parted curtains of Mabel's window revealed her figure as she stood there watching for his return. She had longed to see him come back—full of sorrow and penitence, and dreading she knew not what wild things—yet little dreaming, poor child, how much she had to dread! Now when she heard the welcome sound of his horse's feet, she left the window hastily, and ran down stairs to meet him, like the child that she was, never thinking what interpretation might be put upon her conduct, or what encouragement any man might take from it—only anxious to speak to him and win forgiveness for the angry words she had spoken. Maurice took no advantage of her inexperience, however; I believe he did not even remember at that moment that any trouble had come between them, for it was with a father's gravity and tenderness that he greeted her, and bade her go bring her mother—he wanted to speak to her, he said.

"I am here, Maurice, what is it?" Milly answered for herself, appearing quickly; for she too had been watching anxiously for his return.

"I have something to tell you, Milly; come into the parlor," he replied, making an effort to control his voice into quietness.

She followed him, trembling a little with some vague apprehension, for his voice had a strange, unwonted tone. Mabel came too, with the sort of look on her face that a chidden child might wear, and the two waited with suppressed excitement for his words. Milly was the first to notice how pale he was, the first to fear that what he had to say concerned not himself or his own feelings, but something of more vital moment to her.

She laid her hand upon his arm and looked into his eyes: "Maurice, why don't you speak to me? What have you got to tell?" and her own cheek grew pale as she questioned him.

"I have had a letter from New York," he began; and then stopped abruptly, he could not go on.

"From my husband?" she asked, eagerly. "Has any harm happened to him—to the children? Maurice, for pity's sake, tell me at once. Do not torture me."

"There was no letter from Richard, Milly—"

"But one about him! what about him?" she interrupted, vehemently. "Give me the letter, if you will not tell me."

"And there never will be another," he continued, slowly, finishing the sentence as if she had not spoken.

She did not start or shriek as the hopeless words fell upon her heart, but her face went white with a piteous anguish, and she grasped Maurice's arm with an imploring cry—"Tell me he is not dead, Maurice—he is not dead!" Then voice and strength failed together—her hands loosened their clasp, and he caught her in his arms as she sank fainting at his feet.

Before the dawning of another day Maurice was on his way to New York, and Mabel and her mother were with him. Small consolation it was to be allowed to look once more upon the sharp, stiffened features that could be lighted up with no smile of greeting even for the dearest and best beloved. Yet it was all that could be given now, and Maurice, by his promptness and energy, obtained so much for the bereaved wife and daughter. Just in time were they for a sight of the marble face, lying in its still, awful beauty—for wild tears and embraces—for a last, long, clinging kiss—before the coffin-lid and the grave-sod shut out all forever.

There was much to be done to settle and arrange justly the worldly affairs so suddenly brought to a stand-still; but Maurice gave himself to the work with a patient diligence, and when it was finally accomplished, and there was nothing to detain him longer in New York, he unfolded to Milly his plan for her future, which was, that she and her children should return with him to Ayre Hall, and make it their home forever. He did not tell her that some such arrangement was almost a necessity, with the small provision that had been left for the family, but urged it simply as a great honor and pleasure to be conferred upon him.

"Do not fear," he said, "that I shall annoy or distress you again with any demonstration of my own feelings. My only aim will be to insure your comfort and happiness by every means in my power—and it will be happiness enough for me to know that I have succeeded."

To Mabel he said:

"Forget, if you can, dear child, that I ever said a word to you which you were unwilling to hear. Let me be your cousin and friend as I was before, and believe me I will never try or wish to be any thing more." And the kiss, pressed gravely and tenderly upon her young brow as a seal and token of his promise, assured his own heart as well as hers that the fever of passion was indeed past, and from henceforth there was nothing to endanger their mutual peace.

So it was all settled according to his wish, and in a few days the new household was established under the ample roof of the old Hall. It was a welcome shelter to them all; and Milly, as she knelt down at night in her own room—the very chamber which had been hers in her sunny girlhood—gave thanks through all her tears for the love that had spared her still the dear old home and the tried friends of her youth, to comfort her in her time of trouble and anguish.

It would exhaust the reader's forbearance, already wearied it may be, if I were to prolong this veritable history with a record of the uneventful years following these changes. I shall claim his patience, therefore, for but one more scene.

It is three years since Richard Thornton's death, and in the same room where Milly first heard the terrible tidings from Maurice's lips the two sat together one winter evening. It was the family sitting-room; but as yet there was no family gathering about the cheerful fire-side whose warm glow crimsoned the walls, and shone with uncertain, flickering light against the window where they sat. Washington had not yet returned from his long ride to court, Ellen was busy with household cares, "the boys" were out of doors still, and the children at play in the school-room. Up stairs, Mabel and her sister Marian sat in a pretty chamber, whose white beds were strewn with fair and dainty garments; flowing white robes, cloud-like laces, shining ribbons, and clusters of snowy lilies and orange-blossoms—all lying together in graceful disorder, while the two girls hovered over the fire, glancing backward now and then at the delicate bridal array, and talking in half-whispers of the morrow so near at hand when Mabel was to appear in all their glory.

Maurice and Milly had the parlor all to themselves—with its dancing shadows, its cheery hearth, its soft, crimson twilight, contrasting with the pallid gray of the winter evening without; and its old memories, which thronged so thickly for both of them. They had been sitting in silence a little while: Mabel's wedding was the last theme upon which they had touched, and now came a pause in which without words both hearts spoke to each other. Maurice spoke outwardly after a while.

"Three years ago," he said, musingly, "I could not have thought of Mabel's marriage so calmly, or imagined myself being reconciled to her love for another man. Now I look back and wonder at the infatuation which possessed me."

"I told you," Milly answered, with a slightly tremulous voice, "that you did not understand your own feeling—that your passion for Mabel was a mere fancy which had no real root of love, and would be short-lived as it was sudden. I was not surprised—although I was glad—when I saw how soon my words were verified. Mabel was too young ever to have been for you the companion, friend, and help-meet that a true wife should be; and you were too old, Maurice, to have comprehended or sympathized with her girlish impulses. There could have been no true union between you."

"You are right," was the reply. "Say further, that but one woman exists in all the world with whom and myself there could be true union—and you will complete the truth. Milly!"—and here his forced calmness broke forth into passionate earnestness—"I have kept silence all this time; I have said not a word to make you remember the long years that I loved you in secret; I have respected your widowhood and Richard's memory to the last requirement of honor or delicacy. Now I can refrain no longer from pleading my own cause. I love you, Milly, as I have loved you from my earliest memory—long before Richard Thornton knew of your existence. Is it now too much to hope that this love may be accepted and rewarded at last? Is it too much to ask that the evening of the life whose morning he enjoyed may be given to me? I claimed it all once; I fondly believed that I had but to speak to have my claims acknowledged; and you can never know the bitterness of soul with which I saw another bear off in triumph the treasure I had looked upon as my own. Now it is once more within my reach, and if I may but stretch out my hands and possess it at last, I shall count all the past as a light probation. Milly, speak to me, and tell me that it is mine."

But Milly could not speak: tears came before words, and emotions too deep and tender for any other utterance crowded in her heart. Mingled memories of the past; her first love, and happy married life; the wild grief and desolation of her widowhood; her cousin's noble, unselfish devotion, in his guardianship of her and her children; his patient, faithful love; his delicate consideration, his watchful tenderness, rushed together in her mind, causing a tumult of conflicting impulses. It was no unexpected thing this revelation of Maurice's hopes and wishes; she had felt that it must come, and her own heart testified no unwillingness to receive it; and yet at the last moment a vision of her husband uprose, as if to reproach her for unfaithfulness in dreaming of happiness in any other love than his.

Perhaps Maurice divined the struggle: he stooped toward her, and drew her into his arms; with one hand he removed the clasped fingers through which tears were dropping, with the other he pointed upward to the gray evening sky, saying calmly, and with authority,

"I claim you for my wife, Milly; and if it is given to the spirits above to know what is done upon earth, I call upon Richard Thornton to give his sanction and blessing to our union. Never fear that it would be withheld, if he could appear to us at this moment, or hesitate for his sake, to do what your heart prompts for mine."

And Milly hesitated no longer: frankly and trustfully she yielded herself to the manly arms that circled her with such tender protection, resting in fullness of content upon the true heart that had so long waited for this hour.

Here let us leave them, for love's communion is sacred, and irreverent eyes may not gaze thereupon. Enough for us to know that Maurice has reached at last the golden apple of his longing, and there is no fear now that it will turn to ashes on his palate.

A MOST FORTUNATE MAN.

OH that I were Jenkins! Jenkins the ubiquitous and all-accomplished! Jenkins of the graphic pen!

Then might I fitly describe that wedding and the bride.

It should, I think, be done somewhat in this style:

She was a superb creature! Eyes brilliant as her diamonds; hair of the soft rich hue of her paternal brown-stone mansion (Number—Fifth Avenue); brow fair as the marble that, in various expensive forms, adorns the interior of said mansion; cheeks reflecting the crimson of the damask hangings; teeth pearly and regular as the keys of her grand Erard; figure—well, at the lowest estimate, $500,000.

I do not attempt her dress, for I remember that I am not Jenkins; besides, it was four years ago, and the records of even last year's fashions are rather funereal reading.

I was present (having obtained credit for a new suit expressly for the occasion) as an early friend of Cox, the bridegroom, who was, by universal acclaim, a most fortunate man.

Here observe a distinction. Those called "most fortunate" by the indiscriminating public are, for the most part, erroneously so styled. The prize is (in one case out of a hundred) the reward of merit, or (in the other ninety-nine) the fruit of clever management or "judicious advertising." Yet we exceptionally see one who seems to command good fortune by the sheer force of a mysterious constitutional magnetism.

If such an one enter the profession of divinity, for instance, though his soporific sermons are not phonographed as newspaper attractions, nor his fame heralded by the polemical clarion, yet we presently find him quietly installed in a well-salaried pastorate, and intrenched for life in the affections of an opulent flock. Or, if he embrace medicine, fashionable confidence and diseases develop spontaneously about him. And so on, through the professional catalogue.

He takes to the best society as naturally as a choice fish to a select aquarium, and his ticket in the matrimonial lottery is sure to draw a diamond of the first water in a heavy gold setting.

Such an one, in brief, was Cox. A young gentleman of refined tastes, tender sensibilities, and unimpeachable exterior—though most fortunate yet possessing no fortune; an inditer of deliciously mystical poems, full of breathings after the Impossible, that appeared in the most fashionable literary organs, and painter of pictures which, though they possessed no striking merit, yet somehow always got hung in good lights at the Academy and commanded early purchasers.

Cox's most remarkable social quality was a certain masterly reserve that hinted of unrevealed depths of thought or emotion within him; which seemed to say whenever he spoke, "There is infinitely more behind that I might add if I chose;" and which investing him with the charm of mystery, used, more than any thing that he actually said or did, to elicit from his lady acquaintances the remark, "What a dear incomprehensible man," or "What a genius, Cox is!"

It is but justice to Cox to mention that he fully compensated for this general reserve by an irrepressible tendency to gushing confidences in the ear of one or two intimate friends—of whom I was one.

It happened that one of the above-mentioned paintings was purchased by Aristarchus Hobbes, Esq., of Number — Fifth Avenue, retired leather-dealer and half-millionaire. It naturally enough followed that Cox was invited to represent the world of Art at the table of that gentleman on the occasion of sundry dinner-parties. Thus he made the acquaintance of Victoria, sole child and heir of his patron, and belle of the season. It was but a necessary incident to his inevitable good fortune that that regal young person, whose (hitherto) adamant heart had repelled several scores of eligible suitors whom her golden and other charms had attracted, should conceive a tender and demonstrative admiration of him. Taking this tide in his affairs at its flood, like the fortunate man that he was, he reciprocated the sentiment, and at the most opportune moment, and in tasteful and poetic terms—all of which he confided to me at the time—declared it; whereupon the lovely Half-Million (figuratively, at least) threw herself in his arms.

He then proceeded to solicit the paternal sanction, which was essential to the consummation of so important a transaction. Mr. Hobbes, with business-like explicitness, declined his proposal, and ceremoniously bowed him to the door. Mr. H. then entered the presence of his daughter, and, forgetting his usual submissive and reverential demeanor therein, demanded to know how she had dared think of bestowing herself, upon whom he had lavished a ten-thousand dollar education, and the half-million which had cost him and his father lives of toil, upon a Nobody—"yes, Victoria," he added, with an emphatic stamp of his foot into the velvety depths of the carpet, "upon a being who lacks the first credential of manhood—a bank account—and who, besides that, is a painter and a poet!"

Victoria, thereupon, with concentrated majesty, replied that, however many opprobrious epithets it might please her papa to bestow upon Mr. Cox, she should certainly never marry any other.

Papa, whose blood was up, declared, with another emphatic stamp, that Cox should never again enter his house.

"Then I shall starve myself!" she exclaimed, with hysterical determination.

She carried that fearful threat into execution, tasting nothing, excepting a little confectionery, for two days, and reducing her weight thereby from 155 pounds, avoirdupois, to 154½.

At the expiration of that period Mr. Hobbes desisted from his unwonted rebellion against filial authority, the main condition of his capitulation being an apologetic and retractatory note from himself to Cox.

Which train of circumstances led to the wedding aforesaid.

It will be seen that every body was right, for once, in pronouncing Cox a most fortunate man.

The "event" was the ruling topic of conversation at my club on the evening succeeding; of which conversation let one specimen suffice:

"Lucky dog is Cox!" remarked young Mr. A, a diminutive gentleman, with a very large eye-glass, to young Mr. B, ditto, with ditto.

"Reg'lah thirteen-shot, 'pon my word," responded B, reflectively. "That's the troo way to make your fawchune—marry it. Best return for smallest investment."

"No chance just now," sighed A, referring to his memorandum book. "Doosed dull season! Last hundred-thousand just engaged. Some small lots of real estate left, but badly encumbered. Then there's a few Wall Street brokers' and other fancies, but too risky for me. Come over to Phelan's."

[A made his fortune the following season, as his father and two elder brothers had done before him, by marrying a house, a carriage, and several tenement-buildings. I regret to state, however, that B has hitherto met with nothing but signal failure in his attempts at a similar acquisition.]

It is a melancholy fact that bachelor-friendships are as effectually knelled at a wedding as at a funeral. The silver thread of intimacy that had connected our two third-floor back rooms in Clinton Place lost its continuity when Cox was led in golden bonds of wedlock up Fifth Avenue. I did, indeed, receive invitations to dine with him, but engagements prevented, and Cox was never at home when I called. So for several months I did not see him.

I heard of him, however, as moving with éclat, in a distinguished circle, surrounded by every agreeable circumstance that a beautiful, accomplished, and devoted Half-Million could command; as, in short, emphatically and notoriously a most fortunate man.

What was my surprise, then, one tempestuous evening, when, seated by my grate over a book, I had absently responded to a tap at my chamber-door, a figure entered which I should at once have recognized as Cox's ghost, had I encountered it in the Astor library! Instead, however, of drumming on my table, smashing my furniture, vanishing tantalizingly, or indulging in any of the other pleasant eccentricities by which modern ghosts are wont to manifest their presence and posthumous ideas of good-breeding, the figure convulsively seized my hand in one which, if not flesh-and-blood, was at least material skin-and-bone. I was reassured.

"Podhammer," he said, when I had returned his greeting and thrust him into my easy-chair, "I have come to you for sympathy."

"Sympathy for a most fortunate man!" I muttered, in natural astonishment.

"There it is again!" he screamed, springing to his feet. "You, too—every body, every where I go—the people in my dreams—eternally dinning it in my ears! If I could escape to Japan, the natives would throng around me, calling me 'most fortunate man' in good English. It's unendurable!"

"Pardon my violence," he said, after a pause, resuming his seat and natural good manners. "I know you meant nothing bad. You—happy fellow—have never been fortunate. You, doubtless, don't know that 'most fortunate man' is a synonym for miserable wretch."

I replied that that was not its usual acceptance.

"I admit it," he said. "The mass of mankind have no Sensibilities. A man without Sensibilities may, perhaps, be most fortunate, and yet not miserable. I have Sensibilities, and I can not."

I requested him to explain.

"Can a man with Sensibilities be happy at becoming a Nobody?"

I replied that I thought it at least doubtful.

"Can he enjoy life without friends?"

I admitted that, as a general rule, he could not.

"Can he be otherwise than wretched without love?"

I thought of Arabella, and said, decidedly, "No."

"Then," he said, "I will relate to you something of my experience:

"My first consciousness on becoming most fortunate was that I had somehow lost my identity; and I have never got any other in its stead. If there is any man living who can dispute my claim to the championship of feather-weight in the social scale, I should like to see him. I have no mission. My muse has deserted me. No longer inspired by poverty and board-bills, I can not paint. I would gladly assist in managing my wife's affairs—business affairs, I mean; but I am no business-man, and she is. She has even made large sums by speculating in stocks. Of what use can I be then? I am an appendage! a household ornament! a pet! A man without Sensibilities might be happy in that capacity; I can not.

"Driven to desperation by these reflections one day, I thought I would qualify myself to be useful by keeping my wife's accounts. I got possession of her books in her absence. It happened that the first page I opened to was headed, 'Household expenses for October.' I read, 'Taxes' so much, 'Servants' so much, 'Horses' so much; and so on, through a long list, until near the bottom I came to 'Husband $200.' I dashed down the book and rushed out to purchase arsenic, but was deterred from doing so by reading in imagination the item, 'Burial of Husband' so much.

"As a matter of course, in losing my identity I lost all my old friends. Part cut me at once; others, more malicious, by perpetually reminding me of my changed condition, compelled me to cut them. A man without Sensibilities might easily have supplied their place with plenty of new ones. But could I contract friendships with people before whom I was obliged to play my rôle of a most fortunate man? Never!

"I might cheerfully have endured any imaginable ills, had I been solaced by love—that mysterious and blissful sympathy which may make a heaven even at the most ostentatious hearth-stone. But what has a matrimonially most fortunate man to do with love? I love Victoria, it is true. But somehow her half-million constitutes an impassable barrier between her heart and mine. A man without Sensibilities might, perhaps, have surmounted it; I could not. She loves me. She manifests her love by giving me the kindest treatment. Only conceive: One morning soon after our marriage, I was seated by her in her boudoir. She was regally beautiful in her simple morning dress. I looked into her brilliant eyes, and experienced an irrepressible gush of tenderness. 'My dearest,' I said, drawing her close to my side, 'oh that every non-conductor were removed from between our hearts, that they might ever beat in blissful rapport—yours imparting to mine every sacred and refining feminine influence, and mine returning, at each throb, a counter-current of manly strength, support, and devotion!'

"She seemed touched by this spontaneous expression of affection. She gave me a heavenly smile and kiss—and presented me five hundred dollars! [Here Cox groaned.]

"Since that I have been haunted. I have in dreams at night seen Victoria before me, beautiful, queenly, adorable, and when I have hastened to meet her, and extended my arms to embrace her, I have found in my grasp only a bundle of bank-bills! Then a throng of people, comprising all I have ever known or seen, have surrounded me, and with derisive laughter have exclaimed in chorus, 'Most fortunate man!'

"By day I have been the victim of a strange optical illusion. Instead of my wife, I have seen a double image—the one my true Victoria, a lovely and noble nature, though perchance a little imperious; the other, a curious fantastic figure, with real diamonds instead of eyes, golden thread for hair, pearls for teeth, and an ample dress of the latest mode composed entirely of crisp bank-bills, and displaying a well-filled purse in her hand. It is the figure of the Half-Million—my wife's evil destiny and mine. Whenever I would approach her, the figure would thrust herself between us with a mocking laugh, jingling the purse in my ear and calling me, in a metallic voice, 'Most fortunate man!'

"The illusion has pursued me into society. At dinner I have heard the jingle of the purse mingling with the rattling of the dishes, and have seen the figure seated opposite me, smiling upon me, and murmuring, as each new course was brought in, 'Most fortunate man!'

"At parties I have observed that the figure received the homage and compliments of the throng, and that my wife's self was almost unnoticed. I have on these occasions been treated with marked consideration, but I have heard them whisper as they approached me, 'Husband of the Half-Million—most fortunate man!'

"In my dreams all last night the purse was chiming in my ear, until my brain reverberated in agony to its music. At length I awoke from a horrible nightmare, fancying that the figure, having assumed the form and weight of an immense bag of bullion, had seated herself on my breast, and was crushing out my life.

"This is my last appeal for human sympathy, Podhammer. A man without Sensibilities might thrive under such experiences; I can not long survive them. It shall be my last request that my resting-place be marked by a plain slab, bearing the device of a bag of bullion crushing a quivering heart, and underneath it the epitaph, 'A MOST FORTUNATE MAN!'

Here ended Cox's recital. I began to administer to him some useful considerations as to the superfluity of Sensibilities, when he suddenly recollected an engagement and abruptly took his leave.

Though his experiences were evidently but the morbid fancies of a man who should have been enjoying the advantages of a lunatic asylum, yet they affected me curiously. Arabella, for whom I had a tenderness, wore some real diamonds and would inherit a couple of thousand dollars. I had intended at the next opportunity to propose for Arabella, the diamonds and dollars of course included. Now, however, after tossing sleeplessly all night, I decided not to do it.

I did not again meet Cox. It was the season of the great panic. One day I saw a red flag waving over his door. I soon after learned that he ("Poor fellow!" every body called him now) and his wife had left town, and gone nobody knew whither.

A few months since I received a letter from him bearing a California post-mark. Indeed, it was coming upon that letter to-day, as I was looking over the year's correspondence, that moved me to write this little narrative. I take the liberty of concluding by subjoining an extract therefrom:

"Oh, my dear P., that was a happy day when the crash came! You remember I mentioned her speculations in stocks. Well, stocks fell and fell, until at length they brought down with them her half-million. It was a strange, wild exultation I felt when the news was brought us, and Victoria, in an agony of tears and despair, would have sunk to the floor had I not caught her in my arms—the first support I ever gave her. Fearing to shock her by my selfish joy, I laid her tenderly on a sofa, and rushed out to indulge it by myself. I hastened to Wall Street, and jostled my way among the frantic thousands who blocked the street and struggled at the bank entrances. I laughed aloud (I assure you I could not help it), waved my hat and hurraed. My acquaintances looked at me and said, 'Poor fellow! his loss has made him mad.' And I hurraed again, because they no longer called me 'most fortunate man.'

"From that day I was happy. The figure forever disappeared. My sleep was tranquil. The acquaintances who had thronged our parties and my dreams suddenly became few and distant. My wife became evermore her adorable self.

"Collecting the little that remained to us, we decided to emigrate to California and begin life anew. I purchased a small and sterile farm. Here we had for a time to struggle hard with poverty. But by Victoria's miraculous housewifery, and by my hard labor in the culture of strawberries and poultry, our little estate at length became profitable. One day as I was digging a ditch in a barren gully I had the luck to unearth a monster nugget. Further examination has proved me the proprietor of a valuable placer and prospectively rich.

"Have you seen my lately published book of poems entitled 'Golden Lays?' In spite of most unjust and inappreciative criticism, it has reached its fourth edition.

"But all the gold in the world would be valueless to me in comparison with the wealth I possess in Victoria. She now rejoices with me in the loss of the half-million. All the fame that I even yet sometimes fondly dream of, would be a dull sound to my ear compared with the prattle of my two little cherubs. My homely home is a paradise. May I not hope some day to welcome you to it?

"I now subscribe myself with exultation,
"A MOST FORTUNATE MAN."

On finishing this letter I decided to propose to Arabella.

THE HAUNTED AND THE HAUNTERS.

By SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

A FRIEND of mine, who is a man of letters and a philosopher, said to me one day, as if between jest and earnest—"Fancy! since we last met, I have discovered a haunted house in the midst of London."

"Really haunted?—and by what?—ghosts?"

"Well, I can't answer these questions; all I know is this—six weeks ago I and my wife were in search of a furnished apartment. Passing a quiet street, we saw on the window of one of the houses a bill, 'Apartments Furnished.' The situation suited us: we entered the house—liked the rooms—engaged them by the week—and left them the third day. No power on earth could have reconciled my wife to stay longer; and I don't wonder at it."

"What did you see?"

"Excuse me—I have no desire to be ridiculed as a superstitious dreamer—nor, on the other hand, could I ask you to accept on my affirmation what you would hold to be incredible without the evidence of your own senses. Let me only say this, it was not so much what we saw or heard (in which you might fairly suppose that we were the dupes of our own excited fancy, or the victims of imposture in others) that drove us away, as it was an undefinable terror which seized both of us whenever we passed by the door of a certain unfurnished room, in which we neither saw nor heard any thing. And the strangest marvel of all was, that for once in my life I agreed with my wife, silly woman though she be—and allowed, after the third night, that it was impossible to stay a fourth in that house."

Vol. XXII—No. 129.—A A

Accordingly, on the fourth morning I summoned the woman who kept the house and attended on us, and told her that the rooms did not quite suit us, and we would not stay out our week. She said, dryly, 'I know why; you have staid longer than any other lodger. Few ever staid a second night; none before you a third. But I take it they have been very kind to you.'

"'They—who?' I asked, affecting a smile.

"'Why, they who haunt the house, whoever they are. I don't mind them; I remember them many years ago, when I lived in this house, not as a servant; but I know they will be the death of me some day. I don't care—I'm old, and must die soon any how; and then I shall be with them, and in this house still.' The woman spoke with so dreary a calmness, that really it was a sort of awe that prevented my conversing with her further. I paid for my week, and too happy were I and my wife to get off so cheaply."

"You excite my curiosity," said I; "nothing I should like better than to sleep in a haunted house. Pray give me the address of the one which you left so ignominiously."

My friend gave me the address; and when we parted I walked straight toward the house thus indicated.

It is situated on the north side of Oxford Street, in a dull but respectable thoroughfare. I found the house shut up—no bill at the window, and no response to my knock. As I was turning away, a beer-boy, collecting pewter pots at the neighboring areas, said to me, "Do you want any one at that house, Sir?"

"Yes, I heard it was to be let."

"Let!—why, the woman who kept it is dead—has been dead these three weeks, and no one can be found to stay there, though Mr. J—offered ever so much. He offered mother, who chaps for him, £1 a week just to open and shut the windows, and she would not."

"Would not!—and why?"

"The house is haunted; and the old woman who kept it was found dead in her bed with her eyes wide open. They say the devil strangled her."

"Pooh!—you speak of Mr. J—. Is he the owner of the house?"

"Yes."

"Where does he live?"

"In G— Street, No. —."

"What is he?—in any business?"

"No, Sir—nothing particular; a single gentleman."

I gave the pot-boy the gratuity earned by his liberal information, and proceeded to Mr. J—, in G— Street, which was close by the street that boasted the haunted house. I was lucky enough to find Mr. J— at home—an elderly man, with intelligent countenance and prepossessing manners.

I communicated my name and my business frankly. I said I heard the house was considered to be haunted—that I had a strong desire to examine a house with so equivocal a reputation—that I should be greatly obliged if he would allow me to hire it, though only for a night. I was willing to pay for that privilege whatever he might be inclined to ask. “Sir,” said Mr. J——, with great courtesy, “the house is at your service, for as short or as long a time as you please. Rent is out of the question—the obligation will be on my side should you be able to discover the cause of the strange phenomena which at present deprive it of all value. I can not let it, for I can not even get a servant to keep it in order or answer the door. Unluckily the house is haunted, if I may use that expression, not only by night, but by day; though at night the disturbances are of a more unpleasant and sometimes of a more alarming character. The poor old woman who died in it three weeks ago was a pauper whom I took out of a work-house, for in her childhood she had been known to some of my family, and had once been in such good circumstances that she had rented that house of my uncle. She was a woman of superior education and strong mind, and was the only person I could ever induce to remain in the house. Indeed, since her death, which was sudden, and the coroner’s inquest, which gave it a notoriety in the neighborhood, I have so despaired of finding any person to take charge of it, much more a tenant, that I would willingly let it rent-free for a year to any one who would pay its fates and taxes.”

“How long is it since the house acquired this sinister character?”

“That I can scarcely tell you, but very many years since. The old woman I spoke of said it was haunted when she rented it between thirty and forty years ago. The fact is, that my life has been spent in the East Indies, and in the civil service of the Company. I returned to England last year on inheriting the fortune of an uncle, among whose possessions was the house in question. I found it shut up and uninhabited. I was told that it was haunted, that no one would inhabit it. I smiled at what seemed to me so idle a story. I spent some money in repainting and roofing it—added to its old-fashioned furniture a few modern articles—advertised it, and obtained a lodger for a year. He was a colonel retired on half pay. He came in with his family, a son and a daughter, and four or five servants: they all left the house the next day; and although they deposed that they had all seen something different, that something was equally terrible to all. I really could not in conscience sue, or even blame, the colonel for breach of agreement. Then I put in the old woman I have spoken of, and she was empowered to let the house in apartments. I never had one lodger who staid more than three days. I do not tell you their stories—to no two lodgers have there been exactly the same phenomena repeated. It is better that you should judge for yourself than enter the house with an imagination influenced by previous narratives; only be prepared to see and to hear something or other, and take whatever precautions you yourself please.”

“Have you never had a curiosity yourself to pass a night in that house?”

“Yes. I passed not a night, but three hours in broad daylight alone in that house. My curiosity is not satisfied, but it is quenched. I have no desire to renew the experiment. You can not complain, you see, Sir, that I am not sufficiently candid; and unless your interest be exceedingly eager and your nerves unusually strong. I honestly add that I advise you not to pass a night in that house.”

“My interest is exceedingly keen,” said I, “and though only a coward will boast of his nerves in situations wholly unfamiliar to him, yet my nerves have been seasoned in such variety of danger that I have the right to rely on them—even in a haunted house.”

Mr. J—— said very little more; he took the keys of the house out of his bureau, gave them to me—and, thanking him cordially for his frankness, and his urbane concession to my wish, I carried off my prize.

Impatient for the experiment, as soon as I reached home, I summoned my confidential servant—a young man of gay spirits, fearless temper, and as free from superstitious prejudice as any one I could think of.

“F——,” said I, “you remember in Germany how disappointed we were at not finding a ghost in that old castle, which was said to be haunted by a headless apparition? Well, I have heard of a house in London which, I have reason to hope, is decidedly haunted. I mean to sleep there to-night. From what I hear, there is no doubt that something will allow itself to be seen or to be heard—something, perhaps, excessively horrible. Do you think, if I take you with me, I may rely on your presence of mind, whatever may happen?”

“Oh, Sir! pray trust me,” answered F——, grinning with delight.

“Very well; then here are the keys of the house—this is the address. Go now—select for me any bedroom you please; and since the house has not been inhabited for weeks, make up a good fire—air the bed well—see, of course, that there are candles as well as fuel. Take with you my revolver and my dagger—so much for my weapons—arm yourself equally well; and if we are not a match for a dozen ghosts, we shall be but a sorry couple of Englishmen.”

I was engaged for the rest of the day on business so urgent that I had not leisure to think much on the nocturnal adventure to which I had plighted my honor. I dined alone, and very late, and while dining, read, as is my habit. The volume I selected was one of Macaulay’s Essays. I thought to myself that I would take the book with me; there was so much of healthfulness in the style, and practical life in the subjects, that it would serve as an antidote against the influences of superstitious fancy.

Accordingly, about half past nine, I put the book into my pocket, and strolled leisurely toward the haunted house. I took with me a favorite dog—an exceedingly sharp, bold, and vigilant bull-terrier,—a dog fond of prowling about strange ghostly corners and passages at night in search of rats—a dog of dogs for a ghost.

It was a summer night, but chilly, the sky somewhat gloomy and overcast. Still there was a moon—faint and sickly, but still a moon—and if the clouds permitted, after midnight it would be brighter.

I reached the house, knocked, and my servant opened with a cheerful smile.

"All right, Sir, and very comfortable."

"Oh!" said I, rather disappointed; "have you not seen nor heard any thing remarkable?"

"Well, Sir, I must own I have heard something queer."

"What?—what?"

"The sound of feet pattering behind me; and once or twice small noises like whispers close at my ear—nothing more."

"You are not at all frightened?"

"I! not a bit of it, Sir;" and the man's bold look reassured me on one point—viz., that, happen what might, he would not desert me.

We were in the hall, the street-door closed, and my attention was now drawn to my dog. He had at first run in eagerly enough, but had sneaked back to the door, and was scratching and whining to get out. After patting him on the head, and encouraging him gently, the dog seemed to reconcile himself to the situation, and followed me and F— through the house, but keeping close at my heels instead of hurrying inquisitively in advance, which was his usual and normal habit in all strange places. We first visited the subterranean apartments, the kitchen and other offices, and especially the cellars, in which last there were two or three bottles of wine still left in a bin, covered with cobwebs, and evidently, by their appearance, undisturbed for many years. It was clear that the ghosts were not wine-bibbers. For the rest we discovered nothing of interest. There was a gloomy little back-yard, with very high walls. The stones of this yard were very damp; and what with the damp, and what with the dust and smoke-grime on the pavement, our feet left a slight impression where we passed. And now appeared the first strange phenomenon witnessed by myself in this strange abode. I saw, just before me, the print of a foot suddenly form itself, as it were. I stopped, caught hold of my servant, and pointed to it. In advance of that footprint as suddenly dropped another. We both saw it. I advanced quickly to the place; the footprint kept advancing before me, a small footprint—the foot of a child: the impression was too faint thoroughly to distinguish the shape, but it seemed to us both that it was the print of a naked foot. This phenomenon ceased when we arrived at the opposite wall, nor did it repeat itself on returning. We remounted the stairs, and entered the rooms on the ground-floor, a dining parlor, a small back-parlor, and a still smaller third room that had been probably appropriated to a footman—all still as death.

We then visited the drawing-rooms, which seemed fresh and new. In the front room I seated myself in an arm-chair. F— placed on the table the candlestick with which he had lighted us. I told him to shut the door. As he turned to do so, a chair opposite to me moved from the wall quickly and noiselessly, and dropped itself about a yard from my own chair, immediately fronting it.

"Why, this is better than the turning-tables," said I, with a half laugh; and as I laughed my dog put back his head and howled.

F—, coming back, had not observed the movement of the chair. He employed himself now in stilling the dog. I continued to gaze on the chair, and fancied I saw on it a pale-blue misty outline of a human figure, but an outline so indistinct that I could only distrust my own vision. The dog now was quiet. "Put back that chair opposite to me," said I to F—; "put it back to the wall."

F— obeyed. "Was that you, Sir?" said he, turning abruptly.

"I!—what?"

"Why, something struck me. I felt it sharply on the shoulder—just here."

"No," said I. "But we have jugglers present, and though we may not discover their tricks, we shall catch them before they frighten us."

We did not stay long in the drawing-rooms—in fact, they felt so damp and so chilly that I was glad to get to the fire up stairs. We locked the doors of the drawing-rooms—a precaution which, I should observe, we had taken with all the rooms we had searched below. The bedroom my servant had selected for me was the best on the floor—a large one, with two windows fronting the street. The four-posted bed, which took up no inconsiderable space, was opposite to the fire, which burned clear and bright; a door in the wall to the left, between the bed and the window, communicated with the room which my servant appropriated to himself. This last was a small room with a sofa-bed, and had no communication with the landing-place—no other door but that which conducted to the bedroom I was to occupy. On either side of my fire-place was a cupboard, without locks, flushed with the wall, and covered with the same dull-brown paper. We examined these cupboards—only hooks to suspend female dresses—nothing else; we sounded the walls—evidently solid—the outer walls of the building. Having finished the survey of these apartments, warmed myself a few moments, and lighted my cigar, I then, still accompanied by F—, went forth to complete my reconnoitre. In the landing-place there was another door; it was closed firmly. "Sir," said my servant, in surprise, "I unlocked this door with all the others when I first came; it can not have got locked from the inside, for it is a—"

Before he had finished his sentence, the door, which neither of us then was touching, opened quietly of itself. We looked at each other a single instant. The same thought seized both —some human agency might be detected here. I rushed in first, my servant followed. A small blank dreary room without furniture—a few empty boxes and hampers in the corner—a small window—the shutters closed—not even a fire-place—no other door but that by which we had entered—no carpet on the floor, and the floor seemed very old, uneven, worm-eaten, mended here and there, as was shown by the whiter patches on the wood; but no living being, and no visible place in which a living being could have hidden. As we stood gazing round, the door by which we had entered closed as quietly as it had before opened: we were imprisoned.

For the first time I felt a creep of undefinable horror. Not so my servant. "Why, they don't think to trap us, Sir; I could break that trumpery door with a kick of my foot."

"Try first if it will open to your hand," said I, shaking off the vague apprehension that had seized me, "while I open the shutters and see what is without."

I unbarred the shutters—the window looked on the little back-yard I have before described; there was no ledge without—nothing but sheer descent. No man getting out of that window would have found any footing till he had fallen on the stones below.

F—, meanwhile, was vainly attempting to open the door. He now turned round to me, and asked my permission to use force. And I should here state, in justice to the servant, that, far from evincing any superstitious terrors, his nerve, composure, and even gayety amidst circumstances so extraordinary, compelled my admiration, and made me congratulate myself on having secured a companion in every way fitted to the occasion. I willingly gave him the permission he required. But though he was a remarkably strong man, his force was as idle as his milder efforts; the door did not even shake to his stoutest kick. Breathless and panting, he desisted. I then tried the door myself, equally in vain. As I ceased from the effort, again that creep of horror came over me; but this time it was more cold and stubborn. I felt as if some strange and ghastly exhalation were rising up from the chinks of that rugged floor, and filling the atmosphere with a venomous influence hostile to human life. The door now very slowly and quietly opened as of its own accord. We precipitated ourselves into the landing-place. We both saw a large pale light—as large as the human figure, but shapeless and unsubstantial—move before us, and ascend the stairs that led from the landing into the attics. I followed the light, and my servant followed me. It entered, to the right of the landing, a small garret, of which the door stood open. I entered in the same instant. The light then collapsed into a small globe, exceedingly brilliant and vivid; rested a moment on a bed in the corner, quivered, and vanished. We approached the bed and examined it—a half-tester, such as is commonly found in attics devoted to servants. On the drawers that stood near it we perceived an old faded silk kerchief, with the needle still left in a rent half repaired. The kerchief was covered with dust; probably it had belonged to the old woman who had last died in that house, and this might have been her sleeping-room. I had sufficient curiosity to open the drawers: there were a few odds and ends of female dress, and two letters tied round with a narrow ribbon of faded yellow. I took the liberty to possess myself of the letters. We found nothing else in the room worth noticing—nor did the light reappear; but we distinctly heard, as we turned to go, a pattering footfall on the floor—just before us. We went through the other attics (in all four), the footfall still preceding us. Nothing to be seen—nothing but the footfall heard. I had the letters in my hand: just as I was descending the stairs I distinctly felt my wrist seized, and a faint soft effort made to draw the letters from my clasp. I only held them the more tightly, and the effort ceased.

We regained the bedchamber appropriated to myself, and I then remarked that my dog had not followed us when we had left it. He was thrusting himself close to the fire, and trembling. I was impatient to examine the letters; and while I read them, my servant opened a little box in which he had deposited the weapons I had ordered him to bring; took them out, placed them on a table close at my bed-head, and then occupied himself in soothing the dog, who, however, seemed to heed him very little.

The letters were short—they were dated; the dates exactly thirty-five years ago. They were evidently from a lover to his mistress, or a husband to some young wife. Not only the terms of expression, but a distinct reference to a former voyage, indicated the writer to have been a seafarer. The spelling and handwriting were those of a man imperfectly educated, but still the language itself was forcible. In the expressions of endearment there was a kind of rough wild love; but here and there were dark unintelligible hints at some secret not of love—some secret that seemed of crime. "We ought to love each other," was one of the sentences I remember, "for how every one else would execrate us if all was known!" Again: "Don't let any one be in the same room with you at night—you talk in your sleep." And again: "What's done can't be undone; and I tell you there's nothing against us unless the dead could come to life." Here there was underlined in a better handwriting (a female's), "They do!" At the end of the letter latest in date the same female hand had written these words: "Lost at sea the 4th of June, the same day as—"

I put down the letters, and began to muse over their contents.

Fearing, however, that the train of thought into which I fell might unsteady my nerves, I fully determined to keep my mind in a fit state to cope with whatever of marvelous the advancing night might bring forth. I roused myself—laid the letters on the table—stirred up the fire, which was still bright and cheering—and opened my volume of Macaulay. I read quietly enough till about half past eleven. I then threw myself dressed upon the bed, and told my servant he might retire to his own room, but must keep himself awake. I bade him leave open the door between the two rooms. Thus alone, I kept two candles burning on the table by my bed-head. I placed my watch beside the weapons, and calmly resumed my Macaulay. Opposite to me the fire burned clear; and on the hearth-rug, seemingly asleep, lay the dog. In about twenty minutes I felt an exceedingly cold air pass by my cheek, like a sudden draught. I fancied the door to my right, communicating with the landing-place, must have got open; but no—it was closed. I then turned my glance to my left, and saw the flame of the candles violently swayed as by a wind. At the same moment the watch beside the revolver softly slid from the table—softly, softly—no visible hand—it was gone. I sprang up, seizing the revolver with the one hand, the dagger with the other: I was not willing that my weapons should share the fate of the watch. Thus armed, I looked round the floor—no sign of the watch. Three slow, loud, distinct knocks were now heard at the bed-head; my servant called out, "Is that you, Sir?"

"No; be on your guard!"

The dog now roused himself and sat on his haunches, his ears moving quickly backward and forward. He kept his eyes fixed on me with a look so strange that he concentrated all my attention on himself. Slowly he rose up, all his hair bristling, and stood perfectly rigid, and with the same wild stare. I had no time, however, to examine the dog. Presently my servant emerged from his room; and if ever I saw horror in the human face, it was then. I should not have recognized him had we met in the street, so altered was every lineament. He passed by me quickly, saying in a whisper that seemed scarcely to come from his lips, "Run—run! it is after me!" He gained the door to the landing, pulled it open, and rushed forth. I followed him into the landing involuntarily, calling to him to stop; but, without heeding me, he bounded down the stairs, clinging to the balusters, and taking several steps at a time. I heard, where I stood, the street-door open—heard it again clap to. I was left alone in the haunted house.

It was but for a moment that I remained undecided whether or not to follow my servant; pride and curiosity alike forbade so dastardly a flight. I re-entered my room, closing the door after me, and proceeded cautiously into the interior chamber. I encountered nothing to justify my servant's terror. I again carefully examined the walls, to see if there were any concealed door. I could find no trace of one—not even a seam in the dull-brown paper with which the room was hung. How, then, had the THING, whatever it was, which had so scared him, obtained ingress except through my own chamber?

I returned to my room, shut and locked the door that opened upon the interior one, and stood on the hearth, expectant and prepared. I now perceived that the dog had slunk into an angle of the wall, and was pressing himself close against it, as if literally striving to force his way into it. I approached the animal and spoke to it; the poor brute was evidently beside itself with terror. It showed all its teeth, the slaver dropping from its jaws, and would certainly have bitten me if I had touched it. It did not seem to recognize me. Whoever has seen at the Zoological Gardens a rabbit fascinated by a serpent, cowering in a corner, may form some idea of the anguish which the dog exhibited. Finding all efforts to soothe the animal in vain, and fearing that his bite might be as venomous in that state as in the madness of hydrophobia, I left him alone, placed my weapons on the table beside the fire, seated myself, and recommenced my Macaulay.

Perhaps, in order not to appear seeking credit for a courage, or rather a coolness, which the reader may conceive I exaggerate, I may be pardoned if I pause to indulge in one or two egotistical remarks.

As I hold presence of mind, or what is called courage, to be precisely proportioned to familiarity with the circumstances that lead to it, so I should say that I had been long sufficiently familiar with all experiments that appertain to the Marvelous. I had witnessed many very extraordinary phenomena in various parts of the world—phenomena that would be either totally disbelieved if I stated them, or ascribed to supernatural agencies. Now, my theory is that the Supernatural is the Impossible, and that what is called supernatural is only a something in the laws of nature of which we have been hitherto ignorant. Therefore, if a ghost rise before me, I have not the right to say, "So, then, the supernatural is possible;" but rather, "So, then, the apparition of a ghost is, contrary to received opinion, within the laws of nature—i. e., not supernatural."

Now, in all that I had hitherto witnessed, and indeed in all the wonders which the amateurs of mystery in our age record as facts, a material living agency is always required. On the Continent you will find still magicians who assert that they can raise spirits. Assume for the moment that they assert truly, still the living material form of the magician is present; and he is the material agency by which, from some constitutional peculiarities, certain strange phenomena are represented to your natural senses.

Accept, again, as truthful, the tales of Spirit Manifestation in America—musical or other sounds—writings on paper, produced by no discernible hand—articles of furniture moved without apparent human agency—or the actual sight and touch of hands to which no bodies seem to belong—still there must be found the MEDIUM or living being, with constitutional peculiarities capable of obtaining these signs. In fine, in all such marvels, supposing even that there is no imposture, there must be a human being like ourselves, by whom, or through whom, the effects presented to human beings are produced.

It is so with the now familiar phenomena of mesmerism, or electro-biology; the mind of the person operated on is affected through a material living agent. Nor, supposing it true that a mesmerized patient can respond to the will or passes of a mesmerizer a hundred miles distant, is the response less occasioned by a material being; it may be through a material fluid—call it Electric, call it Odic, call it what you will—which has the power of traversing space and passing obstacles, that the material effect is communicated from one to the other. Hence all that I had hitherto witnessed, or expected to witness, in this strange house, I believed to be occasioned through some agency or medium as mortal as myself; and this idea necessarily prevented the awe with which those who regard as supernatural things that are not within the ordinary operations of nature, might have been impressed by the adventures of that memorable night.

As, then, it was my conjecture that all that was presented, or would be presented, to my senses, must originate in some human being gifted by constitution with the power so to present them, and having some motive so to do, I felt an interest in my theory which, in its way, was rather philosophical than superstitious. And I can sincerely say that I was in as tranquil a temper for observation as any practical experimentalist could be in awaiting the effects of some rare, though perhaps perilous, chemical combination. Of course, the more I kept my mind detached from fancy, the more the temper fitted for observation would be obtained; and I therefore riveted eye and thought on the strong daylight sense in the page of my Macaulay.

I now became aware that something interposed between the page and the light—the page was overshadowed: I looked up, and I saw what I shall find it very difficult, perhaps impossible, to describe.

It was a Darkness shaping itself out of the air in very undefined outline. I can not say it was of a human form, and yet it had more resemblance to a human form, or rather shadow, than any thing else. As it stood, wholly apart and distinct from the air and the light around it, its dimensions seemed gigantic, the summit nearly touching the ceiling. While I gazed a feeling of intense cold seized me. An iceberg before me could not more have chilled me; nor could the cold of an iceberg have been more purely physical. I feel convinced that it was not the cold caused by fear. As I continued to gaze I thought—but this I can not say with precision—that I distinguished two eyes looking down on me from the height. One moment I seemed to distinguish them clearly, the next they seemed gone; but still two rays of a pale-blue light frequently shot through the darkness, as from the height on which I half believed, half doubted, that I had encountered the eyes.

I strove to speak—my voice utterly failed me; I could only think to myself, "Is this fear? it is not fear!" I strove to rise—in vain; I felt as if weighed down by an irresistible force. Indeed, my impression was that of an immense and overwhelming Power opposed to my volition—that sense of utter inadequacy to cope with a force beyond men's, which one may feel physically in a storm at sea, in a conflagration, or when confronting some terrible wild beast, or rather, perhaps, the shark of the ocean, I felt morally. Opposed to my will was another will, as far superior to its strength as storm, fire, and shark are superior in material force to the force of men.

And now, as this impression grew on me, now came, at last, horror—horror to a degree that no words can convey. Still I retained pride, if not courage; and in my own mind I said, "This is horror, but it is not fear; unless I fear, I can not be harmed; my reason rejects this thing; it is an illusion—I do not fear." With a violent effort I succeeded at last in stretching out my hand toward the weapon on the table: as I did so, on the arm and shoulder I received a strange shock, and my arm fell to my side powerless. And now, to add to my horror, the light began slowly to wane from the candles—they were not, as it were, extinguished, but their flame seemed very gradually withdrawn: it was the same with the fire—the light was extracted from the fuel; in a few minutes the room was in utter darkness. The dread that came over me, to be thus in the dark with that dark Thing, whose power was so intensely felt, brought a reaction of nerve. In fact, terror had reached that climax, that either my senses must have deserted me, or I must have burst through the spell. I did burst through it. I found voice, though the voice was a shriek. I remember that I broke forth with words like these—"I do not fear, my soul does not fear;" and at the same time I found the strength to rise. Still in that profound gloom I rushed to one of the windows—tore aside the curtain—flung open the shutters; my first thought was—LIGHT. And when I saw the moon high, clear, and calm, I felt a joy that almost compensated for the previous terror. There was the moon, there was also the light from the gas-lamps in the deserted slumberous street. I turned to look back into the room; the moon penetrated its shadow very palely and partially—but still there was light. The dark Thing, whatever it might be, was gone—except that I could yet see a dim shadow, which seemed the shadow of that shade, against the opposite wall.

My eye now rested on the table, and from under the table (which was without cloth or cover—an old mahogany round table) there rose a hand, visible as far as the wrist. It was a hand, seemingly, as much of flesh and blood as my own, but the hand of an aged person—lean, wrinkled, small too—a woman's hand. That hand very softly closed on the two letters that lay on the table: hand and letters both vanished. There then came the same three loud measured knocks I had heard at the bed-head before this extraordinary drama had commenced.

As those sounds slowly ceased, I felt the whole room vibrate sensibly; and at the far end there rose, as from the floor, sparks or globules like bubbles of light, many-colored—green, yellow, fire-red, azure. Up and down, to and fro, hither, thither, as tiny will-o'-the-wisps, the sparks moved, slow or swift, each at its own caprice. A chair (as in the drawing-room below) was now advanced from the wall without apparent agency, and placed at the opposite side of the table. Suddenly, as forth from the chair, there grew a Shape—a woman's shape. It was distinct as a shape of life—ghastly as a shape of death. The face was that of youth, with a strange mournful beauty; the throat and shoulders were bare, the rest of the form in a loose robe of cloudy white. It began sleeking its long yellow hair, which fell over its shoulders; its eyes were not turned toward me, but to the door; it seemed listening, watching, waiting. The shadow of the shade in the back-ground grew darker; and again I thought I beheld the eyes gleaming out from the summit of the shadow—eyes fixed upon that shape.

As if from the door, though it did not open, there grew out another shape, equally distinct, equally ghastly—a man's shape—a young man's. It was in the dress of the last century, or rather in a likeness of such dress; for both the male shape and the female, though defined, were evidently unsubstantial, impalpable—simulacra—phantasms; and there was something incongruous, grotesque, yet fearful, in the contrast between the elaborate finery, the courtly precision of that old-fashioned garb, with its ruffles and lace and buckles, and the corpse-like aspect and ghost-like stillness of the fitting wearer. Just as the male shape approached the female, the dark Shadow started from the wall, all three for a moment wrapped in darkness. When the pale light returned, the two phantoms were as if in the grasp of the Shadow that towered between them; and there was a blood-stain on the breast of the female; and the phantom male was leaning on its phantom sword, and blood seemed trickling fast from the ruffles, from the lace; and the darkness of the intermediate Shadow swallowed them up—they were gone. And again the bubbles of light shot, and sailed, and undulated, growing thicker and thicker and more wildly confused in their movements.

The closet-door to the right of the fire-place now opened, and from the aperture there came the form of a woman, aged. In her hand she held letters—the very letters over which I had seen the Hand close; and behind her I heard a footstep. She turned round as if to listen, and then she opened the letters and seemed to read; and over her shoulder I saw a livid face, the face as of a man long drowned—bloated, bleached—sea-weed tangled in its dripping hair; and at her feet lay a form as of a corpse, and beside the corpse there cowered a child, a miserable, squalid child, with famine in its cheeks and fear in its eyes. And as I looked in the old woman's face the wrinkles and lines vanished, and it became a face of youth—hard-eyed, stony, but still youth; and the Shadow darted forth, and darkened over these phantoms as it had darkened over the last.

Nothing now was left but the Shadow, and on that my eyes were intently fixed, till again eyes grew out of the Shadow—malignant, serpent eyes. And the bubbles of light again rose and fell, and in their disordered, irregular, turbulent maze, mingled with the wan moonlight. And now from these globules themselves, as from the shell of an egg, monstrous things burst out; the air grew filled with them; larvæ so bloodless and so hideous that I can in no way describe them except to remind the reader of the swarming life which the solar microscope brings before his eyes in a drop of water—things transparent, supple, agile, chasing each other, devouring each other—forms like naught ever beheld by the naked eye. As the shapes were without symmetry, so their movements were without order. In their very vagrancies there was no sport; they came round me and round, thicker and faster and swifter, swarming over my head, crawling over my right arm, which was outstretched in involuntary command against all evil beings. Sometimes I felt myself touched, but not by them; invisible hands touched me. Once I felt the clutch as of cold, soft fingers at my throat. I was still equally conscious that if I gave way to fear I should be in bodily peril; and I concentrated all my faculties in the single focus of resisting, stubborn will. And I turned my sight from the shadow—above all, from those strange serpent eyes—eyes that had now become distinctly visible. For there, though in naught else around me, I was aware that there was a WILL, and a will of intense, creative, working evil, which might crush down my own.

The pale atmosphere in the room began now to redden as if in the air of some near conflagration. The larvæ grew lurid as things that live in fire. Again the room vibrated; again were heard the three measured knocks; and again all things were swallowed up in the darkness of the dark Shadow, as if out of that darkness all had come, into that darkness all returned.

As the gloom receded, the Shadow was wholly gone. Slowly as it had been withdrawn, the flame grew again into the candles on the table, again into the fuel in the grate. The whole room came once more calmly, healthfully into sight.

The two doors were still closed, the door communicating with the servant's room still locked. In the corner of the wall, into which he had so convulsively niched himself, lay the dog. I called to him—no movement; I approached—the animal was dead; his eyes protruded; his tongue out of his mouth; the froth gathered round his jaws. I took him in my arms; I brought him to the fire; I felt acute grief for the loss of my poor favorite—acute self-reproach; I accused myself of his death; I imagined he had died of fright. But what was my surprise on finding that his neck was actually broken—actually twisted out of the vertebræ! Had this been done in the dark?—must it not have been by a hand human as mine?—must there not have been a human agency all the while in that room? Good cause to suspect it. I can not tell. I can not do more than state the fact fairly; the reader may draw his own inference.

Another surprising circumstance—my watch was restored to the table from which it had been so mysteriously withdrawn; but it had stopped at the very moment it was so withdrawn; nor, despite all the skill of the watchmaker, has it ever gone since—that is, it will go in a strange, erratic way for a few hours, and then come to a dead stop—it is worthless.

Nothing more chanced for the rest of the night. Nor, indeed, had I long to wait before the dawn broke. Not till it was broad daylight did I quit the haunted house. Before I did so I revisited the little blind room in which my servant and myself had been for a time imprisoned. I had a strong impression—for which I could not account—that from that room had originated the mechanism of the phenomena—if I may use the term—which had been experienced in my chamber. And though I entered it now in the clear day, with the sun peering through the filmy window, I still felt, as I stood on its floor, the creep of the horror which I had first there experienced the night before, and which had been so aggravated by what had passed in my own chamber. I could not, indeed, bear to stay more than half a minute within those walls. I descended the stairs, and again I heard the footfall before me; and when I opened the street-door I thought I could distinguish a very low laugh. I gained my own home, expecting to find my runaway servant there. But he had not presented himself; nor did I hear more of him for three days, when I received a letter from him, dated from Liverpool, to this effect:

“HONORED SIR,—I humbly entreat your pardon, though I can scarcely hope that you will think I deserve it, unless—which Heaven forbid!—you saw what I did. I feel that it will be years before I can recover myself; and as to being fit for service, it is out of the question. I am therefore going to my brother-in-law at Melbourne. The ship sails to-morrow. Perhaps the long voyage may set me up. I do nothing now but start and tremble, and fancy it is behind me. I humbly beg you, honored Sir, to order my clothes, and whatever wages are due to me, to be sent to my mother’s, at Walworth—John knows her address.”

The letter ended with additional apologies, somewhat incoherent, and explanatory details as to effects that had been under the writer’s charge.

This flight may perhaps warrant a suspicion that the man wished to go to Australia, and had been somehow or other fraudulently mixed up with the events of the night. I say nothing in refutation of that conjecture; rather, I suggest it as one that would seem to many persons the most probable solution of improbable occurrences. My own theory remained unshaken. I returned in the evening to the house, to bring away in a hack cab the things I had left there, with my poor dog’s body. In this task I was not disturbed, nor did any incident worth note befall me except that still, on ascending and descending the stairs, I heard the same footfall in advance. On leaving the house, I went to Mr. J——’s. He was at home. I returned him the keys, told him that my curiosity was sufficiently gratified, and was about to relate quickly what had passed, when he stopped me, and said, though with much politeness, that he had no longer any interest in a mystery which none had ever solved.

I determined at least to tell him of the two letters I had read, as well as of the extraordinary manner in which they had disappeared, and I then inquired if he thought they had been addressed to the woman who had died in the house, and if there were any thing in her early history which could possibly confirm the dark suspicions to which the letters gave rise. Mr. J—— seemed startled, and, after musing a few moments, answered, “I am but little acquainted with the woman’s earlier history, except, as I before told you, that her family were known to mine. But you revive some vague reminiscences to her prejudice. I will make inquiries, and inform you of their result. Still, even if we could admit the popular superstition that a person who had been either the perpetrator or the victim of dark crimes in life could revisit, as a restless spirit, the scene in which those crimes had been committed, I should observe that the house was infested by strange sights and sounds before the old woman died—you smile—what would you say?”

“I would say this, that I am convinced, if we could get to the bottom of these mysteries, we should find a living human agency.”

“What! you believe it is all an imposture? for what object?”

“Not an imposture in the ordinary sense of the word. If suddenly I were to sink into a deep sleep, from which you could not awake me, but in that sleep could answer questions with an accuracy which I could not pretend to when awake—tell you what money you had in your pocket—nay, describe your very thoughts—it is not necessarily an imposture, any more than it is necessarily supernatural. I should be, unconsciously to myself, under a mesmeric influence, conveyed to me from a distance by a human being who had acquired power over me by previous rapport.”

“Granting mesmerism, so far carried, to be a fact, you are right. And you might infer from this that a mesmerizer might produce the extraordinary effects you and others have witnessed over inanimate objects—fill the air with sights and sounds?”

"Or impress our senses with the belief in them—we never having been en rapport with the person acting on us? No. What is commonly called mesmerism could not do this; but there may be a power akin to mesmerism, and superior to it—the power that in the old days was called Magic. That such a power may extend to all inanimate objects of matter I do not say; but if so, it would not be against nature, only a rare power in nature which might be given to constitutions with certain peculiarities, and cultivated by practice to an extraordinary degree. That such a power might extend over the dead—that is, over certain thoughts and memories that the dead may still retain—and compel, not that which ought properly to be called the SOUL, and which is far beyond human reach, but rather a phantom of what has been most earth-stained on earth, to make itself apparent to our senses—is a very ancient though obsolete theory, upon which I will hazard no opinion. But I do not conceive the power would be supernatural. Let me illustrate what I mean from an experiment which Paracelsus describes as not difficult, and which the author of the "Curiosities of Literature" cites as credible:—A flower perishes; you burn it. Whatever were the elements of that flower while it lived are gone, dispersed, you know not whither; you can never discover nor re-collect them. But you can, by chemistry, out of the burned dust of that flower, raise a spectrum of the flower, just as it seemed in life. It may be the same with the human being. The soul has as much escaped you as the essence or elements of the flower. Still you may make a spectrum of it. And this phantom, though in the popular superstition it is held to be the soul of the departed, must not be confounded with the true soul; it is but the eidolon of the dead form. Hence, like the best-attested stories of ghosts or spirits, the thing that most strikes us is the absence of what we hold to be soul; that is, of superior emancipated intelligence. They come for little or no object—they seldom speak, if they do come; they utter no ideas above that of an ordinary person on earth. American spirit-seers have published volumes of communications in prose and verse, which they assert to be given in the names of the most illustrious dead—Shakespeare, Bacon—Heaven knows whom. Those communications, taking the best, are certainly not a whit of higher order than would be communications from living persons of fair talent and education; they are wondrously inferior to what Bacon, Shakespeare, and Plato said and wrote when on earth. Nor, what is more notable, do they ever contain an idea that was not on the earth before. Wonderful, therefore, as such phenomena may be (granting them to be truthful), I see much that philosophy may question, nothing that it is incumbent on philosophy to deny—viz., nothing supernatural. They are but ideas conveyed somehow or other (we have not yet discovered the means) from one mortal brain to another. Whether, in so doing, tables walk of their own accord, or fiend-like shapes appear in a magic circle, or bodiless hands rise and remove material objects, or a Thing of Darkness, such as presented itself to me, freeze our blood—still am I persuaded that these are but agencies conveyed, as by electric wires, to my own brain from the brain of another. In some constitutions there is a natural chemistry, and those may produce chemic wonders—in others, a natural fluid, call it electricity, and these produce electric wonders. But they differ in this from Normal Science—they are alike objectless, purposeless, puerile, frivolous. They lead on to no grand results; and therefore the world does not heed, and true sages have not cultivated them. But sure I am, that of all I saw or heard, a man, human as myself, was the remote originator; and I believe unconsciously to himself as to the exact effects produced, for this reason: no two persons, you say, have ever told you that they experienced exactly the same thing. Well, observe, no two persons ever experience exactly the same dream. If this were an ordinary imposture, the machinery would be arranged for results that would but little vary; if it were a supernatural agency permitted by the Almighty, it would surely be for some definite end. These phenomena belong to neither class; my persuasion is, that they originate in some brain now far distant; that that brain had no distinct volition in any thing that occurred; that what does occur reflects but its devious, motley, ever-shifting, half-formed thoughts; in short, that it has been but the dreams of such a brain put into action and invested with a semi-substance. That this brain is of immense power, that it can set matter into movement, that it is malignant and destructive, I believe: some material force must have killed my dog; it might, for aught I know, have sufficed to kill myself, had I been as subjugated by terror as the dog—had my intellect or my spirit given me no countervailing resistance in my will."

"It killed your dog! that is fearful! indeed it is strange that no animal can be induced to stay in that house; not even a cat. Rats and mice are never found in it."

"The instincts of the brute creation detect influences deadly to their existence. Man's reason has a sense less subtle, because it has a resisting power more supreme. But enough; do you comprehend my theory?"

"Yes, though imperfectly—and I accept any crotchet (pardon the word), however odd, rather than embrace at once the notion of ghosts and hobgoblins we imbibed in our nurseries. Still, to my unfortunate house the evil is the same. What on earth can I do with the house?"

"I will tell you what I would do. I am convinced from my own internal feelings that the small unfurnished room at right angles to the door of the bedroom which I occupied, forms a starting-point or receptacle for the influences which haunt the house; and I strongly advise you to have the walls opened, the floor removed —nay, the whole room pulled down. I observe that it is detached from the body of the house, built over the small back-yard, and could be removed without injury to the rest of the building."

"And you think, if I did that—"

"You would cut off the telegraph wires. Try it. I am so persuaded that I am right, that I will pay half the expense if you will allow me to direct the operations."

"Nay, I am well able to afford the cost; for the rest, allow me to write to you."

About ten days afterward I received a letter from Mr. J——, telling me that he had visited the house since I had seen him; that he had found the two letters I had described, replaced in the drawer from which I had taken them; that he had read them with misgivings like my own; that he had instituted a cautious inquiry about the woman to whom I rightly conjectured they had been written. It seemed that thirty-six years ago (a year before the date of the letters) she had married, against the wish of her relatives, an American of very suspicious character; in fact, he was generally believed to have been a pirate. She herself was the daughter of very respectable tradespeople, and had served in the capacity of a nursery governess before her marriage. She had a brother, a widower, who was considered wealthy, and who had one child of about six years old. A month after the marriage the body of this brother was found in the Thames, near London Bridge; there seemed some marks of violence about his throat, but they were not deemed sufficient to warrant the inquest in any other verdict than that of "Found drowned."

The American and his wife took charge of the little boy, the deceased brother having by his will left his sister the guardian of his only child—and in event of the child's death, the sister inherited. The child died about six months afterward—it was supposed to have been neglected and ill-treated. The neighbors deposed to have heard it shriek at night. The surgeon who had examined it after death, said that it was emaciated as if from want of nourishment, and the body was covered with livid bruises. It seemed that one winter night the child had sought to escape—crept out into the back-yard—tried to scale the wall—fallen back exhausted, and been found at morning on the stones in a dying state. But though there was some evidence of cruelty, there was none of murder; and the aunt and her husband had sought to palliate cruelty by alleging the exceeding stubbornness and perversity of the child, who was declared to be half-witted. Be that as it may, at the orphan's death the aunt inherited her brother's fortune. Before the first wedded year was out the American quitted England abruptly, and never returned to it. He obtained a cruising vessel, which was lost in the Atlantic two years afterward. The widow was left in affluence; but reverses of various kinds had befallen her: a bank broke—an investment failed—she went into a small business and became insolvent—then she entered into service, sinking lower and lower, from housekeeper down to maid-of-all-work—never long retaining a place, though nothing peculiar against her character was ever alleged. She was considered sober, honest, and peculiarly quiet in her ways; still nothing prospered with her. And so she had dropped into the work-house, from which Mr. J—— had taken her, to be placed in charge of the very house which she had rented as mistress in the first year of her wedded life.

Mr. J—— added that he had passed an hour alone in the unfurnished room which I had urged him to destroy, and that his impressions of dread while there were so great, though he had neither heard nor seen any thing, that he was eager to have the walls bared and the floors removed as I had suggested. He had engaged persons for the work, and would commence any day I would name.

The day was accordingly fixed. I repaired to the haunted house—we went into the blind dreary room, took up the skirting, and then the floors. Under the rafters, covered with rubbish, was found a trap-door, quite large enough to admit a man. It was closely nailed down with clamps and rivets of iron. On removing these we descended into a room below, the existence of which had never been suspected. In this room there had been a window and a flue, but they had been bricked over, evidently for many years. By the help of candles we examined this place; it still retained some mouldering furniture—three chairs, an oak settle, a table—all of the fashion of about eighty years ago. There was a chest of drawers against the wall, in which we found, half-rotted away, old-fashioned articles of a man's dress, such as might have been worn eighty or a hundred years ago by a gentleman of some rank—costly steel buckles and buttons, like those yet worn in court-dresses—a handsome court sword—in a waistcoat which had once been rich with gold-lace, but which was now blackened and foul with damp, we found five guineas, a few silver coins, and an ivory ticket, probably for some place of entertainment long since passed away. But our main discovery was in a kind of iron safe fixed to the wall, the lock of which it cost us much trouble to get picked.

In this safe were three shelves and two small drawers. Ranged on the shelves were several small bottles of crystal, hermetically stopped. They contained colorless volatile essences, of what nature I shall say no more than that they were not poisons—phosphor and ammonia entered into some of them. There were also some very curious glass tubes, and a small pointed rod of iron, with a large lump of rock-crystal, and another of amber—also a loadstone of great power.

In one of the drawers we found a miniature portrait set in gold, and retaining the freshness of its colors most remarkably, considering the length of time it had probably been there. The portrait was that of a man who might be somewhat advanced in middle life, perhaps forty-seven or forty-eight.

It was a most peculiar face—a most impressive face. If you could fancy some mighty serpent transformed into man, preserving in the human lineaments the old serpent type, you would have a better idea of that countenance than long descriptions can convey: the width and flatness of frontal—the tapering elegance of contour disguising the strength of the deadly jaw—the long, large, terrible eye, glittering and green as the emerald—and withal a certain ruthless calm, as if from the consciousness of an immense power. The strange thing was this—the instant I saw the miniature I recognized a startling likeness to one of the rarest portraits in the world—the portrait of a man of a rank only below that of royalty, who in his own day had made a considerable noise. History says little or nothing of him; but search the correspondence of his contemporaries, and you find reference to his wild daring, his bold profligacy, his restless spirit, his taste for the occult sciences. While still in the meridian of life he died and was buried, so say the chronicles, in a foreign land. He died in time to escape the grasp of the law, for he was accused of crimes which would have given him to the headsman. After his death, the portraits of him, which had been numerous, for he had been a munificent encourager of art, were bought up and destroyed—it was supposed by his heirs, who might have been glad could they have razed his very name from their splendid line. He had enjoyed a vast wealth; a large portion of this was believed to have been embezzled by a favorite astrologer or soothsayer—at all events, it had unaccountably vanished at the time of his death. One portrait alone of him was supposed to have escaped the general destruction; I had seen it in the house of a collector some months before. It had made on me a wonderful impression, as it does on all who behold it—a face never to be forgotten; and there was that face in the miniature that lay within my hand. True, that in the miniature the man was a few years older than in the portrait I had seen, or than the original was even at the time of his death. But a few years!—why, between the date in which flourished that direful noble and the date in which the miniature was evidently painted, there was an interval of more than two centuries. While I was thus gazing, silent and wondering, Mr. J—— said,

“But is it possible? I have known this man.”

“How—where?” cried I.

“In India. He was high in the confidence of the Rajah of —, and well-nigh drew him into a revolt which would have lost the Rajah his dominions. The man was a Frenchman—his name De V——, clever, bold, lawless. We insisted on his dismissal and banishment: it must be the same man—no two faces like his—yet this miniature seems nearly a hundred years old.”

Mechanically I turned round the miniature to examine the back of it, and on the back was engraved a pentacle; in the middle of the pentacle a ladder, and the third step of the ladder was formed by the date 1765. Examining still more minutely, I detected a spring; this, on being pressed, opened the back of the miniature as a lid. Withinside the lid were engraved, “Mariana to thee—Be faithful in life and in death to —.” Here follows a name that I will not mention, but it was not unfamiliar to me. I had heard it spoken of by old men in my childhood as the name borne by a dazzling charlatan who had made a great sensation in London for a year or so, and had fled the country on the charge of a double murder within his own house—that of his mistress and his rival. I said nothing of this to Mr. J——, to whom reluctantly I resigned the miniature.

We had found no difficulty in opening the first drawer within the iron safe; we found great difficulty in opening the second: it was not locked, but it resisted all efforts till we inserted in the chinks the edge of a chisel. When we had thus drawn it forth we found a very singular apparatus in the nicest order. Upon a small thin book, or rather tablet, was placed a saucer of crystal; this saucer was filled with a clear liquid—on that liquid floated a kind of compass, with a needle shifting rapidly round; but instead of the usual points of a compass were seven strange characters, not very unlike those used by astrologers to denote the planets. A very peculiar, but not strong nor displeasing odor came from this drawer, which was lined with a wood that we afterward discovered to be hazel. Whatever the cause of this odor it produced a material effect on the nerves. We all felt it, even the two workmen who were in the room—a creeping tingling sensation from the tips of the fingers to the roots of the hair. Impatient to examine the tablet I removed the saucer. As I did so the needle of the compass went round and round with exceeding swiftness, and I felt a shock that ran through my whole frame, so that I dropped the saucer on the floor. The liquid was spilled—the saucer was broken—the compass rolled to the end of the room—and at that instant the walls shook to and fro, as if a giant had swayed and rocked them.

The two workmen were so frightened that they ran up the ladder by which we had descended from the trap-door, but seeing that nothing more happened they were easily induced to return.

Meanwhile I had opened the tablet: it was bound in plain red leather with a silver clasp; it contained but one sheet of thick vellum, and on that sheet were inscribed, within a double pentacle, words in old monkish Latin, which are literally to be translated thus: “On all that it can reach within these walls—sentient or inanimate, living or dead—as moves the needle, so work my will! Accursed be the house, and restless be the dwellers therein.”

We found no more. Mr. J—— burned the tablet and its anathema. He razed to the foundations the part of the building containing the secret-room with the chamber over it. He had then the courage to inhabit the house himself for a month, and a quieter, better-conditioned house could not be found in all London. Subsequently he let it to advantage, and his tenant has made no complaints.

But my story is not yet done. A few days after Mr. J—— had removed into the house I paid him a visit. We were standing by the open window and conversing. A van containing some articles of furniture which he was moving from his former house was at the door. I had just urged on him my theory that all those phenomena regarded as supermundane had emanated from a human brain; adducing the charm or rather curse we had found and destroyed in support of my philosophy. Mr. J—— was observing in reply, "That even if mesmerism, or whatever analogous power it might be called, could really thus work in the absence of the operator, and produce effects so extraordinary, still could those effects continue when the operator himself was dead? and if the spell had been wrought, and, indeed, the room walled up, more than seventy years ago, the probability was, that the operator had long since departed this life;" Mr. J——, I say, was thus answering, when I caught hold of his arm and pointed to the street below.

A well-dressed man had crossed from the opposite side, and was accosting the carrier in charge of the van. His face, as he stood, was exactly fronting our window. It was the face of the miniature we had discovered; it was the face of the portrait of the noble three centuries ago.

"Good Heavens!" cried Mr. J——, "that is the face of De V——, and scarcely a day older than when I saw it in the Rajah's court in my youth!"

Seized by the same thought, we both hastened down stairs. I was first in the street; but the man had already gone. I caught sight of him, however, not many yards in advance, and in another moment I was by his side.

I had resolved to speak to him, but when I looked into his face, I felt as if it were impossible to do so. That eye—the eye of the serpent—fixed and held me spell-bound. And withal, about the man's whole person there was a dignity, an air of pride and station and superiority, that would have made any one, habituated to the usages of the world, hesitate long before venturing upon a liberty or impertinence. And what could I say? what was it I would ask? Thus ashamed of my first impulse, I fell a few paces back, still, however, following the stranger, undecided what else to do. Meanwhile he turned the corner of the street; a plain carriage was in waiting, with a servant out of livery dressed like a valet-de-place at the carriage-door. In another moment he had stepped into the carriage, and it drove off. I returned to the house. Mr. J—— was still at the street-door. He had asked the carrier what the stranger had said to him.

"Merely asked whom that house now belonged to."

The same evening I happened to go with a friend to a place in town called the Cosmopolitan Club, a place open to men of all countries, all opinions, all degrees. One orders one's coffee, smokes one's cigar. One is always sure to meet agreeable, sometimes remarkable persons.

I had not been two minutes in the room before I beheld at a table, conversing with an acquaintance of mine, whom I will designate by the initial G——, the man—the Original of the Miniature. He was now without his hat, and the likeness was yet more startling, only I observed that while he was conversing there was less severity in the countenance; there was even a smile, though a very quiet and very cold one. The dignity of mien I had acknowledged in the street was also more striking; a dignity akin to that which invests some prince of the East—conveying the idea of supreme indifference, and habitual, indisputable, indolent, but resistless power.

G—— soon after left the stranger, who then took up a scientific journal, which seemed to absorb his attention.

I drew G—— aside—"Who and what is that gentleman?"

"That? Oh, a very remarkable man indeed. I met him last year amidst the caves of Petra—the scriptural Edom. He is the best Oriental scholar I know. We joined company, had an adventure with robbers, in which he showed a coolness that saved our lives; afterward he invited me to spend a day with him in a house he had bought at Damascus—a house buried among almond-blossoms and roses—the most beautiful thing! He had lived there for some years, quite as an Oriental, in grand style. I half suspect he is a renegade, immensely rich, very odd; by-the-by, a great mesmerizer. I have seen him with my own eyes produce an effect on inanimate things. If you take a letter from your pocket and throw it to the other end of the room, he will order it to come to his feet, and you will see the letter wriggle itself along the floor till it has obeyed his command. 'Pon my honor 'tis true: I have seen him affect even the weather, disperse or collect clouds, by means of a glass tube or wand. But he does not like talking of these matters to strangers. He has only just arrived in England; says he has not been here for a great many years; let me introduce him to you."

"Certainly! He is English then? What is his name?"

"Oh!—a very homely one—Richards."

"And what is his birth—his family?"

"How do I know? What does it signify?—no doubt some parvenu, but rich—so infernally rich!"

G—— drew me up to the stranger, and the introduction was effected. The manners of Mr. Richards were not those of an adventurous traveler. Travelers are in general constitutionally gifted with high animal spirits; they are talkative, eager, imperious. Mr. Richards was calm and subdued in tone, with manners which were made distant by the loftiness of punctilious courtesy—the manners of a former age. I observed that the English he spoke was not exactly of our day. I should even have said that the accent was slightly foreign. But then Mr. Richards remarked that he had been little in the habit for many years of speaking in his native tongue. The conversation fell upon the changes in the aspect of London since he had last visited our metropolis. G—— then glanced off to the moral changes—literary, social, political—the great men who were removed from the stage within the last twenty years—the new great men who were coming on. In all this Mr. Richards evinced no interest. He had evidently read none of our living authors, and seemed scarcely acquainted by name with our younger statesmen. Once and only once he laughed; it was when G—— asked him whether he had any thoughts of getting into Parliament. And the laugh was inward—sarcastic—sinister—a sneer raised into a laugh. After a few minutes G—— left us to talk to some other acquaintances who had just lounged into the room, and I then said, quietly—

“I have seen a miniature of you, Mr. Richards, in the house you once inhabited, and perhaps built, if not wholly, at least in part, in — Street. You passed by that house this morning.”

Not till I had finished did I raise my eyes to his, and then his fixed my gaze so steadfastly that I could not withdraw it—those fascinating serpent eyes. But involuntarily, and as if the words that translated my thought were dragged from me, I added, in a low whisper, “I have been a student in the mysteries of life and nature; of those mysteries I have known the occult professors. I have the right to speak to you thus.” And I uttered a certain pass-word.

“Well,” said he, dryly, “I concede the right—what would you ask?”

“To what extent human will in certain temperaments can extend?”

“To what extent can thought extend? Think, and before you draw breath you are in China!”

“True. But my thought has no power in China.”

“Give it expression, and it may have: you may write down a thought, which, sooner or later, may alter the whole condition of China. What is a law but a thought? Therefore thought is infinite—therefore thought has power; not in proportion to its value—a bad thought may make a bad law as potent as a good thought can make a good one.”

“Yes; what you say confirms my own theory. Through invisible currents one human brain may transmit its ideas to other human brains with the same rapidity as a thought promulgated by visible means. And as thought is imperishable—as it leaves its stamp behind it in the natural world even when the thinker has passed out of this world—so the thought of the living may have power to rouse up and revive the thoughts of the dead—such as those thoughts were in life—though the thought of the living can not reach the thoughts which the dead now may entertain. Is it not so?”

“I decline to answer, if, in my judgment, thought has the limit you would fix to it; but proceed. You have a special question you wish to put.”

“Intense malignity in an intense will, engendered in a peculiar temperament, and aided by natural means within the reach of science, may produce effects like those ascribed of old to evil magic. It might thus haunt the walls of a human habitation with spectral revivals of all guilty thoughts and guilty deeds once conceived and done within those walls; all, in short, with which the evil will claims rapproch and affinity—imperfect, incoherent, fragmentary snatches at the old dramas acted therein years ago. Thoughts thus crossing each other hap-hazard, as in the nightmare of a vision, growing up into phantom sights and sounds, and all serving to create horror, not because those sights and sounds are really visitations from a world without, but that they are ghastly monstrous renewals of what have been in this world itself, set into malignant play by a malignant mortal. And it is through the material agency of that human brain that these things would acquire even a human power—would strike as with the shock of electricity, and might kill, if the thought of the person assailed did not rise superior to the dignity of the original assailer—might kill the most powerful animal if unnerved by fear, but not injure the feeblest man, if, while his flesh crept, his mind stood out fearless. Thus, when in old stories we read of a magician rent to pieces by the fiends he had evoked—or still more, in Eastern legends, that one magician succeeds by his arts in destroying another—there may be so far truth, that a material being has clothed, from its own evil propensities, certain elements and fluids, usually quiescent or harmless, with awful shape and terrific force; just as the lightning that had lain hidden and innocent in the cloud becomes by natural law suddenly visible; takes a distinct shape to the eye, and can strike destruction on the object to which it is attracted.”

“You are not without glimpses of a very mighty secret,” said Mr. Richards, composedly. “According to your view, could a mortal obtain the power you speak of, he would necessarily be a malignant and evil being.”

“If the power were exercised as I have said, most malignant and most evil—though I believe in the ancient traditions that he could not injure the good. His will could only injure those with whom it has established an affinity, or over whom it forces unresisted sway. I will now imagine an example that may be within the laws of nature, yet seem wild as the fables of a bewildered monk.

“You will remember that Albertus Magnus, after describing minutely the process by which spirits may be invoked and commanded, adds emphatically, that the process will instruct and avail only to the few—that a man must be born a magician!—that is, born with a peculiar physical temperament, as a man is born a poet. Rarely are men in whose constitution lurks this occult power of the highest order of intellect; usually in the intellect there is some twist, perversity, or disease. But, on the other hand, they must possess, to an astonishing degree, the faculty to concentrate thought on a single object—the energetic faculty that we call WILL. Therefore, though their intellect be not sound, it is exceedingly forcible for the attainment of what it desires. I will imagine such a person, pre-eminently gifted with this constitution and its concomitant forces. I will place him in the loftier grades of society. I will suppose his desires emphatically those of the sensualist—he has, therefore, a strong love of life. He is an absolute egotist—his will is concentrated in himself—he has fierce passions—he knows no enduring, no holy affections, but he can covet eagerly what for the moment he desires—he can hate implacably what opposes itself to his objects—he can commit fearful crimes, yet feel small remorse—he resorts rather to curses upon others than to penitence for his misdeeds. Circumstances, to which his constitution guides him, lead him to a rare knowledge of the natural secrets which may serve his egotism. He is a close observer where his passions encourage observation—he is a minute calculator, not from love of truth, but where love of self sharpens his faculties—therefore he can be a man of science. I suppose such a being, having by experience learned the power of his arts over others, trying what may be the power of will over his own frame, and studying all that in natural philosophy may increase that power. He loves life, he dreads death; he wills to live on. He can not restore himself to youth, he can not entirely stay the progress of death, he can not make himself immortal in the flesh and blood; but he may arrest, for a time so prolonged as to appear incredible if I said it, that hardening of the parts which constitutes old age. A year may age him no more than an hour ages another. His intense will, scientifically trained into system, operates, in short, over the wear and tear of his own frame. He lives on. That he may not seem a portent and a miracle, he dies from time to time, seemingly, to certain persons. Having schemed the transfer of a wealth that suffices to his wants, he disappears from one corner of the world, and contrives that his obsequies shall be celebrated. He reappears at another corner of the world, where he resides undetected, and does not revisit the scenes of his former career till all who could remember his features are no more. He would be profoundly miserable if he had affections—he has none but for himself. No good man would accept his longevity, and to no man, good or bad, would he or could he communicate its true secret. Such a man might exist; such a man as I have described I see now before me! —Duke of —, in the court of —, dividing time between lust and brawl, alchemists and wizards; again, in the last century, charlatan and criminal, with name less noble, domiciled in the house at which you gazed to-day, and flying from the law you had outraged, none knew whither; traveler once more revisiting London, with the same earthly passions which filled your heart when races now no more walked through yonder streets; outlaw from the school of all the nobler and diviner mystics; execrable Image of Life in Death and Death in Life, I warn you back from the cities and homes of healthful men; back to the ruins of departed empires; back to the deserts of nature unredemmed!”

There answered me a whisper so musical, so potently musical, that it seemed to enter into my whole being, and subdued me despite myself. Thus it said—

“I have sought one like you for the last hundred years. Now I have found you, we part not till I know what I desire. The vision that sees through the Past, and cleaves through the veil of the Future, is in you at this hour; never before, never to come again; the vision of no puling fantastic girl, of no sick-bed somnambule, but of a strong man, with a vigorous brain. Soar and look forth!”

As he spoke I felt as if I rose out of myself upon eagle wings. All the weight seemed gone from air, roofless the room, roofless the dome of space. I was not in the body—where I knew not—but aloft over time, over earth.

Again I heard the melodious whisper, “You say right. I have mastered great secrets by the power of Will; true, by Will and by Science I can retard the process of years: but death comes not by age alone. Can I frustrate the accidents which bring death upon the young?”

“No; every accident is a providence. Before a providence snaps every human will.”

“Shall I die at last, ages and ages hence, by the slow, though inevitable growth of time, or by the cause that I call accident?”

“By a cause you call accident.”

“Is not the end still remote?” asked the whisper, with a slight tremor.

“Regarded as my life regards time, it is still remote.”

“And shall I, before then, mix with the world of men as I did ere I learned these secrets, resume eager interest in their strife and their trouble—battle with ambition, and use the power of the sage to win the power that belongs to kings?”

“You will yet play a part on the earth that will fill earth with commotion and amaze. For wondrous designs have you, a wonder yourself, been permitted to live on through the centuries. All the secrets you have stored will then have their uses—all that now makes you a stranger amidst the generations will contribute then to make you their lord. As the trees and the straws are drawn into a whirlpool—as they spin round, are sucked to the deep, and again tossed aloft by the eddies, so shall races and thrones be plucked into the charm of your vortex. Awful Destroyer—but in destroying, made, against your own will, a Constructor!”

“And that date, too, is far off?”

“Far off; when it comes, think your end in this world is at hand!”

“How and what is the end? Look east, west, south, and north.”

“In the north, where you never yet trod—toward the point whence your instincts have warned you, there a spectre will seize you. ‘Tis Death! I see a ship—it is haunted—’tis chased—it sails on. Baffled navies sail after that ship. It enters the region of ice. It passes a sky red with meteors. Two moons stand on high, over ice-reefs. I see the ship locked between white defiles—they are ice-rocks. I see the dead strew the decks—stark and livid, green mould on their limbs. All are dead but one man—it is you! But years, though so slowly they come, have then scathed you. There is the coming of age on your brow, and the will is relaxed in the cells of the brain. Still that will, though enfeebled, exceeds all that man knew before you: through the will you live on, gnawed with famine. And nature no longer obeys you in that death-spreading region; the sky is a sky of iron, and the air has iron clamps, and the ice-rocks wedge in the ship. Hark how it cracks and groans! Ice will imbed it as amber imbeds a straw. And a man has gone forth, living yet, from the ship and its dead; and he has clambered up the spikes of an iceberg, and the two moons gaze down on his form. That man is yourself; and terror is on you—terror; and terror has swallowed your will. And I see swarming up the steep ice-rock gray grizzly things. The bears of the north have scented their quarry—they come near you and nearer, shambling and rolling their bulk. And in that day every moment shall seem to you longer than the centuries through which you have passed. And heed this—after life, moments continued make the bliss or the hell of eternity.”

“Hush,” said the whisper; “but the day, you assure me, is far off—very far! I go back to the almond and rose of Damascus!—sleep!”

The room swam before my eyes. I became insensible. When I recovered, I found G— holding my hand and smiling. He said, “You who have always declared yourself proof against mesmerism have succumbed at last to my friend Richards.”

“Where is Mr. Richards?”

“Gone, when you passed into a trance—saying quietly to me, ‘Your friend will not wake for an hour.’”

I asked, as collectedly as I could, where Mr. Richards lodged.

“At the Trafalgar Hotel.”

“Give me your arm,” said I to G—: “let us call on him; I have something to say.”

When we arrived at the hotel, we were told that Mr. Richards had returned twenty minutes before, paid his bill, left directions with his servant (a Greek) to pack his effects, and proceed to Malta by the steamer that should leave Southampton the next day. Mr. Richards had merely said of his own movements, that he had visits to pay in the neighborhood of London, and it was uncertain whether he should be able to reach Southampton in time for that steamer; if not, he should follow in the next one.

The waiter asked me my name. On my informing him, he gave me a note that Mr. Richards had left for me, in case I called.

The note was as follows: “I wished you to utter what was in your mind. You obeyed. I have therefore established power over you. For three months from this day you can communicate to no living man what has passed between us—you can not even show this note to the friend by your side. During three months, silence complete as to me and mine. Do you doubt my power to lay on you this command?—try to disobey me. At the end of the third month the spell is raised. For the rest I spare you. I shall visit your grave a year and a day after it has received you.”

So ends this strange story, which I ask no one to believe. I write it down exactly three months after I received the above note. I could not write it before, nor could I show to G—, in spite of his urgent request, the note which I read under the gas-lamp by his side.

INTROSPECTION.

BY GEORGE ARNOLD.

L

HAVE you sent her all her letters? have you given her back her ring? Have you tried to forget the haunting songs that you loved to hear her sing? Have you cursed the day you met her first? thanked God that you were free, And said in your inmost heart, as you thought, “She never was dear to me?” You have cast her off; your pride is touched; you fancy that all is done; That for you the world is bright again, and bravely shines the sun: You have washed your hands of passion; you have whistled her down the wind— Oh, Tom, old friend, this goes before, the sharpest comes behind! Yes; the sharpest is yet to come, for Love is a plant that never dies; Its roots are deep as the earth itself, its branches wide as the skies; And wherever once it has taken hold, it flourishes evermore, Blossoming still, and bearing its beautiful fruit with the bitter core.

II.

You will learn this, Tom, hereafter, when anger has cooled, and you
 Have time for introspection; you will find my words are true;
 You will sit and gaze in your fire alone, and fancy that you can see Her face with its classic oval, her ringlets fluttering free,
 Her soft blue eyes, wide opened, her sweet red lips apart,
 As she used to look in the golden days when you dreamed she had a heart:
 Whatever you do, wherever you turn, you will see that glorious face Coming with shadowy beauty, to haunt all time and space:
 Those songs you wrote for her singing will sing themselves into your brain
 Till your life seems set to their rhythm, and your thoughts to their refrain—
 Their old, old burden of love and grief—the passion you have foresworn—
 I tell you, Tom, it is not thrown off so well as you think, this morn!

III.

But the worst, perhaps the worst of all, will be when the day has flown,
 When darkness favors reflection, and your comrades leave you alone:
 You will try to sleep, but the memories of unforgotten years
 Will come with a storm of wild regret—mayhap with a storm of tears—
 Each look, each word, each playful tone, each timid little caress,
 The golden gleam of her ringlets, the rustling of her dress,
 The delicate touch of her ungloved hand, that woke such an exquisite thrill,
 The flowers she gave you, the night of the ball—I think you treasure them still—
 All these will come, till you slumber, worn out by sheer despair,
 And then you will hear vague echoes of song on the darkened air—
 Vague echoes, rising and falling, of the voice you know so well,
 Like the songs that were sung by the Lurlei-maids, sweet with a deadly spell!

IV.

In dreams, her heart will ever again be yours, and you will see Fair glimpses of what might have been—what now can never be;
 And as she comes to meet you, with a sudden wild unrest
 You stretch your arms forth lovingly, to fold her to your breast:
 But the Lurlei-song will faint and die, and with its fading tone
 You wake to find you clasp the thin and empty air alone,
 While the fire-bell's clanging dissonance, on the gusty night-wind borne
 Will seem an iron-tongued demon's voice, laughing your grief to scorn.
 Oh, Tom, you say it is over—you talk of letters, and rings—
 Do you think that Love's mighty spirit, then, is held by such trifling things?
 No; if you once have truly loved, you will still love on, I know, Till the church-yard myrtles blossom above, and you lie mute below!

V.

How is it, I wonder, hereafter? Faith teaches us little, here,
 Of the ones we have loved and lost on earth—do you think they will still be dear?
 Shall we live the lives we might have led?—shall those who are severed now
 Remember the pledge of a lower sphere, and renew the broken vow?
 It almost drives me wild when I think of the gifts we throw away
 Unthinking whether or no we lose Life's honey and wine for aye!
 But then, again, 'tis a mighty joy—greater than I can tell—
 To trust that the parted may sometime meet—that all may again be well:
 However it be, I hold that all the evil we know on earth
 Finds in this violence done to Love its true and legitimate birth,
 And the agonies we suffer, when the heart is left alone,
 For every sin of Humanity should fully and well atone!

VI.

I see that you marvel greatly, Tom, to hear such words from me,
 But if you knew my innermost heart, 'twould be no mystery;
 Experience is bitter, but its teachings we retain,
 It has taught me this, Who once has loved, loves never on earth again!
 And I, too, have my closet, with a ghastly form inside—
 The skeleton of a perished love, killed by a cruel pride:
 I sit by the fire at evening, as you will sometime sit,
 And watch, in the roseate half-light, the ghosts of happiness flit:
 I, too, awaken at midnight, and stretch my arms to enfold
 A vague and shadowy image, with tresses of brown and gold:
 Experience is bitter indeed—I have learned at a heavy cost
 The secret of Love's persistency—I, too, have loved and lost!

CHAPTER I.

DOCTOR FELL.

"NOT attend her own son when he is ill!" said my mother. "She does not deserve to have a son!" And Mrs. Pendennis looked toward her own only darling while uttering this indignant exclamation. As she looked I know what passed through her mind. She nursed me, she dressed me in little caps and long-clothes, she attired me in my first jacket and trowsers. She watched at my bedside through my infantile and juvenile ailments. She tended me through all my life, she held me to her heart with infinite prayers and blessings. She is no longer with us to bless and pray; but from heaven, where she is, I know her love pursues me; and often and often I think she is here, only invisible.

"Mrs. Firmin would be of no good," growled Dr. Goodenough. "She would have hysterics, and the nurse would have two patients to look after."

"Don't tell me," cries my mother, with a flush on her cheeks. "Do you suppose if that child" (meaning, of course, her paragon) "were ill, I would not go to him?"

"My dear, if that child were hungry, you would chop off your head to make him broth," says the doctor, sipping his tea.

"Potage à la bonne femme," says Mr. Pendennis. "Mother, we have it at the club. You would be done with milk, eggs, and a quantity of vegetables. You would be put to simmer for many hours in an earthen pan, and—"

"Don't be horrible, Arthur!" cries a young lady, who was my mother's companion of those happy days.

"And people, when they knew you, would like you very much."

My uncle looked as if he did not understand the allegory.

"What is this you are talking about? potage à la—what d'ye call 'em?" says he. "I thought we were speaking of Mrs. Firmin, of Old Parr Street. Mrs. Firmin is a doosid delicate woman," interposed the major. "All the females of that family are. Her mother died early. Her sister, Mrs. Twysden, is very delicate. She would be of no more use in a sick room than a—than a bull in a china-shop, begad! and she might catch the fever, too."

"And so might you, major!" cries the doctor. "Aren't you talking to me, who have just come from the boy? Keep your distance, or I shall bite you."

The old gentleman gave a little backward movement with his chair.

"Gad, it's no joking matter," says he; "I've known fellows catch fevers at—at ever so much past my age. At any rate, the boy is no boy of mine, begad! I dine at Firmin's house, who has married into a good family, though he is only a doctor, and—"

"And pray what was my husband?" cried Mrs. Pendennis.

"Only a doctor, indeed!" calls out Goodenough. "My dear creature, I have a great mind to give him the scarlet fever this minute!"

"My father was a surgeon and apothecary, I have heard," says the widow's son.

"And what then? And I should like to know if a man of one of the most ancient families in the kingdom—in the empire, begad!—hasn't a right to pursoo a learned, a useful, an honorable profession. My brother John was—"

"A medical practitioner!" I say, with a sigh.

And my uncle arranges his hair, puts his handkerchief to his teeth, and says—

"Stuff! nonsense—no patience with these personalities, begad! Firmin is a doctor, certainly—so are you—so are others. But Firmin is a university man, and a gentleman. Firmin has traveled. Firmin is intimate with some of the best people in England, and has married into one of the first families. Gad, Sir, do you suppose that a woman bred up in the lap of luxury—in the very lap, Sir—at Ringwood and Whipham, and at Ringwood House in Walpole Street, where she was absolute mistress, begad!

—do you suppose such a woman is fit to be nurse-tender in a sick room? She never was fit for that, or for any thing except—" (here the major saw smiles on the countenances of some of his audience) "except, I say, to preside at Ringwood House and—and adorn society, and that sort of thing. And if such a woman chooses to run away with her uncle's doctor, and marry below her rank—why, I don't think it's a laughing matter, hang me if I do."

"And so she stops at the Isle of Wight, while the poor boy remains at the school," sighs my mother.

"Firmin can't come away. He is in attendance on the Grand Dook. The prince is never easy without Firmin. He has given him his Order of the Swan. They are moving heaven and earth in high quarters; and I bet you even, Goodenough, that that boy whom you have been attending will be a baronet—if you don't kill him off with your confounded potions and pills, begad!"

Dr. Goodenough only gave a humph and contracted his great eyebrows.

"I know what you mean. Firmin is a gentlemanly man—a handsome man. I remember his father, Brand Firmin, at Valenciennes with the Dook of York—one of the handsomest men in Europe. Firebrand Firmin, they used to call him—a red-headed fellow—a tremendous duelist: shot an Irishman—became serious in after-life, and that sort of thing—quarreled with his son, who was doosid wild in early days. Gentlemanly man, certainly, Firmin. Black hair: his father had red. So much the better for the doctor; but—but—we understand each other, I think, Goodenough? and you and I have seen some queer fishes in our time."

And the old gentleman winked and took his snuff graciously, and, as it were, puffed the Firmin subject away.

"Was it to show me a queer fish that you took me to Dr. Firmin's house in Parr Street?" asked Mr. Pendennis of his uncle. "The house was not very gay, nor the mistress very wise, but they were all as kind as might be; and I am very fond of the boy."

"So did Lord Ringwood, his mother's uncle, like him," cried Major Pendennis. "That boy brought about a reconciliation between his mother and her uncle, after her runaway match. I suppose you know she ran away with Firmin, my dear?"

My mother said "she had heard something of the story." And the major once more asserted that Dr. Firmin was a wild fellow twenty years ago. At the time of which I am writing he was Physician to the Plethoric Hospital, Physician to the Grand Duke of Groningen, and knight of his order of the Black Swan, member of many learned societies, the husband of a rich wife, and a person of no small consideration.

As for his son, whose name figures at the head of these pages, you may suppose he did not die of the illness about which we had just been talking. A good nurse waited on him, though his mamma was in the country. Though his papa was absent, a very competent physician was found to take charge of the young patient, and preserve his life for the benefit of his family, and the purposes of this history.

We pursued our talk about Philip Firmin and his father, and his grand-uncle the earl, whom Major Pendennis knew intimately well, until Dr. Goodenough's carriage was announced, and our kind physician took leave of us, and drove back to London. Some who spoke on that summer evening are no longer here to speak or listen. Some who were young then have topped the hill and are descending toward the valley of the shadows. "Ah," says old Major Pendennis, shaking his brown curls, as the doctor went away; "did you see, my good soul, when I spoke about his confrère, how glum Goodenough looked? They don't love each other, my dear. Two of a trade don't agree, and besides I have no doubt the other doctor-fellows are jealous of Firmin, because he lives in the best society. A man of good family, my dear. There has already been a great rapprochement; and if Lord Ringwood is quite reconciled to him, there's no knowing what luck that boy of Firmin's may come to."

Although Dr. Goodenough might think but lightly of his confrère, a great portion of the public held him in much higher estimation; and especially in the little community of Grey Friars, of which the kind reader has heard in previous works of the present biographer, Dr. Brand Firmin was a very great favorite, and received with much respect and honor. Whenever the boys at that school were afflicted with the common ailments of youth, Mr. Sprat, the school apothecary, provided for them; and by the simple, though disgusting remedies which were in use in those times, generally succeeded in restoring his young patients to health. But if young Lord Egham (the Marquis of Ascot's son, as my respected reader very likely knows) happened to be unwell, as was frequently the case, from his lordship's great command of pocket-money and imprudent fondness for the contents of the pastrycook's shop; or if any very grave case of illness occurred in the school, then, quick, the famous Dr. Firmin, of Old Parr Street, Burlington Gardens, was sent for; and an illness must have been very severe if he could not cure it. Dr. Firmin had been a school-fellow, and remained a special friend, of the head-master. When young Lord Egham, before mentioned (he was our only lord, and therefore we were a little proud and careful of our darling youth), got the erysipelas, which swelled his head to the size of a pumpkin, the doctor triumphantly carried him through his illness, and was complimented by the head-boy in his Latin oration on the annual speech-day for his superhuman skill and godlike delight salutem hominibus dando. The head-master turned toward Dr. Firmin, and bowed: the governors and bigwigs buzzed to one another, and looked at him: the boys looked at him: the physician held his handsome head down toward his shirt-frill. His modest eyes would not look up from the spotless lining of the broad-brimmed hat on his knees. A murmur of applause hummed through the ancient hall, a scuffling of young feet, a rustling of new cassocks among the masters, and a refreshing blowing of noses ensued, as the orator polished off his period, and then passed to some other theme.

Amidst the general enthusiasm, there was one member of the auditory scornful and dissentient. This gentleman whispered to his comrade at the commencement of the phrase concerning the doctor the—I believe of Eastern derivation—monosyllable "Bosh!" and he added, sadly, looking toward the object of all this praise, "He can't construe the Latin—though it is all a parcel of humbug."

"Hush, Phil!" said his friend; and Phil's face flushed red as Dr. Firmin, lifting up his eyes, looked at him for one moment; for the recipient of all this laudation was no other than Phil's father.

The illness of which we spoke had long since passed away. Philip was a school-boy no longer, but in his second year at the university, and one of half-a-dozen young men, ex-pupils of the school, who had come up for the annual dinner. The honors of this year's dinner were for Dr. Firmin, even more than for Lord Ascot in his star and ribbon, who walked with his arm in the doctor's into chapel. His lordship faltered when, in his after-dinner speech, he alluded to the inestimable services and skill of his tried old friend, whom he had known as a fellow-pupil in those walls—(loud cheers)—whose friendship had been the delight of his life—a friendship which he prayed might be the inheritance of their children. (Immense applause; after which Dr. Firmin spoke.)

The doctor's speech was perhaps a little commonplace; the Latin quotations which he used were not exactly novel; but Phil need not have been so angry or ill-behaved. He went on sipping sherry, glaring at his father, and muttering observations that were any thing but complimentary to his parent. "Now, look," says he, "he is going to be overcome by his feelings. He will put his handkerchief up to his mouth, and show his diamond-ring. I told you so! It's too much. I can't swallow this . . . this sherry. I say, you fellows, let us come out of this, and have a smoke somewhere." And Phil rose up and quitted the dining-room, just as his father was declaring what a joy, and a pride, and a delight it was to him to think that the friendship with which his noble friend honored him was likely to be transmitted to their children, and that when he had passed away from this earthly scene (cries of "No, no!" "May you live a thousand years!") it would be his joy to think that his son would always find a friend and protector in the noble, the princely house of Ascot.

We found the carriages waiting outside Grey

Friars' Gate, and Philip Firmin, pushing me into his father's, told the footman to drive home, and that the doctor would return in Lord Ascot's carriage. Home then to Old Parr Street we went, where many a time as a boy I had been welcome. And we retired to Phil's private den in the back-buildings of the great house: and over our cigars we talked of the Founder's-day Feast, and the speeches delivered; and of the old Cistercians of our time, and how Thompson was married, and Johnson was in the army, and Jackson (not red-haired Jackson, pig-eyed Jackson) was first in his year, and so forth; and in this twaddle were most happily engaged when Phil's father flung open the tall door of the study.

"Here's the governor!" growled Phil; and, in an under-tone, "what does he want?"

"The governor," as I looked up, was not a pleasant object to behold. Dr. Firmin had very white false teeth, which perhaps were a little too large for his mouth, and these grinned in the gas-light very fiercely. On his cheeks were black whiskers, and over his glaring eyes fierce black eyebrows, and his bald head glittered like a billiard-ball. You would hardly have known that he was the original of that melancholy philosophic portrait which all the patients admired in the doctor's waiting-room.

"I find, Philip, that you took my carriage," said the father; "and Lord Ascot and I had to walk ever so far for a cab!"

"Hadn't he got his own carriage? I thought, of course, he would have his carriage on a State-day, and that you would come home with the lord," said Philip.

"I had promised to bring him home, Sir!" said the father.

"Well, Sir, I'm very sorry," continued the son, curtly.

"Sorry!" screams the other.

"I can't say any more, Sir, and I am very sorry," answers Phil; and he knocked the ash of his cigar into the stove.

The stranger within the house hardly knew how to look on its master or his son. There was evidently some dire quarrel between them. The old man glared at the young one, who calmly looked his father in the face. Wicked rage and hate seemed to flash from the doctor's eyes, and anon came a look of wild pitiful supplication toward the guest, which was most painful to bear. In the midst of what dark family mystery was I? What meant this cruel spectacle of the father's terrified anger and the son's scorn?

"I—I appeal to you, Pendennis," says the doctor, with a choking utterance and a ghastly face.

"Shall we begin ab ovo, Sir?" says Phil. Again the ghastly look of terror comes over the father's face.

"I—I promise to bring one of the first noblemen in England," gasps the doctor, "from a public dinner, in my carriage; and my son takes it, and leaves me and Lord Ascot to walk!—Is it fair, Pendennis? Is it the conduct of a gentleman to a gentleman; of a son to a father?"

"No, Sir," I said, gravely, "nothing can excuse it." Indeed I was shocked at the young man's obduracy and undutifulness.

"I told you it was a mistake!" cries Phil, reddening. "I heard Lord Ascot order his own carriage; I made no doubt he would bring my father home. To ride in a chariot with a footman behind me is no pleasure to me, and I would far rather have a Hansom and a cigar. It was a blunder, and I am sorry for it—there! And if I live to a hundred I can't say more."

"If you are sorry, Philip," groans the father, "it is enough. You remember, Pendennis, when—when my son and I were not on this—on this footing," and he looked up for a moment at a picture which was hanging over Phil's head—a portrait of Phil's mother; the lady of whom my own mother spoke, on that evening when we had talked of the boy's illness. Both the ladies had passed from the world now, and their images were but painted shadows on the wall.

The father had accepted an apology, though the son had made none. I looked at the elder Firmin's face, and the character written on it. I remembered such particulars of his early history as had been told to me; and I perfectly recalled that feeling of doubt and misliking which came over my mind when I first saw the doctor's handsome face some few years previously, when my uncle first took me to the doctor's in Old Parr Street; little Phil being then a flaxen-headed, pretty child, who had just assumed his first trowsers, and I a fifth-form boy at school.

My father and Dr. Firmin were members of the medical profession. They had been bred up as boys at the same school, whither families used to send their sons from generation to generation, and long before people had ever learned that the place was unwholesome. Grey Friars was smoky, certainly; I think in the time of the Plague great numbers of people were buried there. But had the school been situated in the most picturesque swamp in England, the general health of the boys could not have been better. We boys used to hear of epidemics occurring in other schools, and were almost sorry that they did not come to ours, so that we might shut up, and get longer vacations. Even that illness which subsequently befell Phil Firmin himself attacked no one else—the boys all luckily going home for the holidays on the very day of poor Phil's seizure; but of this illness more anon. When it was determined that little Phil Firmin was to go to Grey Friars, Phil's father bethought him that Major Pendennis, whom he met in the world and society, had a nephew at the place, who might protect the little fellow, and the major took his nephew to see Dr. and Mrs. Firmin one Sunday after church, and we had lunch at Old Parr Street, and there little Phil was presented to me, whom I promised to take under my protection. He was a simple little man; an artless child, who had not the least idea of the dignity of a fifth-form boy. He was quite unabashed in talking to me and other persons, and has remained so ever since. He asked my uncle how he came to have such odd hair. He partook freely of the delicacies on the table. I remember he hit me with his little fist once or twice, which liberty at first struck me with a panic of astonishment, and then with a sense of the ridiculous so exquisitely keen, that I burst out into a fit of laughter. It was, you see, as if a stranger were to hit the Pope in the ribs, and call him "Old boy;" as if Jack were to tweak one of the giants by the nose; or Ensign Jones to ask the Duke of Wellington to take wine. I had a strong sense of humor, even in those early days, and enjoyed this joke accordingly.

"Philip!" cries mamma, "you will hurt Mr. Pendennis."

"I will knock him down!" shouts Phil. Fancy knocking me down—me, a fifth-form boy!

"The child is a perfect Hercules," remarks the mother.

"He strangled two snakes in his cradle," says the doctor, looking at me. (It was then, as I remember, I felt Dr. Fell toward him.)

"La, Dr. Firmin!" cries mamma, "I can't bear snakes. I remember there was one at Rome, when we were walking one day; a great, large snake, and I hated it, and I cried out, and I nearly fainted; and my uncle Ringwood said I ought to like snakes, for one might be an agreeable rattle; and I have read of them being charming in India, and I dare say you have, Mr. Pendennis, for I am told you are very clever; and I am not in the least; I wish I were; but my husband is, very—and so Phil will be. Will you be a very clever boy, dear? He was named after my dear papa, who was killed at Busaco when I was quite, quite a little thing, and we wore mourning, and we went to live with my uncle Ringwood afterward; but Maria and I had both our own fortunes; and I am sure I little thought I should marry a physician—la, one of uncle Ringwood's grooms, I should as soon have thought of marrying him!—but, you know, my husband is one of the cleverest men in the world. Don't tell me—you are, dearest, and you know it; and when a man is clever I don't value his rank in life; no, not if he was that fender; and I always said to uncle Ringwood, 'Talent I will marry, for talent I adore;' and I did marry you, Dr. Firmin, you know I did, and this child is your image. And you will be kind to him at school," says the poor lady, turning to me, her eyes filling with tears, "for talent is always kind, except uncle Ringwood, and he was very—"

"A little more wine, Mr. Pendennis?" said the doctor—Doctor Fell still, though he was most kind to me. "I shall put my little man under your care, and I know you will keep him from harm. I hope you will do us the favor to come to Parr Street whenever you are free. In my father's time we used to come home of a Saturday from school, and enjoyed going to the play." And the doctor shook me cordially by the hand, and, I must say, continued his kindness to me as long as ever I knew him. When we went away, my uncle Pendennis told me many stories about the great earl and family of Ringwood, and how Dr. Firmin had made a match—a match of the affections—with this lady, daughter of Philip Ringwood, who was killed at Busaco; and how she had been a great beauty, and was a perfect grande dame always; and, if not the cleverest, certainly one of the kindest and most amiable women in the world.

In those days I was accustomed to receive the opinions of my informant with such respect that I at once accepted this statement as authentic. Mrs. Firmin's portrait, indeed, was beautiful: it was painted by young Mr. Harlowe, that year he was at Rome, and when in eighteen days he completed a copy of the Transfiguration, to the admiration of all the Academy; but I, for my part, only remember a lady weak, and thin, and faded, who never came out of her dressing-room until a late hour in the afternoon, and whose superannuated smiles and grimaces used to provoke my juvenile sense of humor. She used to kiss Phil's brow; and, as she held the boy's hand in one of her lean ones, would say, "Who would suppose such a great boy as that could be my son?" "Be kind to him when I am gone," she sighed to me, one Sunday evening, when I was taking leave of her, as her eyes filled with tears, and she placed the thin hand in mine for the last time. The doctor, reading by the fire, turned round and scowled at her from under his tall shining forehead. "You are nervous, Louisa, and had better go to your room; I told you you had," he said, abruptly. "Young gentlemen, it is time for you to be off to Grey Friars. Is the cab at the door, Brice?" And he took out his watch—his great shining watch, by which he had felt the pulses of so many famous personages, whom his prodigious skill had rescued from disease. And at parting Phil flung his arms round his poor mother, and kissed her under the glossy curls—the borrowed curls—and he looked his father resolutely in the face (whose own glance used to fall before that of the boy), and bade him a gruff good-night, ere we set forth for Grey Friars.

CHAPTER II.

AT SCHOOL AND AT HOME.

I DINED yesterday with three gentlemen, whose time of life may be guessed by their conversation, a great part of which consisted of Eton reminiscences and lively imitations of Dr. Keate. Each one, as he described how he had been flogged, mimicked to the best of his power the manner and the mode of operating of the famous doctor. His little parenthetical remarks during the ceremony were recalled with great facetiousness: the very huchish of the rods was parodied with thrilling fidelity; and after a good hour's conversation, the subject was brought to a climax by a description of that awful night when the doctor called up squad after squad of boys from their beds in their respective boarding-houses, whipped through the whole night, and castigated I don't know how many hundred rebels. All these mature men laughed, prattled, rejoiced, and became young again, as they recounted their stories; and each of them heartily and eagerly bade the stranger to understand how Keate was a thorough gentleman. Having talked about their floggings, I say, for an hour at least, they apologized to me for dwelling upon a subject which after all was strictly local: but, indeed, their talk greatly amused and diverted me, and I hope, and am quite ready, to hear all their jolly stories over again.

Be not angry, patient reader of former volumes by the author of the present history, if I am garrulous about Grey Friars, and go back to that ancient place of education to find the heroes of our tale. We are but young once. When we remember that time of youth, we are still young. He over whose head eight or nine lustres have passed, if he wishes to write of boys, must recall the time when he himself was a boy. Their habits change; their waists are longer or shorter; their shirt-collars stick up more or less; but the boy is the boy in King George's time as in that of his royal niece—once our maiden queen, now the anxious mother of many boys. And young fellows are honest, and merry, and idle, and mischievous, and timid, and brave, and studious, and selfish, and generous, and mean, and false, and truth-telling, and affectionate, and good, and bad, now as in former days. He with whom we have mainly to do is a gentleman of mature age, now walking the street with boys of his own. He is not going to perish in the last chapter of these memoirs—to die of consumption, with his love weeping by his bedside, or to blow his brains out in despair, because she has been married to his rival, or killed out of a gig, or otherwise done for, in the last chapter but one. No, no; we will have no dismal endings. Philip Firmin is well and hearty at this minute, owes no man a shilling, and can enjoy his glass of port in perfect comfort. So, my dear miss, if you want a pulmonary romance, the present won't suit you. So, young gentleman, if you are for melancholy, despair, and sardonic satire, please to call at some other shop. That Philip shall have his trials is a matter of course—may they be interesting, though they do not end dismally! That he shall fall and trip in his course sometimes is pretty certain. Ah, who does not upon this life-journey of ours? Is not our want the occasion of our brother's charity, and thus does not good come out of that evil? When the traveler (of whom the Master spoke) fell among the thieves, his mishap was contrived to try many a heart beside his own—the Knave's who robbed him, the Levite's and Priest's who passed him by as he lay bleeding, the humble Samaritan's whose hand poured oil into his wound, and held out its pittance to relieve him.

So little Philip Firmin was brought to school by his mamma in her carriage, who entreated the housekeeper to have a special charge of that angelic child; and as soon as the poor lady's back was turned, Mrs. Bunce emptied the contents of the little boy's trunk into one of sixty or seventy little cupboards, wherein reposed other boys' clothes and haberdashery: and then Mrs. Firmin requested to see the Rev. Mr. X., in whose house Philip was to board, and besought him, and explained many things to him, such as the exceeding delicacy of the child's constitution, etc., etc.; and Mr. X., who was very good-natured, patted the boy kindly on the head, and sent for the other Philip, Philip Ringwood, Phil's cousin, who had arrived at Grey Friars an hour or two before; and Mr. X. told Ringwood to take care of the little fellow; and Mrs. Firmin, choking behind her pocket-handkerchief, gurgled out a blessing on the grinning youth, and at one time had an idea of giving Master Ringwood a sovereign, but paused, thinking he was too big a boy, and that she might not take such a liberty, and presently she was gone; and little Phil Firmin was introduced to the long-room and his school-fellows of Mr. X.'s house; and having plenty of money, and naturally finding his way to the pastry-cook's, the next day after school, he was met by his cousin Ringwood, and robbed of half the tarts which he had purchased. A fortnight afterward the hospitable doctor and his wife asked their young kinsman to Old Parr Street, Burlington Gardens, and the two boys went; but Phil never mentioned any thing to his parents regarding the robbery of tarts, being deterred, perhaps, from speaking by awful threats of punishment which his cousin promised to administer when they got back to school, in case of the little boy's confession. Subsequently Master Ringwood was asked once in every term to Old Parr Street; but neither Mrs. Firmin, nor the doctor, nor Master Firmin, liked the baronet's son, and Mrs. Firmin pronounced him a violent, rude boy.

I, for my part, left school suddenly and early, and my little protégé behind me. His poor mother, who had promised herself to come for him every Saturday, did not keep her promise. Smithfield is a long way from Piccadilly; and an angry cow once scratched the panels of her carriage, causing her footman to spring from his board into a pig-pen, and herself to feel such a shock that no wonder she was afraid of visiting the City afterward. The circumstances of this accident she often narrated to us. Her anecdotes were not numerous, but she told them repeatedly. In imagination, sometimes, I can hear her ceaseless, simple cackle; see her faint eyes, as she prattles on unconsciously, and watch the dark looks of her handsome, silent husband, scowling from under his eyebrows and smiling behind his teeth. I dare say he ground those teeth with suppressed rage sometimes. I dare say to bear with her endless volubility must have tasked his endurance. He may have treated her ill, but she tried him. She, on her part, may have been a not very wise woman, but she was kind to me. Did not her housekeeper make me the best of tarts, and keep goodies from the company-dinners for the young gentlemen when they came home? Did not her husband give me of his fees? I promise you, after I had seen Dr. Fell a few times, that first displeasing impression produced by his darkling countenance and sinister good looks wore away. He was a gentleman. He had lived in the great world, of which he told anecdotes delightful to boys to hear; and he passed the bottle to me as if I was a man.

I hope and think I remembered the injunction of poor Mrs. Firmin to be kind to her boy. As long as we staid together at Grey Friars I was Phil's champion, whenever he needed my protection, though of course I could not always be present to guard the little scape-grace from all the blows which were aimed at his young face by pugilists of his own size. There were seven or eight years' difference between us (he says ten, which is absurd, and which I deny); but I was always remarkable for my affability, and, in spite of our disparity of age, would often graciously accept the general invitation I had from his father for any Saturday and Sunday when I would like to accompany Philip home.

Such an invitation is welcome to any school-boy. To get away from Smithfield, and show our best clothes in Bond Street, was always a privilege. To strut in the Park on Sunday, and nod to the other fellows who were strutting there too, was better than remaining at school, "doing Diatessaron," as the phrase used to be, having that endless roast beef for dinner, and hearing two sermons in chapel. There may have been more lively streets in London than Old Parr Street; but it was pleasanter to be there than to look at Goswell Street over Grey Friars' wall; and so the present biographer and reader's very humble servant found Dr. Firmin's house an agreeable resort. Mamma was often ailing, or, if well, went out into the world with her husband; in either case, we boys had a good dinner provided for us, with the special dishes which Phil loved; and after dinner we adjourned to the play, not being by any means too proud to sit in the pit with Mr. Brice, the doctor's confidential man. On Sunday we went to church at Lady Whittlesea's, and back to school in the evening; when the doctor almost always gave us a fee. If he did not dine at home (and I own his absence did not much damp our pleasure), Brice would lay a small inclosure on the young gentlemen's coats which we transferred to our pockets. I believe school-boys disdain fees in the present disinterested times.

Every thing in Dr. Firmin's house was as handsome as might be, and yet somehow the place was not cheerful. One's steps fell noiselessly on the faded Turkey carpet; the room was large, and all save the dining-table in a dingy twilight. The picture of Mrs. Firmin looked at us from the wall, and followed us about with wild violet eyes. Philip Firmin had the same violet odd bright eyes, and the same colored hair of an auburn tinge; in the picture it fell in long wild masses over the lady's back as she leaned with bare arms on a harp. Over the side-board was the doctor, in a black velvet coat and a fur collar, his hand on a skull, like Hamlet. Skulls of oxen, horned, with wreaths, formed the cheerful ornaments of the cornice. On the side-table glittered a pair of cups, given by grateful patients, looking like receptacles rather for funereal ashes than for festive flowers or wine. Brice, the butler, wore the gravity and costume of an undertaker. The footman stealthily moved hither and thither, bearing the dinner to us; we always spoke under our breath while we were eating it. "The room don't look more cheerful of a morning when the patients are sitting here, I can tell you," Phil would say; indeed, we could well fancy that it was dismal. The drawing-room had a rhubarb-colored flock paper (on account of the governor's attachment to the shop, Master Phil said), a great piano, a harp smothered in a leather bag in the corner, which the languid owner now never touched; and every body's face seemed scared and pale in the great looking-glasses, which reflected you over and over again into the distance, so that you seemed to twinkle off right through the Albany into Piccadilly.

Old Parr Street has been a habitation for generations of surgeons and physicians. I suppose the noblemen for whose use the street was intended in the time of the early Georges fled, finding the neighborhood too dismal, and the gentlemen in black coats came and took possession of the gilded, gloomy chambers which the sacred mode vacated. These mutations of fashion have always been matters of profound speculation to me. Why shall not one moralize over London as over Rome, or Baalbec, or Troy town? I like to walk among the Hebrews of Wardour Street, and fancy the place, as it once was, crowded with chairs and gilt chariots, and torches flashing in the hands of the running footmen. I have a grim pleasure in thinking that Golding Square was once the resort of the aristocracy, and Monmouth Street the delight of the genteel world. What shall prevent us Londoners from musing over the decline and fall of city sovereignties, and drawing our cockney morals? As the late Mr. Gibbon meditated his history leaning against a column in the Capitol, why should not I muse over mine, reclining under an arcade of the Pantheon? Not the Pantheon at Rome, in the Cabbage Market by the Piazza Navona, where the immortal gods were worshiped—the immortal gods who are now dead; but the Pantheon in Oxford Street, ladies, where you purchase feeble pomatums, music, glassware, and baby-linen; and which has its history too. Have not Selwyn, and Walpole, and March, and Carlisle figured there? Has not Prince Florizel flounced through the hall in his rustling domino, and danced there in powdered splendor? and when the ushers refused admission to lovely Sophy Baddeley, did not the young men, her adorers, draw their rapiers and vow to slay the door-keepers; and, crossing the glittering blades over the enchantress's head, make a warlike triumphal arch for her to pass under, all flushed, and smiling, and perfumed, and painted? The lives of streets are as the lives of men, and shall not the street-preacher, if so minded, take for the text of his sermon the stones in the gutter? That you were once the resort of the fashion, O Monmouth Street! by the invocation of blessed St. Giles shall I not improve that sweet thought into a godly discourse, and make the ruin edifying? O mes frères! There were splendid thoroughfares, dazzling company, bright illuminations, in our streets when our hearts were young: we entertained in them a noble youthful company of chivalrous hopes and lofty ambitions; of blushing thoughts in snowy robes spotless and virginal. See, in the embrasure of the window, where you sate looking to the stars and nestling by the soft side of your first-love, hang Mr. Moses's bargains of turned old clothes, very cheap; of worn old boots, bedraggled in how much and how many people's mud; a great bargain. See! along the street, strewn with flowers once mayhap—a fight of beggars for the refuse of an apple-stall, or a tipsy basket-woman, reeling shrieking to the station. O me! O my beloved congregation, I have preached this stale sermon to you for ever so many years! O my jolly companions, I have drunk many a bout with you, and always found vanitas vanitatum written on the bottom of the pot!

I choose to moralize now when I pass the place. The garden has run to seed, the walks are mildewed, the statues have broken noses, the gravel is dank with green moss, the roses are withered, and the nightingales have ceased to make love. It is a funereal street, Old Parr Street, certainly; the carriages which drive there ought to have feathers on the roof, and the butlers who open the doors should wear weepers—so the scene strikes you now as you pass along the spacious empty pavement. You are bilious, my good man. Go and pay a guinea to one of the doctors in those houses; there are still doctors there. He will prescribe taraxacum for you, or pil: hydrarg: Bless you! in my time, to us gentlemen of the fifth form, the place was bearable. The yellow fogs didn't damp our spirits—and we never thought them too thick to keep us away from the play: from the chivalrous Charles Kemble, I tell you, my Mirabel, my Mercutio, my princely Falconbridge: from his adorable daughter (O my distracted heart!): from the classic Young: from the glorious Long Tom Coffin: from the unearthly Vanderdecken—"Return, O my love, and we'll never, never part" (where art thou, sweet singer of that most thrilling ditty of my youth?): from the sweet, sweet Victorine and the Bottle Imp. Oh, to see that Bottle Imp again, and hear that song about the "Pilgrim of Love!" Once, but—hush!—this is a secret—we had private boxes, the doctor's grand friends often sending him these; and finding the opera rather slow, we went to a concert in M-d-n Lane, near Covent Garden, and heard the most celestial glees, over a supper of fizzing sausages and mashed potatoes, such as the world has never seen since. We did no harm; but I dare say it was very wrong. Brice, the butler, ought not to have taken us. We bullied him, and made him take us where we liked. We had rum-shrub in the housekeeper's room, where we used to be diverted by the society of other butlers of the neighboring nobility and gentry, who would step in. Perhaps it was wrong to leave us so to the company of servants. Dr. Firmin used to go to his grand parties, Mrs. Firmin to bed. "Did we enjoy the performance last night?" our host would ask at breakfast. "Oh, yes, we enjoyed the performance!" But my poor Mrs. Firmin fancied that we enjoyed Scmiramide or the Donna del Lago; whereas we had been to the pit at the Adelphi (out of our own money), and seen that jolly John Reeve, and laughed—laughed till we were fit to drop—and staid till the curtain was down. And then we would come home, and, as aforesaid, pass a delightful hour over supper, and hear the anecdotes of Mr. Brice's friends, the other butlers. Ah, that was a time indeed! There never was any liquor so good as rum-shrub, never; and the sausages had a flavor of Elysium. How hushed we were when Dr. Firmin, coming home from his parties, let himself in at the street-door! Shoeless, we crept up to our bedrooms. And we came down to breakfast with innocent young faces—and let Mrs. Firmin, at lunch, prattle about the opera; and there stood Brice and the footman behind us, looking quite grave, the abominable hypocrites!

Then, Sir, there was a certain way, out of the study window, or through the kitchen, and over the leads, to a building, gloomy indeed, but where I own to have spent delightful hours of the most flagitious and criminal enjoyment of some delicious little Havanas, ten to the shilling. In that building there were stables once, doubtless occupied by great Flemish horses and rumbling gold coaches of Walpole's time; but a celebrated surgeon, when he took possession of the house, made a lecture-room of the premises—"And this door," says Phil, pointing to one leading into the mews, "was very convenient for having the bodies in and out"—a cheerful reminiscence. Of this kind of furniture there was now very little in the apartment, except a dilapidated skeleton in a corner, a few dusty casts of heads, and bottles of preparations on the top of an old bureau, and some mildewed harness hanging on the walls. This apartment became Mr. Phil's smoking-room when, as he grew taller, he felt himself too dignified to sit in the kitchen regions; the honest butler and house-keeper themselves pointing out to their young master that his place was elsewhere than among the servants. So there, privately and with great delectation, we smoked many an abominable cigar in this dreary back-room, the gaunt walls and twilight ceilings of which were by no means melancholy to us, who found forbidden pleasures the sweetest, after the absurd fashion of boys. Dr. Firmin was an enemy to smoking, and ever accustomed to speak of the practice with eloquent indignation. "It was a low practice—the habit of cabmen, pot-house frequenters, and Irish apple-women," the doctor would say, as Phil and his friend looked at each other with a stealthy joy. Phil's father was ever scented and neat, the pattern of handsome propriety. Perhaps he had a clearer perception regarding manners than respecting morals; perhaps his conversation was full of platitudes, his talk (concerning people of fashion chiefly) mean and uninteresting, his behavior to young Lord Egham rather fulsome and lacking in dignity. Perhaps, I say, the idea may have entered into young Mr. Pendennis's mind that his hospitable entertainer and friend, Dr. Firmin, of Old Parr Street, was what at the present day might be denominated an old humbug; but modest young men do not come quickly to such unpleasant conclusions regarding their seniors. Dr. Firmin's manners were so good, his forehead was so high, his frill so fresh, his hands so white and slim, that for some considerable time we ingenuously admired him; and it was not without a pang that we came to view him as he actually was—no, not as he actually was—no man whose early nurture was kindly can judge quite impartially the man who has been kind to him in boyhood.

I quitted school suddenly, leaving my little Phil behind me, a brave little handsome boy, endearing himself to old and young by his good looks, his gayety, his courage, and his gentlemanly bearing. Once in a way a letter would come from him, full of that artless affection and tenderness which fills boys' hearts, and is so touching in their letters. It was answered with proper dignity and condescension on the senior boy's part. Our modest little country home kept up a friendly intercourse with Dr. Firmin's grand London mansion, of which, in his visits to us, my uncle, Major Pendennis, did not fail to bring news. A correspondence took place between the ladies of each house. We supplied Mrs. Firmin with little country presents, tokens of my mother's good-will and gratitude toward the friends who had been kind to her son. I went my way to the university, having occasional glimpses of Phil at school. I took chambers in the Temple, which he found great delight in visiting; and he liked our homely dinner from Dick's, and a bed on the sofa, better than the splendid entertainments in Old Parr Street and his great gloomy chamber there. He had grown by this time to be ever so much taller than his senior, though he always persists in looking up to me unto the present day.

A very few weeks after my poor mother passed that judgment on Mrs. Firmin she saw reason to regret and revoke it. Phil's mother, who was afraid, or perhaps was forbidden, to attend her son in his illness at school, was taken ill herself.

Phil returned to Grey Friars in a deep suit of black; the servants on the carriage wore black too; and a certain tyrant of the place, beginning to laugh and jeer because Firmin's eyes filled with tears at some ribald remark, was gruffly rebuked by Sampson major, the cock of the whole school; and with the question, "Don't you see the poor beggar's in mourning, you great brute?" was kicked about his business.

When Philip Firmin and I met again there was crape on both our hats. I don't think either could see the other's face very well. I went to see him in Parr Street, in the vacant, melancholy house, where the poor mother's picture was yet hanging in her empty drawing-room.

"She was always fond of you, Pendennis," said Phil. "God bless you for being so good to her! You know what it is to lose—to lose what loves you best in the world. I didn't know how—how I loved her till I had lost her." And many a sob broke his words as he spoke.

Her picture was removed from the drawing-room presently into Phil's own little study—the room in which he sate and defied his father. What had passed between them? The young man was very much changed. The frank looks of old days were gone, and Phil's face was haggard and bold. The doctor would not let me have a word more with his son after he had found us together, but, with dubious appealing looks, followed me to the door, and shut it upon me. I felt that it closed upon two unhappy men.

CHAPTER III.

A CONSULTATION.

SHOULD I peer into Firmin's privacy, and find the key to that secret? What skeleton was there in the closet? In the last Cornhill Magazine you may remember there were some verses about a portion of a skeleton. Did you remark how the poet and present proprietor of the human skull at once settled the sex of it, and determined off-hand that it must have belonged to a woman? Such skulls are locked up in many gentlemen's hearts and memories. Bluebeard, you know, had a whole museum of them—as that imprudent little last wife of his found out to her cost. And, on the other hand, a lady, we suppose, would select hers of the sort which had carried beards when in the flesh. Given a neat locked skeleton cupboard, belonging to a man of a certain age, to ascertain the sex of the original owner of the bones, you have not much need of a picklock or a blacksmith. There is no use in forcing the hinge or scratching the pretty panel. We know what is inside—we arch rogues and men of the world. Murders, I suppose, are not many—enemies and victims of our hate and anger, destroyed and trampled out of life by us, and locked out of sight; but corpses of our dead loves, my dear Sir—my dear madam—have we not got them stowed away in cupboard after cupboard, in bottle after bottle? Oh, fie! And young people! What doctrine is this to preach to them, who spell your book by papa's and mamma's knee? Yes, and how wrong it is to let them go to church, and see and hear papa and mamma publicly, on their knees, calling out, and confessing to the whole congregation, that they are sinners! So, though

I had not the key, I could see through the panel and the glimmering of the skeleton inside.

Although the elder Firmin followed me to the door, and his eyes only left me as I turned the corner of the street, I felt sure that Phil ere long would open his mind to me, or give me some clew to that mystery. I should hear from him why his bright cheeks had become hollow, why his fresh voice, which I remember so honest and cheerful, was now harsh and sarcastic, with tones that often grated on the hearer, and laughter that gave pain. It was about Philip himself that my anxieties were. The young fellow had inherited from his poor mother a considerable fortune—some eight or nine hundred a year, we always understood. He was living in a costly, not to say extravagant manner. I thought Mr. Philip's juvenile remorse were locked up in the skeleton closet, and was grieved to think he had fallen in mischief's way. Hence, no doubt, might arise the anger between him and his father. The boy was extravagant and headstrong; and the parent remonstrant and irritated.

I met my old friend Dr. Goodenough at the club one evening; and as we dined together I discoursed with him about his former patient, and recalled to him that day, years back, when the boy was ill at school, and when my poor mother and Phil's own were yet alive.

Goodenough looked very grave.

"Yes," he said, "the boy was very ill; he was nearly gone at that time—at that time—when his mother was in the Isle of Wight, and his father dangling after a prince. We thought one day it was all over with him; but—"

"But a good doctor interposed between him and pallida mors."

"A good doctor? a good nurse! The boy was delirious, and had a fancy to walk out of window, and would have done so, but for one of my nurses. You know her."

"What! the Little Sister?"

"Yes, the Little Sister."

"And it was she who nursed Phil through his fever, and saved his life? I drink her health. She is a good little soul."

"Good!" said the doctor, with his gruffest voice and frown.—(He was always most fierce when he was most tender-hearted.) "Good, indeed! Will you have some more of this duck?—Do. You have had enough already, and it's very unwholesome. Good, Sir? But for women, fire and brimstone ought to come down and consume this world. Your dear mother was one of the good ones. I was attending you when you were ill, at those horrible chambers you had in the Temple, at the same time when young Firmin was ill at Grey Friars. And I suppose I must be answerable for keeping two scape-graces in the world."

"Why didn't Dr. Firmin come to see him?"

"Hm! his nerves were too delicate. Besides, he did come. Talk of the * * *

The personage designated by asterisks was Phil's father, who was also a member of our club, and who entered the dining-room, tall, stately, and pale, with his stereotyped smile, and wave of his pretty hand. By-the-way, that smile of Firmin's was a very queer contortion of the handsome features. As you came up to him he would draw his lips over his teeth, causing his jaws to wrinkle (or dimple if you will) on either side. Meanwhile his eyes looked out from his face, quite melancholy and independent of the little transaction in which the mouth was engaged. Lips said, "I am a gentleman of fine manners and fascinating address, and I am supposed to be happy to see you. How do you do?" Dreary, sad, as into a great blank desert, looked the dark eyes. I do know one or two, but only one or two faces of men, when oppressed with care, which can yet smile all over.

Goodenough nods grimly to the smile of the other doctor, who blandly looks at our table, holding his chin in one of his pretty hands.

"How do?" growls Goodenough. "Young hopeful well?"

"Young hopeful sits smoking cigars till morning with some friends of his," says Firmin, with the sad smile directed toward me this time. "Boys will be boys." And he pensively walks away from us with a friendly nod toward me; examines the dinner-card in an attitude of melancholy grace; points with the jeweled hand to the dishes which he will have served, and is off, and simpering to another acquaintance at a distant table.

"I thought he would take that table," says Firmin's cynical confrère.

"In the draught of the door? Don't you see how the candle flickers? It is the worst place in the room!"

"Yes; but don't you see who is sitting at the next table?"

Now at the next table was a n-blem-n of vast wealth, who was growling at the quality of the mutton cutlets, and the half-pint of sherry which he had ordered for his dinner. But as his lordship has nothing to do with the ensuing history, of course we shall not violate confidence by mentioning his name. We could see Firmin smiling on his neighbor with his blandest melancholy, and the waiters presently bearing up the dishes which the doctor had ordered for his own refec-tion. He was no lover of mutton-chops and coarse sherry, as I knew, who had partaken of many a feast at his board. I could see the diamond twinkle on his pretty hand, as it daintily poured out creaming wine from the ice-pail by his side—the liberal hand that had given me many a sovereign when I was a boy.

"I can't help liking him," I said to my companion, whose scornful eyes were now and again directed toward his colleague.

"This port is very sweet. Almost all port is sweet now," remarks the doctor.

"He was very kind to me in my school-days; and Philip was a fine little fellow."

"Handsome a boy as ever I saw. Does he keep his beauty? Father was a handsome man—very. Quite a lady-killer—I mean out of his practice!" adds the grim doctor. "What is the boy doing?"

"He is at the university. He has his mother's fortune. He is wild and unsettled, and I fear he is going to the bad a little."

"Is he? Shouldn't wonder!" grumbles Goodenough.

We had talked very frankly and pleasantly until the appearance of the other doctor, but with Firmin's arrival Goodenough seemed to button up his conversation. He quickly stumped away from the dining-room to the drawing-room, and sate over a novel there until time came when he was to retire to his patients or his home.

That there was no liking between the doctors, that there was a difference between Philip and his father, was clear enough to me: but the causes of these differences I had yet to learn. The story came to me piecemeal; from confessions here, admissions there, deductions of my own. I could not, of course, be present at many of the scenes which I shall have to relate as though I had witnessed them; and the posture, language, and inward thoughts of Philip and his friends, as here related, no doubt are fancies of the narrator in many cases; but the story is as authentic as many histories, and the reader need only give such an amount of credence to it as he may judge that its verisimilitude warrants.

Well, then, we must not only revert to that illness which befell when Philip Firmin was a boy at Grey Friars, but go back yet farther in time to a period which I can not precisely ascertain.

The pupils of old Gandish's painting academy may remember a ridiculous little man, with a great deal of wild talent, about the ultimate success of which his friends were divided. Whether Andrew was a genius, or whether he was a zany, was always a moot question among the frequenters of the Greek Street billiard-rooms, and the noble disciples of the Academy and St. Martin's Lane. He may have been crazy and absurd; he may have had talent, too: such characters are not unknown in art or in literature. He broke the Queen's English; he was ignorant to a wonder; he dressed his little person in the most fantastic raiment and queerest cheap finery; he wore a beard, bless my soul! twenty years before beards were known to wag in Britain. He was the most affected little creature, and, if you looked at him, would pose in attitudes of such ludicrous dirty dignity, that if you had had a dun waiting for money in the hall of your lodging-house, or your picture refused at the Academy—if you were suffering under ever so much calamity—you could not help laughing. He was the butt of all his acquaintances, the laughing-stock of high and low, and he had as loving, gentle, faithful, honorable a heart as ever beat in a little bosom. He is gone to his rest now; his pallet and easel are waste timber; his genius, which made some little flicker of brightness, never shone much, and is extinct. In an old album, that dates back for more than a score of years, I sometimes look at poor Andrew's strange wild sketches. He might have done something had he continued to remain poor; but a rich widow, whom he met at Rome, fell in love with the strange errant painter, pursued him to England, and married him in spite of himself. His genius drooped under the servitude: he lived but a few short years, and died of a consumption, of which the good Goodenough's skill could not cure him.

One day, as he was driving with his wife in her splendid barouche through the Haymarket, he suddenly bade the coachman stop, sprang over the side of the carriage before the steps could be let fall, and his astonished wife saw him shaking the hands of a shabbily-dressed little woman who was passing—shaking both her hands, and weeping, and gesticulating, and twisting his beard and mustache, as his wont was when agitated. Mrs. Montfitchet (the wealthy Mrs. Carrickfergus she had been, before she married the painter), the owner of a young husband, who had sprung from her side, and out of her carriage, in order to caress a young woman passing in the street, might well be disturbed by this demonstration; but she was a kind-hearted woman, and when Montfitchet, on reascending into the family coach, told his wife the history of the person of whom he had just taken leave, she cried plentifully too. She bade the coachman drive straightway to her own house: she rushed up to her own apartments, whence she emerged, bearing an immense bag full of wearing apparel, and followed by a panting butler, carrying a bottle-basket and a pie: and she drove off, with her pleased Andrew by her side, to a court in Saint Martin's Lane, where dwelt the poor woman with whom he had just been conversing.

It had pleased Heaven, in the midst of dreadful calamity, to send her friends and succor. She was suffering under misfortune, poverty, and cowardly desertion. A man, who had called himself Brandon when he took lodgings in her father's house, had married her, brought her to London, tired of her, and left her. She had reason to think he had given a false name when he lodged with her father: he fled, after a few months, and his real name she never knew. When he deserted her she went back to her father, a weak man, married to a domineering woman, who pretended to disbelieve the story of her marriage, and drove her from the door. Desperate, and almost mad, she came back to London, where she still had some little relics of property that her fugitive husband left behind him. He promised, when he left her, to remit her money; but he sent none, or she refused it—or, in her wildness and despair, lost the dreadful paper which announced his desertion, and that he was married before, and that to pursue him would ruin him, and he knew she never would do that—no, however much he might have wronged her.

She was penniless then—deserted by all—having made away with the last trinket of her brief days of love, having sold the last little remnant of her poor little stock of clothing—alone, in the great wilderness of London, when it pleased God to send her succor in the person of an old friend who had known her, and even loved her, in happier days. When the Samaritans came to this poor child, they found her sick and shuddering with fever. They brought their doctor to her, who is never so eager as when he runs up a poor man's stair. And as he watched by the bed where her kind friends came to help her, he heard her sad little story of trust and desertion.

Her father was a humble person, who had seen better days; and poor little Mrs. Brandon had a sweetness and simplicity of manner which exceedingly touched the good doctor. She had little education, except that which silence, long-suffering, seclusion, will sometimes give. When cured of her illness there was the great and constant evil of poverty to meet and overcome. How was she to live? He got to be as fond of her as of a child of his own. She was tidy, thrifty, gay at times, with a little simple cheerfulness. The little flowers began to bloom as the sunshine touched them. Her whole life hitherto had been cowering under neglect, and tyranny, and gloom.

Mr. Montfitchet was for coming so often to look after the little outcast whom he had succored that I am bound to say Mrs. M. became hysterically jealous, and waited for him on the stairs as he came down swathed in his Spanish cloak, pounced on him, and called him a monster. Goodenough was also, I fancy, suspicious of Montfitchet, and Montfitchet of Goodenough. Howbeit, the doctor vowed that he never had other than the feeling of a father toward his poor little protégée, nor could any father be more tender. He did not try to take her out of her station in life. He found, or she found for herself, a work which she could do. "Papa used to say no one ever nursed him so nice as I did," she said. "I think I could do that better than any thing, except my needle, but I like to be useful to poor sick people best. I don't think about myself then, Sir." And for this business good Mr. Goodenough had her educated and employed.

The widow died in course of time whom Mrs. Brandon's father had married, and her daughters refused to keep him, speaking very disrespectfully of this old Mr. Gann, who was, indeed, a weak old man. And now Caroline came to the rescue of her old father. She was a shrewd little Caroline. She had saved a little money. Goodenough gave up a country-house, which he did not care to use, and lent Mrs. Brandon the furniture. She thought she could keep a lodging-house and find lodgers. Montfitchet had painted her. There was a sort of beauty about her which the artists admired. When Ridley the Academician had the small-pox, she attended him and caught the malady. She did not mind; not she. "It won't spoil my beauty," she said. Nor did it. The disease dealt very kindly with her little modest face. I don't know who gave her the nickname, but she had a good roomy house in Thornhaugh Street, an artist on the first and second floor; and there never was a word of scandal against the Little Sister, for was not her father in permanence sipping gin-and-water in the ground-floor parlor? As we called her "the Little Sister," her father was called "the Captain"—a bragging, lazy, good-natured old man—not a reputable captain—and very cheerful, though the conduct of his children, he said, had repeatedly broken his heart.

I don't know how many years the Little Sister had been on duty when Philip Firmin had his scarlet fever. It befell him at the end of the term, just when all the boys were going home. His tutor and his tutor's wife wanted their holidays, and sent their own children out of the way. As Phil's father was absent, Dr. Goodenough came, and sent his nurse in. The case grew worse; so bad that Dr. Firmin was summoned from the Isle of Wight, and arrived one evening at Grey Friars—Grey Friars so silent now, so noisy at other times with the shouts and crowds of the playground.

Dr. Goodenough's carriage was at the door when Dr. Firmin's carriage drove up.

"How was the boy?"

"He had been very bad. He had been wrong in the head all day, talking and laughing quite wild-like," the servant said.

The father ran up the stairs.

Phil was in a great room, in which were several empty beds of boys gone home for the holidays. The windows were opened into Grey Friars' Square. Goodenough heard his colleague's carriage drive up, and rightly divined that Phil's father had arrived. He came out and met Firmin in the ante-room.

"Head has wandered a little. Better now, and quiet;" and the one doctor murmured to the other the treatment which he had pursued.

Firmin stepped in gently toward the patient, near whose side the Little Sister was standing.

"Who is it?" asked Phil.

"It is I, dear. Your father," said Dr. Firmin, with real tenderness in his voice.

The Little Sister turned round once, and fell down like a stone by the bedside.

"You infernal villain!" said Goodenough, with an oath and a step forward. "You are the man!"

"Hush! The patient, if you please, Dr. Goodenough," said the other physician.

THE DUELISTS.

By SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

WHILE Lower Saxony was oppressed and exhausted by the Austrian and Bavarian troops in the Thirty Years' War, the circle of Upper Saxony had been preserved for a considerable period from military outrage by the cautious or timid policy of the Elector, John George. At length the advance of the savage Tilly into his states, in consequence of his refusal to recede from the treaty of Leipzig; and the successive captures of Merseburg, Naumburg, and other places of strength, compelled the Saxon prince to relinquish his temporizing policy, and to embrace the proffered alliance and protection of Gustavus Adolphus. This unexpected accession of strength determined the Swedish monarch to abandon the defensive system he had for some time pursued, and to advance immediately upon Leipzig, which had also opened its gates to the Catholic general. At this dreadful crisis, when intelligence of the rapid advance of Tilly had spread consternation throughout the Electorate, and the dread of Austrian barbarity overbalanced the hope of deliverance by the Swedes, I had been officiating several months as curate in the populous village of B—, in Upper Saxony. The atrocious cruelty of Tilly at Magdeburg was still fresh in our recollection, and the consternation of the villagers impelled them to seek relief from incessant and devout attendance at church. The bells were tolled hourly, and fervent prayers for divine assistance were succeeded by the sublime hymns of Luther, while around the portrait of the immortal Reformer large tapers were constantly burning, as before the altar of a saint.

One day, while the congregation was singing with fervent devotion the fine hymn beginning "The Lord is a tower of strength," the church door was abruptly thrown open, and a dusty courier, in the Electoral uniform, rushed into the middle aisle. Immediately the organ ceased—the singers were mute, and every head was turned in anxious anticipation of some momentous intelligence. The stranger advanced rapidly to the altar, ascended the steps, waved his hat thrice above his head, and exclaimed, in tones of loud and thrilling energy: "Rejoice, my dear fellow-Christians, rejoice! The brave Lutherans have conquered—the battle of Leipzig is fought and won—7000 Imperialists lie dead on the field—Tilly has fled—and the great Gustavus Adolphus and his army have returned thanks to God Almighty on their knees."

At this joyful and unexpected intelligence every knee was bent, and every lip moved in thanksgiving; the pealing organ put forth all its volume, and the assembled villagers concluded the hymn with streaming eyes and grateful hearts.

About three weeks after this happy day I was sitting alone in my humble apartment, and contemplating with a grateful heart the improved condition and prospects of the great Protestant cause, when a stranger entered the room unannounced, and seated himself opposite to me in silence. His tall person was enveloped in a military cloak, his countenance was bronzed with exposure to sun and storm, and his eyes and forehead were overshadowed by a dragoon-helmet. I gazed for some time upon this mysterious intruder; but my earnest perusal of his features, although it roused some remote reminiscences, led to no satisfactory conclusion, until an arch smile, which curved his well-formed lips, revealed my old friend and fellow-student, Seifert. Joyous exclamations of "Dear Charles!" and "Dear Albert!" were followed by a cordial embrace, and many eager inquiries concerning our respective pilgrimages since our separation a few years before at the University of L—. My surprise at this unexpected meeting was no little increased when my friend threw aside his cloak. At the university he was distinguished by the classic elegance of his tall and slender person, by fastidious refinement of mind and manners, by his temperance, diffidence, and taciturnity in mixed society, and by his unceasing devotion to study. I now gazed upon a robust and military figure, whose light yellow jacket and polished steel cuirass announced the Swedish officer of dragoons. His former diffidence of tone and manner had vanished forever, and was replaced by a loud voice, an air of military frankness, and an imposing self-possession, which, however, became him well, and developed advantageously his powerful and well-cultivated understanding. I congratulated him upon his improved appearance, and upon the rank he had attained in the service of the noble Gustavus.

"I need not explain to you," he replied, with the air of a man who is not ignorant of his own merits, "by what process I have become a captain of dragoons. When the great drama of European politics grows serious, and the thrones of princes totter beneath them, the sons of nobles and the minions of kings and ministers yield to the force of events and give place to men of talent and energy. At the present time there are few field-officers in active service throughout Germany who have not carried muskets in early life. This rule holds good even in the Imperial and other Catholic states, which are pre-eminently aristocratic. Tilly and Wallenstein, although of noble birth, are sprung from indigence; as are also Bucquoy and Dampier. Johann von Wert was a peasant; General Beck, a shepherd; Stahlhantsch, a footman; and Field-Marshal Aldringer, a valet-de-chambre."

He now arose, threw open the window, and whistled. This signal was soon explained by the entrance of a tall, blue-eyed, and fair-haired Swede, who covered my deal table with a napkin of white damask, placed upon it a bottle of wine with two green glasses, and disappeared. Seifert filled two bumpers of costly Hochheimer, and exclaimed, with glowing enthusiasm: "Long live Gustavus Adolphus!"

"Since I have known this great and admirable man, Albert," he continued, "I have ceased to indulge my fancy by building models of superhuman excellence. My day-dreams are dissolved, and my understanding and affections are occupied by a splendid reality. What has not the heroic Gustavus conceived and accomplished! A better man, in every sense of the word, walks not the earth; nor has any soldier, of ancient or modern times, made so many discoveries and improvements in military science. The Swedish regiments formerly comprised 3000 men, and were helpless and unwieldy as elephants. By reducing their numbers to 1200, he has enabled them to perform the most complex manoeuvres with facility, and to move with the bounding energy of Arabian coursers. Four surgeons of approved skill are attached to each regiment. Before the introduction of this humane and politic improvement the wounded were left groaning on the field of battle, a prey to the vulture and the wolf. In the Austrian army there is no provision of this nature; and Tilly himself, when marked with a Protestant sabre, was obliged to send to Halle for a surgeon. The brigading of troops—the firing en pelotons—the dragoon service—the short cannon, which carries farther than a long one—a new pike—and the cartridge-box, are but a portion of the inventions which we owe to Gustavus Adolphus. Every field-officer in the Swedish service is a worthy pupil of our heroic master, who fights alike in summer and in winter, and who has proved himself the best engineer of his time by his skill in the conduct of sieges, batteries, and intrenchments. When he drew his sword in the Protestant cause, and advanced like a hurricane into Germany, the military fops of Vienna called him the Snow-King, and predicted that he and his troops would melt in the summer heats. They little knew the formidable enemy they had to encounter. But the more sagacious Tilly shook his head when he heard this favorite jest of the Vienna circles, and was heard to say that the snow-ball would probably roll up into an avalanche. He had sufficient knowledge of human nature to foresee a possibility that the fresh and ardent religious zeal of the Swedish and German Protestants would eventually triumph over the worn-out fanaticism of the Catholic soldiery. To return to Gustavus, I could utter volumes in praise of his eloquence, and of the talent displayed in his letters, treaties, and manifestoes. His character, in short, exhibits a splendid combination of intrepidity and self-possession; of temperance and industry; of affability, clemency, and candor. To crown all, he is a good husband and father, a sound and fervent Christian; and may I fall into the talons of old Tilly, or of the devil, who is the best of the two, if I would not shed my blood for him as cheerfully as I now pour out a bumper of old Rhine-wine to his health."

I listened with growing amazement to my enthusiastic friend, whose language and deportment had experienced a change as striking as the alteration in his person. I could not discern in the martial figure before me a vestige of the modest, taciturn, and temperate youth I had formerly known. The fire of his eyes, and the stern compression of his lips, indicated a resolute and decided character; his language flowed like a torrent; and he had so entirely subdued his dislike to the bottle, that, in the ardor of his eulogium, he swallowed successive bumpers, without observing that I had limited myself to a single glass.

After he had entered into some farther details of his military career he rose to depart, and thus addressed me: "My object in calling upon you, Albert, was not merely to embrace an old friend, but to make his fortune. You are irrecoverably spoiled for a soldier; but a king who pillows his head upon the works of the immortal Grotius can appreciate learning as well as valor. He loves the book of Grotius on War and Peace as much as Alexander the Great prized the Iliad of Homer; and has often declared that he would make this highly-gifted man his prime minister, if he would accept the appointment. He has also a fine taste, or, I should rather say, an impassioned feeling for poetry. After the surrender of Elbing, but before the definitive treaty was signed, the king walked into the town unobserved, and purchased the Latin poems of Buchanan. You, Albert, are a scholar and a poet, but, more than all, you are descended from the family of Luther. I have often bantered you for attaching importance to this accident of birth, but I now foresee that it will greatly promote your advancement in life. Gustavus is a zealous Lutheran. He venerates the great Reformer as a second saviour; and he will certainly bestow upon you an honorable appointment when he learns that, in addition to more solid merits, you are a scion, although but collaterally, of the stock of Luther. And now, my Albert, vale, et me ama! The moon will be down in an hour, and I must to quarters. We are encamped three leagues from hence, near the small town of R—. The king and his staff occupy the adjacent castle. Visit me the day after to-morrow, and I will introduce you to his majesty."

With these words he embraced me, and summoned his dragoon. Two noble chargers were brought to my cottage door, and the active riders, vaulting into the saddles, bounded rapidly across the church-yard path into the high road. The night was still and beautiful; the moonbeams shone brightly upon their nodding plumes and steel cuirasses; and as I gazed upon their retreating figures, and listened to the loud ring of their sabres and accoutrements, I fancied them two knights of the olden time, sallying forth in quest of nocturnal adventure.

On the morning of the day appointed for my introduction to royalty, I felt a natural impulse to adorn the outward man, and surveyed, with some trepidation, the contents of my scanty wardrobe. Alas! the best coat in my possession displayed a surface more brown than black; and, while endeavoring to improve it with a brush, I discovered more nebulous spots and milky ways than ever met the gaze of astronomer through his telescope. At the risk of giving dire offense to the royal nostrils, I obliterated many of these celestial systems with turpentine, converted an old hat into a new one by the aid of warm beer, took my walking-stick and bundle, and commenced my journey to the Swedish camp.

About a quarter of a league from the town I encountered groups of soldiers, seated at the entrances of tents and cottages. They were men of comely aspect, well clothed, and of peaceable deportment. To an officer of some rank, who inquired my object in approaching the camp, I mentioned the invitation of Seifert. He treated me with the respect due to my sacred office, and in terms of courtesy and kindness told me that my friend was quartered near the castle gate. Anticipating a kind and hospitable reception from Seifert, I was no little surprised by his altered look and manner. He was sitting with folded arms and clouded aspect; and did not immediately reply to my cordial address, nor even acknowledge my presence by look or gesture. At length he coldly replied,

"Good-morning, Albert! Excuse my reception of you; but I thought our appointment had been for to-morrow."

Suddenly the stern expression of his features relaxed into kindness and cordiality; he started from his seat, seized my hand affectionately, and exclaimed, with visible emotion,

"It is well, however, that you have arrived to-day, for possibly you had not found me in existence to-morrow."

"Good God!" I ejaculated, "what calamity has befallen you, Seifert? Have you by any fault or misfortune lost the royal favor?"

"On the contrary," he replied, with a smile of singular meaning, "the king has just granted me a signal and unprecedented favor."

He then closed the door of his apartment, and continued in a lower tone: "Every human being, Albert, has his weak side, and even a great king is but a man. The failing of our heroic Gustavus is that of inordinate devotion. He is the high-priest as well as the general of his army, and no superannuated devotee can surpass him in praying, weeping, and psalm-singing. I give him full credit for zeal and sincerity, for it is impossible that Gustavus Adolphus can stoop to hypocrisy; but among various unmilitary regulations which have sprung from this religious enthusiasm, he has forbidden duels under penalty of death."

Here I would have interrupted him.

"Excuse me, Albert," he continued, "I know all you would say on the subject; I know that, as a clergyman, you must vindicate this absurdity of Gustavus; but kings and curates are privileged men. The latter are not very tenacious of the point d'honneur; and when a king is insulted he wages combat on a large scale, and arrays nation against nation to avenge his private quarrels. For instance, what was the battle of Leipzig but a duel between Gustavus Adolphus and Ferdinand III., or rather Maximilian of Bavaria? I must, however, do him the justice to acknowledge that he has at length relaxed the severity of this regulation, and has permitted me to measure swords with Captain Barstrom; but on condition that the duel shall take place in the baronial hall of the castle, and in presence of the king and his staff-officers. The gallery will be open to the public, and I will procure you a good seat and an intelligent companion, that you may have the pleasure of seeing me avail myself of his majesty's gracious permission to humble the pride and insolence of my opponent. You are a classical man, Albert, and may readily suppose that you are beholding a mortal combat of gladiators, for the encounter will only terminate with the death of one or both. In return for this gratification," he added, with a careless smile, "you must pledge yourself to read the service of the dead over my remains, should I fall, and to compose for me a Latin epitaph in flowing hexameters. And now, my beloved Albert, farewell. I must go and apparel, for it would be a breach of etiquette to perform tragedy before spectators of such exalted rank in any but full dress."

"Strange being!" I here impatiently exclaimed, "you speak of a deadly combat as you would of a pageant! Cease this unhallowed levity, and tell me in plain language what is the nature of the insult which can only be atoned for by the sacrifice of human life?"

"Last night at supper," he replied, "Barstrom called me a German coxcomb, and I returned the compliment by calling him a Swedish bear. A defiance to mortal combat immediately ensued; the king's consent was obtained, and this day will prove whether the bear shall give the coxcomb a mortal squeeze, or be compelled to dance to the coxcomb's fiddle."

With these words he left the apartment, and shortly returned with a Saxon subaltern of mature age and intelligent physiognomy. He told him to accompany me to the gallery of the castle hall, and to procure for me a commodious seat. Thunder-struck at this intelligence, I left the Seifert's quarters, and approached the castle gate in silent consternation. My companion gave me a look full of humorous meaning, and remarked, while he offered me a pinch of snuff,

"All this is, doubtless, above your comprehension, reverend Sir! It is almost above mine, although I have lived above half a century, and have made some use of my opportunities. Perhaps, however, you, who have studied at the university, can explain to me why no man likes to be called by his proper name. I have known Captain Seifert for a twelvemonth—I have seen him in battle—and, God knows! he wields his sabre as well as he does his tongue, which is no small praise, because he surpasses most men in wit and knowledge; but I maintain, nevertheless, that he is somewhat of a coxcomb. Captain Barstrom is also a man of distinguished bravery, and he had once the good fortune to save the king's life, but in manner he is a wild beast; and why he should take offense at the very characteristic appellation of a 'Swedish bear' puzzles me exceedingly."

I followed my conductor into the gallery, which was crowded with citizens, who readily, however, made way for me and my escort, and we gained a position commanding a good view of the arena below. The royal guards, a fine body of men, in light blue coats and steel cuirasses, lined both sides of the spacious hall, and their polished battle-axes flashed brightly from the tops of their long black lances.

"I suppose," said I to my companion, "that these fine body-guards are the king's favorite regiment?"

"Gustavus is a father to all his soldiers," answered the subaltern; "and, incredible as it may appear to you, he knows personally almost every Swede in his army, has conversed with most of them, and addressed them even by name. The entire Swedish force is as well equipped as the men before you. On this point the munificent Gustavus differs widely from Corporal Skeleton, as he always calls Tilly. The old Bavarian maintains that a polished musket and a ragged soldier set off each other. The Swedish monarch studies the health and comfort of his soldiers collectively, and indulges no preference for the guards. Indeed, he has been often heard to say that he trusted not in body-guards, but in the providence of God."

During this discussion the castle hall had become gradually crowded with officers in Swedish and Saxon uniforms. Suddenly the loud clash of spurs and voices ceased, and was succeeded by a deep and respectful silence. The lofty folding-doors were thrown open, and with a beating heart and aching eye-balls I awaited a first view of the mighty Gustavus. A tall man entered the hall, spare in body, but stout and muscular in limb. His forehead was lofty and commanding, his eyebrows were prominent and bushy, and his nose had the curve of a hawk's. Good feeling and intelligence were finely blended in his physiognomy; but the powerful glance of his deep-set eyes was softened and shaded by an expression of settled melancholy. He saluted right and left with much urbanity, proceeded to the upper end of the hall, and stood with folded arms and abstracted gaze, evidently unconscious of the passing scene.

"That is a personage of high rank," I observed; "but it can not be the king. I have understood that Gustavus is robust in person, and has a full and jovial countenance."

"That field-officer," replied the subaltern, "is the king's right arm, the admirable Gustavus Horn, whose division was immediately opposed to Tilly in the battle of Leipzig. He is at once a terrible warrior and a noble-minded man. I could relate many instances of his humanity and forbearance."

"But why," said I, "that expression of sadness in his countenance?"

"He has recently lost an excellent wife and two lovely children," answered my companion, "by a contagious malady. He clasped their dead bodies in a long embrace, and sent them in a silver coffin to Sweden for interment.—But you must not overlook the Chancellor Oxenstiern, the tall and majestic figure approaching General Horn. Observe his fine open countenance, exactly what the Italians call a viso sciolto. He is no Cardinal Richelieu—no Machiavel; and yet as cunning as the devil. He is of a mild and tranquil temperament, and affords a noble proof that an honest man may be a clever fellow. Observe how cordially he presses the hand of his son-in-law, and endeavors to console him. The wife of Gustavus Horn was his favorite daughter, but his grief for her loss is not outwardly visible. The king, who is a man of quick feelings, could not refrain from remarking this singular composure on so trying an occasion, and called him a cold-blooded animal. But what think you was the chancellor's reply? 'If my cold blood did not occasionally damp your majesty's fire, the conflagration would become extinguishable.' Gustavus did not hesitate a moment to acknowledge the justice of the remark, nor does any man in Sweden better understand the value of Oxenstiern's cool judgment and comprehensive understanding. Had the chancellor's feelings been more acute and obvious, his mind would have been proportionably deficient in that consummate power and self-balance which have enabled him to accomplish so much for his king and country.—Look at that impetuous young soldier who is striding rapidly up the hall—I mean the one whose locks are combed half over his forehead, after the newest mode, instead of being brushed upward in the lion-fashion, like the hair of Gustavus and the chancellor."

"Hah!" I exclaimed, "that is my own illustrious sovereign, Prince Bernard of Weimar. I have often met him, when we were children, on the stairs of Luther's town near Eisenach, and he always honored me with a friendly greeting. He has shot up into manly strength and beauty; and, if I read correctly his impatient gesture and flashing eye, he is a man of daring and impetuous character."

"Right!" answered the subaltern. "He is young and inexperienced; but there are within him all the elements of another Gustavus. Observe how eagerly he approaches General Horn, and how cordially he embraces him. The general has many claims upon the esteem of this headlong youth, who has sometimes in the field dared to dispute the judgment and the orders of the veteran commander; but at length saw his errors, and redeemed them nobly, by proving himself soldier enough to submit to his superior in rank, and man enough to acknowledge in public his own rashness and inexperience."

"Who is that grave-looking field-officer," I inquired, "who has just entered, and is so cordially saluted by every one?"

"Ah, my good and reverend Sir!" exclaimed the old man, "you see there a striking proof of the great advantages of war over peace, and especially in the Swedish service. In peaceable times the signal merits of that man would not have raised him from obscurity. He is Colonel Stahlhantsch, a Finlander. In his youth he was a footman, and now he is the equal in military rank and the personal friend of Duke Bernard. But he is a highly-gifted man, and, among other accomplishments, is well acquainted with the English language. He gained this knowledge when in the service of Sir Patrick Ruthven, and it has enabled him to render some valuable aid to the king, who speaks German, French, Italian, and Latin as fluently as his native tongue, but is ignorant of English."

My companion was here interrupted by the loud cheers of a numerous assemblage in the castle-yard. The window being immediately behind us, we had only to reverse our position to obtain a good view of the spacious inclosure, crowded with a dense mass of human beings.

The pressure was terrific, and yet no soldiers were employed to clear the way for the approaching monarch and his retinue. The assembled people showed their sense of this forbearance by uncovering their heads, and giving way respectfully as he advanced. I now beheld a large man on horseback, plainly attired in a suit of gray cloth. He had a green feather in his hat, and was mounted on a large spotted white horse, of singular beauty and magnificent action. I required no prompting to tell me that this was the Great Gustavus.

"Behold," exclaimed my cicerone, "how slowly he rides across the castle-yard! He is afraid that his mettlesome courser may injure the thoughtless children perpetually crossing his path; and, being near-sighted, he shades his eyes with his hand."

"The king is very plainly attired," I remarked; "but a man so distinguished by nature needs not the aid of dress. His features are finely moulded and full of dominion; but his person, although majestic and imposing, is somewhat too corpulent."

"Not an ounce too much of him," replied, somewhat abruptly, the subaltern. "He is not a heavier man than the heroic Charlemagne, or Rolf the Galloper, who founded the powerful state of Normandy; and in activity of body and mind he is at least their equal."

Unwilling to irritate this partisan of Gustavus by pursuing the subject, I remarked the uncommon beauty of the king's horse.

"A fine horse," he replied, "is the hobby of Gustavus, and by the indulgence of this foible he has too often exposed to imminent peril a life on which hinges the fate of Protestant Europe. On all occasions, and even in important engagements, he persists in riding horses easily distinguishable from all others. A few days before the battle of Leipzig, a horse-dealer brought into the camp a noble charger, very peculiarly marked and colored. This fellow was a spy employed by the base and cowardly Austrians, who calculated that Gustavus would ride this fine animal in the approaching engagement, and become an easy mark for their bullets."

"And who," I inquired, "is that broad-shouldered hero, with a clear, dark complexion, accompanied by a fine youth in the garb of a student?"

"That man of bone and muscle," he replied, "is the brave and chivalrous Banner, a name admirably characteristic of the man. He is truly a living standard, and in the wildest tumult of the battle stands firm as a castle-tower, rallies around him the bewildered soldiers, and leads them on again to combat and to victory. His noble daring can not, however, be unknown to you. How much I regret that I can not also show you those valiant soldiers, Collenburg and Teufel. Alas! they fell on the field of Leipzig. That fine-looking youth," he continued, in a whisper, "is a natural son of the king, born, however, before his marriage. Such an accident may happen to the best of men in the days of youthful riot; and to kings, who are greatly tempted, we should be greatly tolerant. When Gustavus married, he undertook, in good faith, to become the husband of one woman, and he has ever been a model of conjugal tenderness and fidelity."
